House Speaker Joe Hackney, an Orange County Democrat, said he spoke with Black midday Tuesday and learned that Black would resign and plead guilty to the crime.

Black, 71, a Mecklenburg County Democrat, could not be reached for comment. His attorney, Kenneth Bell, has not returned phone calls to The News & Observer for weeks, but confirmed the guilty plea to The Charlotte Observer on Tuesday.

Republicans and Democrats said the resignation and expected guilty plea mark a dark period for the legislature and one of the biggest falls from grace in recent state history. As speaker, Black was one of the most powerful elected officials in North Carolina, and he held the position for a record-tying four terms.

Legislators differed as to the seriousness of Black's criminal behavior, and as to whether anything would be learned from the various scandals that erupted around him over the past two years.

"I think most people feel like if he has to go to jail then the punishment doesn't fit the crime," said House Majority Leader Hugh Holliman, a Lexington Democrat. "Most of the things that I hear is that he was never accused of putting money in his own pocket, and he doesn't deserve prison because of that."

Republicans angry

Former Rep. Sam Ellis, a Raleigh Republican who lost his seat in 2004 after Black added more Democrats to his district, said the plea deal only scratches the surface. The deal would have been reached with federal prosecutors who work for U.S. Attorney George Holding, a Republican appointed to the position last year by President Bush.

"I'm disappointed that what he's pleading guilty to is so minimal compared to the level of corruption that I believe he brought to North Carolina," Ellis said.

The scandals involving Black included behind-the-scenes deals to help a major lottery company win the right to run North Carolina's new lottery; $50,000 in cash and campaign checks given to former Rep. Michael Decker, who switched parties and backed Black for speaker; and a lobbyist, Meredith Norris, whose clients gained extraordinary access to Black's staff because she also served as his unpaid political director.

Rep. John Blust, a Greensboro Republican who has been a frequent critic of Black's control over the House, said the latest developments should send a message to House members that they have to dilute the power at the top.

"It's harder to corrupt 61 instead of one," said Blust, referring to the simple majority needed in a House of 120 members.

A call for term limits

Sen. Phil Berger, a Republican from Eden, said allowing the leaders of the House and Senate to stay in those jobs indefinitely creates conditions for potential abuses. He said it would make sense to limit House speakers and Senate leaders to two two-year terms.

Black ran the House for eight years. Senate leader Marc Basnight, a Manteo Democrat, was elected this year to a record eighth term as president pro tem of the Senate.

Black Resigns House Seat (CO)

By David Ingram And Mark Johnson

The Charlotte Observer, February 15, 2007

RALEIGH - Former House Speaker Jim Black resigned his seat in the General Assembly on Wednesday, a day before he is expected to plead guilty to public corruption.

Black, six weeks into his 11th term in the House, did not appear there with colleagues. His front-row seat was empty. Instead, he sent a letter to new House Speaker Joe Hackney, Gov. Mike Easley and the clerk of the House, Denise Weeks.

In the letter, Black appeared to defend his decision to stay in office for the last 1 1/2 years, even after the State Board of Elections ruled that he broke campaign laws and while a federal grand jury heard testimony from his staff and closest political allies.

"It was important for me to help ensure a smooth transition during the last several months, which has occurred," the letter reads.

"Now it is time for me to move forward with my life and attend to the health and welfare of my family. With both sadness and anticipation, I hereby resign from the House of Representatives on Feb. 14, 2007."

The reality of Black's descent, from the pinnacle of legislative power to the precipice of a federal felony, permeated the halls of the legislature Wednesday. Even though lawmakers had anticipated such an outcome for months, as unsavory tidbits of the investigation dribbled out, the confirmation was no less unsettling.

Following a two-year state and federal investigation, Black is expected to plead guilty today in a Raleigh federal courtroom to one felony count of accepting illegal gratuities. Black's lawyer, Kenneth Bell of Charlotte, confirmed the expected plea Tuesday.

Black faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

A clerk read Black's resignation letter aloud to a hushed House chamber shortly after 2 p.m. Minutes earlier, House chaplain Jim Harry offered a prayer based on Black's expected guilty plea.

"Today's news has an absolute and immediate effect on the men and women of this chamber -- indeed, in all of government, for that matter," Harry said. "We have the capability, and yes, we have the power, to set the tone for politics, not only for this session but for future sessions as well. More so, now than ever, the eyes of the people are upon us and upon the way we do business."

Harry also prayed for restraint and compassion -- sentiments that many fellow House members and Democrats echoed in widely describing Wednesday as a "sad day." Black remains popular among them because, they say, he was loyal and committed to building consensus among Democrats.

"I only wish the very best for a man who has done so much for the state," said Senate leader Marc Basnight, D-Dare, who often negotiated legislation directly with Black. "The emotions for myself and anyone who has known Jim Black are ones of concern for his family and for Jim Black and all of us in elected government."

In a statement, Linda Daves of the N.C. Republican Party asked House Democrats and the N.C. Democratic Party to apologize for contributing to "unprecedented corruption."

"America is a nation of laws. When men or women disregard the rule of law, a day of accounting usually comes. That day seems to have arrived for Jim Black," said Daves of Charlotte.

Democratic leaders, who avoided criticizing Black during the state and federal investigations, expressed little or no regret over not calling for his resignation earlier.

"I think all that was handled appropriately," Hackney told reporters.

Lt. Gov. Beverly Perdue, a Democrat, said, "You can't second-guess decisions that are made. That's yesterday's story. I believe, at the end of the day, justice wins."

Easley, a Democrat, remained publicly silent Wednesday on Black's resignation and expected plea.

The plea is expected to be entered around 1 p.m. today. Neither Bell nor federal authorities have given details of the plea or of how it might relate to the larger investigation.

So far, the investigation has led to the conviction of five of Black's associates, including a former lawmaker who said he took a $50,000 bribe to switch parties and support Black.

Another guilty plea from Black, in state court, could come as soon as next week.

Corruption Trial Depends On 'Prince Of Darkness' Witness (MH)

By Cammy Clark

The Miami Herald, February 15, 2007

KEY WEST - With the death last year of former Monroe County Mayor John L. "Jack" London, the federal public corruption trial of a former county attorney primarily hinges on the believability of a political consultant nicknamed ``the Prince of Darkness."

For the past three days, the political consultant, Miami Beach-based Randall Hilliard, has testified under immunity against defendant James Hendrick, his former good friend.

After the prosecution began by establishing that its key witness was not a devil worshiper, Hilliard testified that Hendrick was a major player in a 1996 bribery scheme involving a stalled Marathon hotel development.

Hilliard also testified that Hendrick orchestrated an attempted coverup, concocting explanations for how a $29,000 bribe payment London received could have come from ``legitimate business."

Hendrick, who served as Monroe County attorney from 1995 to 2000, is charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice, obstruction of justice and witness tampering.

No one involved in the bribery scheme -- to which London confessed and pleaded guilty on tax evasion -- could be prosecuted for bribery. The five-year federal statute of limitations had expired when the FBI learned of it, the prosecution said.

CREDIBILITY ATTACKS

Hendrick's Miami-based attorney, Edward Shohat, went after Hilliard's credibility, portraying him as a perennial liar and backstabbing friend who recorded private conversations for the FBI in exchange for immunity. Shohat said Hendrick's conversations on those tapes were simply an attorney trying to advise a good friend who also had been a client.

Seven recordings offered into evidence began in July of 2003. They included phone conversations and meetings at a clothing-optional bar in Key West, at Hendrick's Key West home, at developer Pritam Singh's 50th birthday party in Vermont and during a walk in the quaint village of Woodstock, Vt.

In the first recording, Hendrick is heard telling Hilliard: ``Don't tell me anything you don't want John Doe or the world to know because as far as I know, my phone is tapped and so is yours."

Shortly after Hilliard got a subpoena to appear before a grand jury, he called Hendrick on March 5, 2004. On the recording, Hendrick told Hilliard: ``You just have to be very, very careful. And I should not be speaking with you and you and Jack should not be speaking."

Three days later, Hilliard and Hendrick met at Hendrick's home in Key West. During that recording, Hendrick told Hilliard: ``I'm sure no one would counsel me to sit here and talk with you because it would be considered witness tampering."

`POLITICAL PROBLEM'

Developer Marvin Rappaport has testified that after years of frustration in getting county approval to develop a 79-room hotel called Hall's Resort in Marathon, the then-county mayor London told Rappaport that Rappaport had a ``political problem."

A half-hour later, Rappaport said, he got a call from Hilliard. An agreement soon was worked out in which Rappaport would pay Hilliard $82,500 for consulting fees. Hilliard testified that the terms were given to him by ``Jimmy and Jack."

The Halls Project was approved a couple of months later. London eventually received $29,000 for his influence in the project. Prosecutors said in opening arguments that Hendrick's motive for being part of the bribe was not for money, but for power. Hilliard was financially desperate and said he spent the initial $57,000 paid to him by Rappaport. After more than a year had passed, London became financially desperate as well. Prosecutors said he was about to lose his second home in Corks, Ireland.

Hilliard testified that in November of 1997, London arrived intoxicated at his pink home, located at the former fairgrounds in Key West.

"He told me he wanted his money and called me a welsher and threatened me," Hilliard said.

Hilliard testified that he sent London's lawyers in Ireland three cashier checks totaling $29,000 to satisfy the lien. On the DHL bills, he used his name on one, London's on the second, and London's wife Elaine's on the third.

When asked why, Hilliard said: ``If I was going to be doing all this madness, I wanted all of our necks to be in the same noose."

Hilliard testified he kept the incriminating documents as an ``insurance policy."

Allegations Leveled In Pellicano Case (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

The latest and perhaps final federal indictment in the long-running Anthony Pellicano investigation raised new allegations Wednesday about how the onetime Hollywood private eye conspired with attorney Terry Christensen to wiretap the ex-wife of billionaire Kirk Kerkorian.

While it did not charge any new defendants, the grand jury indictment named two new victims of Pellicano's alleged racketeering. Included is well-known entertainment attorney John LaViolette, who was chief negotiator in a bitter battle between the German company Intertainment AG and its onetime producing partner, the now-bankrupt Franchise Pictures.

The 111-count indictment, coming more than a year after federal prosecutors first charged Pellicano and six others with a litany of crimes, was immediately assailed by defense attorneys as a meaningless addendum to what they characterize as an overblown case.

"These are not even new charges," said Pellicano's attorney, Steven F. Gruel. "And what upsets me the most about it is that instead of providing discovery so we can contest the existing charges, it seems to me that they are wasting their time before the grand jury bringing meaningless accusations against Mr. Pellicano."

Christensen's attorney, Terree Bowers, was equally critical, suggesting the U.S. attorney's office brought the indictment in retaliation for the sharp criticism leveled at its tactics by defense attorneys.

"The prosecutors have made a huge mistake in their attempt to strike back at Terry Christensen for his recent charges of misconduct and disorganization against the government," Bowers said.

He contends that the details of that conversation "will actually clearly prove Terry's innocence if this matter is ever aired before a jury."

The U.S. attorney's office, as is its custom in pending cases, did not respond to the accusations of the defense attorneys.

The new allegations center on a March 18, 2002, conversation between Pellicano and Christensen in relation to his representation of Kirk Kerkorian in a child support case with his estranged wife, Lisa Bonder Kerkorian. Prosecutors contend Christensen paid the investigator $100,000 to eavesdrop on Bonder Kerkorian's phone calls to her attorneys and pass on information to Christensen.

The new indictment asserts that Christensen told Pellicano "one of the criteria" of arranging the illegal wiretap "is that no name ever surfaces anywhere" because "the people related to me don't want to do this."

The next month, the indictment adds, Pellicano allegedly told the attorney that "if we continue to get this kind of information with their strategy, we're really killing 'em."

And later in April 2002, according to the indictment, Pellicano allegedly told Christensen that he had 80 intercepted telephone calls to review "just from today."

The latest indictment also identifies attorney LaViolette as a victim of alleged wiretapping in 2001. On March 15 of that year, the attorney was involved in a negotiation between Intertainment and Franchise Pictures, then owned by Hollywood producer Elie Samaha and onetime actor Andrew Stevens.

In an interview Wednesday, LaViolette said he was told more than two years ago by his client, an Intertainment executive in Los Angeles, that the FBI had found phone records at Pellicano's offices suggesting that their conversations had been bugged. "The implication was that our calls were tapped, but [FBI agents] didn't give much more information than that," LaViolette said, adding that the FBI never interviewed him.

The indictment is the fourth issued by a grand jury that was impaneled in February 2005 and is expected to disband. It also names Los Angeles art dealer Paul Rusconi as a wiretap victim.

To date, seven people, including a former Beverly Hills police officer and film director John McTiernan, have pleaded guilty in the case.

New Indictment Released In Hollywood Wiretapping Scandal (AP)

By Greg Risling

AP, February 15, 2007

LOS ANGELES - A federal grand jury on Wednesday returned a revised indictment in a Hollywood wiretapping scandal that chronicles further conversations between private investigator Anthony Pellicano and an attorney representing billionaire Kirk Kerkorian.

The new indictment comes more than a year after initial charges were filed in the case and six months before trial is expected to begin. Prosecutors promised another indictment was forthcoming but no new defendants and charges were included in the latest version.

It does include detailed discussions between Pellicano, 62, and Terry Christensen, an attorney who represented Kirkorian in a child-support battle with his ex-wife.

Prosecutors accused Christensen of paying Pellicano at least $100,000 to illegally listen in on private conversations between Lisa Bonder Kerkorian and her attorneys to gain a tactical advantage in litigation. At issue was whether Kerkorian had fathered her then 4-year-old daughter.

Over a two-month period in 2002, according to court documents, Pellicano was instructed by Christensen to find out who the child's father was.

"One of the criteria is that no name ever surfaces anywhere" because "the people related to me don't want to do this," Christensen said.

Later, Pellicano tells Christensen that he has heard conversations between Bonder Kerkorian and her lawyers and "if we continue to get this kind of information with their strategy, we're really killing 'em," court documents said.

Kerkorian had a decade-long romantic relationship with Bonder Kerkorian, a former tennis pro, but they were married for only a month in 1999.

Bonder Kerkorian sought $320,000 a month from Kerkorian to support her child but later admitted that she faked a DNA paternity test by using saliva she obtained from Kerkorian's adult daughter.

Christensen, 65, has denied wrongdoing and has pleaded not guilty to one count of conspiracy and one count of intercepting wire communications.

"They have chosen to add brazenly false references to a conversation on March 18, 2002, that will actually clearly prove Terry's innocence if this matter is ever aired before a jury," Christensen's attorney Terree Bowers said.

Pellicano faces numerous charges and also has pleaded not guilty. Kerkorian, who will turn 90 in June, has not been accused of any wrongdoing in the 111-count indictment.

The conversations between Christensen and Pellicano also are the subject of a federal leak investigation. The New York Times published a story last month that had excerpts from audio recordings between the two men.

The recordings reveal Christensen stopped short of saying he told Kerkorian that Pellicano was using wiretaps to monitor Bonder Kerkorian.

U.S. District Judge Dale Fischer issued a protective order to prevent the release of evidence, but the Times has printed several articles that quote sealed FBI interview reports in the case.

The latest indictment also includes more victims including entertainment attorney John LaViolette and film producer Charles Roven.

Prosecutors contend that Pellicano illegally wiretapped the phones of Hollywood stars such as Sylvester Stallone and bribed police officers to run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases.

Fourteen people have been charged in the case, with seven pleading guilty. One person has been acquitted but has since had new charges filed against her.

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, February 15, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - An outraged federal judge sentenced a former Clark County commissioner to six years in federal prison Wednesday for doling out hundreds of thousands of dollars of a strip club owner's cash to bribe politicians in Las Vegas and San Diego.

"If there ever needs to be a message with regards to political corruption, it is this case," U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks said of the case dubbed "Operation G-Sting."

In a scathing rebuke, Hicks branded Lance Malone the recruiter, organizer, manager and leader of what he called "probably as gross a case of political corruption in the state of Nevada, certainly, that has ever occurred and been successfully prosecuted."

The judge blamed Malone, 45, for serving as "bag man" lobbyist in the distribution of at least $550,000 worth of bribes to former county commission colleagues and San Diego City Council members from 2000 to 2003.

"This has undoubtedly caused a loss of public confidence in local government that probably cannot be measured," Hicks said.

The judge increased a recommended 41-month sentence to 72 months in the Las Vegas case, after saying he was convinced by testimony that Malone accepted money for a new car from strip club owner Michael Galardi while Malone still served on the Clark County commission. Malone, a former police officer, went to work for Galardi as a lobbyist after losing a re-election bid.

Malone previously was convicted by a San Diego jury on charges that he delivered Galardi's bribes to councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet.

Zucchet's conviction was later overturned by the federal judge who heard that case. He ruled the evidence of fraud and extortion was insufficient. Inzunza was sentenced to 21 months in prison.

Hicks made the Las Vegas sentence concurrent with the three years in federal prison that Malone received in San Diego, and added a fine of $100,000.

Hicks acknowledged that all money came from Galardi, who has pleaded guilty and awaits sentencing.

"Pocket change" to Galardi, the judge said, "but big dollars, with regard to political corruption in Clark County."

The judge called Malone's relationships with his former commission colleagues essential to Galardi's attempts to buy votes and expand his empire of three strip clubs in the Las Vegas area and one club near San Diego.

However, Hicks rejected prosecutor Daniel Schiess' attempts to enter new evidence tying Malone to allegations of bribery involving a Las Vegas city councilman and to claims that a Canadian developer offered $250,000 to Malone and an indicted Las Vegas businessman to curry support for a casino project just outside Las Vegas.

Malone's lawyer, Dominic Gentile, said he would study Hicks' decision for grounds for appeal.

But he noted that Malone waived his right to appeal when he pleaded guilty in September to one count of conspiracy under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations, or RICO Act. That plea avoided trial in Las Vegas, and made Malone the fifth person convicted in the sensational southern Nevada case that included blue velvet Crown Royal bags stuffed with cash and Galardi's strip club employees trading sex for votes.

On Wednesday, Malone, 45, told Hicks that he had been greedy, and pleaded for leniency.

"I did start with good intentions, and those intentions went horribly, horribly wrong," said Malone, who Schiess said started accepting $300 a day from Galardi in October 1999.

His voice choking, the divorced father of two said the hardest thing he'd ever done was tell his young sons that he was going to prison.

"I did things that I regret and I wish I could take back, but I cannot," he said.

Malone was ordered to report to prison by April 9. The judge said will decide how much personal property Malone will be ordered to forfeit. But he put the figure at about $410,000, including assets the judge accused Malone of trying to "insulate from the system" by turning them over to his wife when they divorced shortly before his San Diego trial.

Malone declined to comment as he left court with his arm around his mother.

He becomes the third person sentenced in the corruption case that grew from years of FBI wiretaps.

Former Clark County commissioner Dario Herrera, 33, is serving four years and two months in prison. Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, 68, is serving 30 months. Erin Kenny, 46, pleaded guilty and testified against them last year. She awaits sentencing.

Galardi, 45, faces no more than five years in prison for his guilty plea and cooperation in the case.

The powerful seven-member commission wields control over a wide area of southern Nevada, including the Las Vegas Strip.

GOP Lawmaker Rips Justice's Berger Probe (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The Justice Department gave former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger a "free pass" in its investigation into his removal of documents from the National Archives, says a senior Republican lawmaker, who yesterday called for a House committee to investigate the matter instead.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and ranking member on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the department was "unacceptably incurious" about Mr. Berger's visits to the archives in May 2002 and July 2003 and never told the September 11 commission that he removed original, uninventoried documents.

Mr. Davis also said the department failed to administer a polygraph examination, despite the test being part of a plea agreement Mr. Berger made with the government in exchange for a lesser sentence.

"In investigating Mr. Berger, the Justice Department apparently gave him a free pass due to his stature as a famous former White House official," Mr. Davis said in a letter to committee Chairman Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat.

"The department's investigation came up lacking in a number of areas," he said. "Our committee, the 9/11 commission and the public have a right to a full account from Mr. Berger and the Justice Department. This can only be accomplished by further investigation."

The letter was signed by 15 House Republicans.

Mr. Waxman's office did not return calls for comment.

Mr. Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser from 1997 to 2001, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the Clinton administration's knowledge of terrorist threats to the U.S.

He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years. Facing a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, the plea bargain with the Justice Department reduced the fine and kept him out of prison.

The material was removed while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, which was investigating intelligence and security failures. This raised questions about whether he was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's counterterrorism policies and actions.

Last month, the National Archives Office of Inspector General said Mr. Berger left the building unescorted for a break and placed the papers "in an accessible construction area outside" the main Archives building.

Lanny Breuer, Mr. Berger's attorney, has said the case was thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and has been closed for more than a year. He said his client cooperated with the government's investigation and has moved on.

"It's time for the new congressional minority to do the same," he said.

The Justice Department has said there is "no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Prison Costs Spiral Upward As More Are Incarcerated (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

America may not be able to afford its burgeoning prison system unless policy-makers overhaul their views about criminal justice, according to an analysis released yesterday by the Pew Charitable Trusts.

"It's a tempting leap of logic to assume the more people behind bars, the less crime there will be," said the report, which Pew described as the first such study to address both state and federal prison populations. "But despite public expectations to the contrary, there is no clear cause and effect."

The report suggests public officials weigh the benefits of incarceration as well as "evidence-based alternatives" that could save money but still protect public safety.

Big investments in prisons may not be "the most effective and economical way of combating crime," said Susan Urahn, director of state policy research at Pew.

But the state and federal prison population grew from 190,000 in 1970 to 1.5 million by 2005 -- an increase of 700 percent. By 2011, the prison census will be about 1.7 million -- or one out of every 178 Americans. Inmates will outnumber the residents of Atlanta, Baltimore and Denver combined.

"The U.S. imprisons significantly more people than any other nation," just beating China, which has imprisoned 1.5 million, the report said.

Total spending on local, state and federal corrections jumped from $9 billion in 1980 to $61 billion by 2003, with a "staggering" $27.5 billion increase expected by 2011, the report said, emphasizing the hard choices at stake.

"Every additional dollar spent on prisons is one dollar less that can go for preparing for the next Hurricane Katrina, educating young people, providing health care to the elderly or repairing roads and bridges," the report stated.

The report highlighted a number of trends. Finding and retaining qualified corrections officers and other personnel is a major challenge in many states; all face a changing prison population. The number of female inmates will increase by 16 percent by 2011; the male population will increase by 12 percent, the report said.

The current yearly cost of tending the average prisoner? It ranges from a low of $13,009 in Louisiana to a high of $44,860 in Rhode Island.

The report based its projections and other information primarily on statistics from the Department of Justice, the Bureau of Prisons and state resources. It is available online at www.pewtrusts.com.

"The bottom line is that the American correctional system is getting tough on criminals. But it is also getting tough on taxpayers," project director Adam Gelb said. "Our sense is that there is more bipartisan agreement about sentencing and corrections than there has been in 25 years. Led by both Republicans and Democrats, states are taking a hard look at costs and starting to make tough decisions about who needs to go for prison, and for how long."

Mr. Gelb added, "We're fairly optimistic, given the level of concern and the openness to new approaches. There's been an explosion of research about what works in the past decade. It's starting to reach both the public and elected officials."

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

KISSIMMEE, Fla. -- The condominium boom that ended last year made a lot of developers very rich. Aleem Hussain, a journeyman property salesman with a winsome personality, wanted to be one of them.

He formed his real-estate company in 2004, calling it Main Street USA, after a nearby Disney World attraction. He bought a complex of 27 aging, two-story apartment houses in Orlando and set out to convert them into condos. His timing looked favorable. That year, for the first time, the average price of a condo in the U.S. exceeded that of a single-family home, and in the Orlando area, condo and house prices jumped 15%.

But not much has gone as planned for Mr. Hussain, 42 years old, nor has it for his hundreds of investors, who include a bunch of local sheriff's deputies. Today, Mr. Hussain's company is being liquidated by a federal bankruptcy court, and he is residing in the Seminole County jail, charged with 23 counts of federal mail and wire fraud.

Mr. Hussain's rise and fall illustrates one of the hazards of a frothy property market: inexperienced developers get in over their heads and drag unsophisticated investors down with them. "Schoolteachers, cops, doctors, priests, everyone thought they were Donald Trump," says Lewis Freeman, the court-appointed trustee administering Main Street's bankruptcy proceeding. Mr. Hussain's company, he contends, was a "microcosm of the total market. You had a lot of unqualified people getting easy money and able to go into businesses in which they didn't know what they were doing."

Mr. Hussain's 300 or so investors face potential losses of up to $400,000 apiece. Alan Cayo, 76, a retired Army officer who says he invested his "entire life savings" of $280,000 with Mr. Hussain, conjectures that the developer crossed the legal line only after financial problems began mounting. "It was incompetence, fraud, plus the market going down -- a triple whammy," he says.

• The Situation: A first-time condominium converter in Florida faces federal fraud charges related to his dealings with investors.

• What's at Stake: With his company in bankruptcy court, his 300 or so investors face potential losses of up to $400,000 each.

• The Bottom Line: The abrupt end to the national run-up in condo prices has been rough for some inexperienced developers and their often unsophisticated investors.

Mr. Hussain's lawyer, James Lenihan of White Plains, N.Y., describes his client as "someone with good intentions who made bad judgments and got overextended." He says others at the company were also responsible for what went wrong. Mr. Hussain has pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Hussain was born in the South American nation of Guyana in 1964, according to a résumé recovered from his computer by investigators. In the 1980s and 1990s, he worked in real-estate sales in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Costa Rica.

When he settled in Orlando about three years ago, the city was the epicenter of a national boom of conversions of rental apartments to condominiums. In 2005 and 2006, 24,550 apartments in the Orlando metro area, or 18% of the total in 2004, were taken off the rental market to convert, a greater number than in any other metropolitan area in the U.S., according to Reis Inc., a New York real-estate information firm.

The converters were attracted by rising prices. Between 2001 to 2004, the median resale price of existing condos nationwide jumped 57%, compared with a 25% increase for single-family houses, according to the National Association of Realtors. Real-estate experts say demand was boosted by baby boomers downsizing their homes upon retirement, and young people who were moving to cities. In addition, investors who had soured on the stock market had begun buying and selling condos.

Mr. Hussain envisioned Main Street USA, which is located south of Orlando near Gatorland amusement park, as a residential real-estate conglomerate. Its main business would be condo conversions. He and his partners formed "No-Fee Realty" to broker condo sales, and two subsidiaries, "USA Mortgage" and "Main Street USA Mortgage," to broker mortgages and home-equity loans, in some cases to enable property owners to invest in condos.

Former associates describe Mr. Hussain as charismatic and beguiling. He would demonstrate for employees his formidable sales skills by buttonholing potential home-financing customers at supermarkets and persuading them to fill out applications, which involved disclosing their Social Security numbers, recalls former employee Michael Lombardo.

To build trust with the local real-estate community, he took on a partner, Alan Randel, a real-estate broker who had worked in the area for several decades. Mr. Randel, the company's president, hasn't been charged in the case and declines to comment.

First, Mr. Hussain had to raise money to buy apartment buildings. His pitch to investors: Main Street would buy properties, convert them into condos, then sell them at a profit. He said he would set up a private real-estate investment trust to help finance the deals. Investors in the REIT, he said, would get steady, attractive dividends. Those who wanted higher, quicker returns, he said, could co-invest directly in the conversion projects.

In early 2005, he recruited Bernard Presha, who was retiring as public-information officer for the Orange County Sheriff's Department, to join as a vice president in charge of recruiting investors. Mr. Presha and others persuaded at least 10 sheriff's deputies to invest, according to bankruptcy-court documents. Jim Hanton, one of the deputies who invested, was put on a $25,000-a-year retainer. Bryan Margeson, a sheriff's department employee who taught criminal justice at a local community college, introduced Mr. Hussain at investment seminars and talked about how he thought Orlando's boom would continue for years.

Mr. Presha, who has filed a bankruptcy-court claim to recoup $305,000 he invested, says he quit after a couple of months because he wasn't good at persuading investors. Mr. Margeson, who says he lost $100,000, says Mr. Hussain "used me for some credibility, which I didn't realize they lacked."

"Jim [Hanton] said being a drug-enforcement cop, he was super skeptical when his wife suggested they invest," says Mr. Cayo, the retired Army man. "But after a luncheon with Aleem, he was convinced." Mr. Cayo says Mr. Hanton's involvement reassured him. "He was Anglo -- excuse me, but Aleem Hussain could be cousins with Saddam Hussein, so having Jim involved" was comforting.

Mr. Hanton, Main Street's vice president of operations, says he wasn't involved in condo sales or in company finances. He says he lost $130,000, and calls the situation "embarrassing."

In August 2005, Mr. Hussain held a dinner for prospective investors at the Citrus Club, an elite private establishment. According to several who attended, he projected a 100% return in 120 days or less for those who invested directly in a Main Street project.

Magic Marketing Deal

That summer, Mr. Hussain cut a deal with the Orlando Magic, the National Basketball Association franchise. For $350,000, Main Street secured the right to use the team's name in advertising, and to use head coach Brian Hill in a marketing video. Fans could register on the Magic's Web site to attend Main Street investment seminars at the team's practice facility. Attendees could spin a raffle wheel for a shot at free game tickets.

DOJ_NMG_0132414

An Orlando Magic spokesman describes the pact as "a traditional team marketing agreement," and says the video was one of 20 the head coach recorded one day for various sponsors. He says the team conducts reference checks on its marketing partners and has never had a problem before.

Mark Pilkington, a counterterrorism official at the sheriff's department who invested $300,000, says the Magic marketing deal reassured him. "We realized there was a frenzy in condos. They were selling like crazy," he says. "I figure, why would he rip me off for $300,000 if he's involved with the Magic?"

In September 2005, with $10 million from about 200 investors, Mr. Hussain moved to buy the 27 apartment houses known as Waldengreen. The complex contained 278 units ranging in size from 517 to 1,079 square feet. His $18.5 million winning bid, financed by a private lender, was a "damn good price for the seller," says Hal Warren, senior director with brokerage Cushman & Wakefield Inc., who represented the South Florida investors who sold. Nevertheless, Mr. Hussain figured he'd turn a substantial profit. He paid $67,000 per unit; he intended to sell them for an average of $150,000.

Mr. Hanton, the sheriff's deputy, alerted him to an 18-acre lakefront estate for sale in Winter Garden, which county records show was owned by Khalil bin Laden, a brother of Osama bin Laden. Mr. Hussain planned to refurbish the Spanish-colonial-style mansion and to add houses, condominiums or stores on the grounds, company documents indicate.

Before Mr. Hussain and a business partner left for Dubai, where the two sides planned to finalize the deal, the company had lined up financing for a $5 million bid, says Jim O'Neil, a former Main Street mortgage processor. In Dubai, after being persuaded by the seller that values had risen, Mr. Hussain agreed to pay $7 million. "We gave Aleem a line not to go over and he jumped over it," says Mr. O'Neil.

Mr. Hussain began renovating the apartment complex, which he renamed Villas at Waldengreen, and his sales team began peddling the planned condominiums. Prospective buyers were invited to seminars conducted by Messrs. Hussain and Margeson of the sheriff's department.

Anthony Cortes, an airline mechanic and father of two, says Mr. Hussain and a retired sheriff's deputy made him an attractive offer: If he put 10% down to buy a condo at Waldengreen, Main Street would make his mortgage payments for two years during the renovations. In February 2006, Mr. Cortes put $14,000 down for a $140,000 unit and took out a mortgage for the rest.

Linda Paralitici, a 50-year-old mother of five who worked for Main Street as a sales broker, bought one unit and persuaded her brother to buy one. "We were not allowed to see the property," she says.

Lack of Experience

Inside the company, Mr. Hussain's lack of experience was showing. Former employees say the operation was disorganized from day one. "The whole thing was a disaster," says Mr. Lombardo, the former employee, who was hired to originate mortgage loans even though he had no experience at it. Piles of mortgage applications by condo buyers who had put down $5,000 deposits, he recalls, languished on the desks of co-workers who were supposed to find financing.

In 2005, signs began emerging that the flood of new condominiums was more than the market could bear. That July, price appreciation for condos nationwide slipped below that of single-family homes. Converters stopped purchasing new properties and smart speculators got spooked.

Main Street sold only 100 of Waldengreen's 278 units. Renovation was haphazard, former employees say. Rather than try to move renters out of one building at a time to allow for the conversions, Main Street tore apart single apartments all over the complex. Several contractors quit because they weren't paid.

Buyers who were told that Main Street would cover two years of mortgage payments began hearing from their lenders that they were in danger of default. Mr. Cortes says he took a second job as a home inspector to take on the $1,200 monthly payment on his unit.

When Colleen Sharkey joined Main Street as a senior vice president in mid-2006, she says, Mr. Hussain told her: "I need to hire you because we've grown so fast and I have no credibility with the bankers and business community." It took her three weeks to understand the books, which were a mess, she says. She says she concluded the company was nearly bankrupt.

By August, the company was out of cash, bankruptcy-court documents indicate. It had lost $3.6 million in deposits on two other apartment complexes it had tried to buy. Dividend payments to the REIT investors, which had been steady, stopped. On Sept. 23, several of those investors confronted Mr. Hussain at Main Street's offices, according to a claim one of them filed in bankruptcy court, and Mr. Hussain responded by writing on a legal pad: "It is our intention to repay all principal investment and interest promised to the above referenced clients at such time as we refinance or sell our assets to provide the necessary funds to accomplish this."

On Sept. 29, Main Street sought bankruptcy-court protection in Orlando. By then, several investors, including some sheriff's deputies, had contacted federal prosecutors to report that REIT dividend payments had stopped and that Mr. Hussain had refused to return their original investments, as promised by the investment documents.

In October, Mr. Hussain rented a car and drove to Atlanta to catch a flight to Costa Rica. U.S. Marshals, alerted by federal investigators in Orlando, met him at the gate and arrested him.

A federal grand jury indicted him on 23 counts of mail and wire fraud. Among the accusations: He falsely represented to investors that their money would be kept in the REIT, when in reality there was no REIT and the money sat in a checking account. And he told investors their dividend payments came from investment profits, when he actually was paying them from money invested by others.

Investigators also say Main Street sold condos at inflated prices to Mr. Hussain's friends or relatives to generate misleading appraisals that justified the higher prices paid by outside buyers.

Mr. Hussain's lawyer, Mr. Lenihan, says his client wasn't trying to flee the country, but was going to Costa Rica and Nicaragua for business and charity purposes. He argues that prosecutors have singled out his client, in part because of his Middle Eastern sounding name, when others at the company were also responsible. "This thing was not set up as a scheme to defraud people," he says. "This is what happens to good people with a good idea and lousy timing who get into trouble." Mr. Hussain's trial is scheduled for April.

Investors and others have filed $19 million of claims in bankruptcy court. Mr. Cayo says he has defaulted on the three condos he bought because broken pipes have made them unrentable. Mr. Cortes continues to make payments on his unit.

The Waldengreen complex, which fell into disrepair last fall, has been taken over by the group that financed Main Street's purchase of it. A new manager has been hired and the units are once again for rent.

The company's remaining assets are being liquidated by the court. It is unlikely that investors will recoup much of their money, according to several people involved in the case.

Mr. Margeson, the sheriff's deputy, refers to the affair as his "$100,000 lesson." He notes that he "never saw people strong-armed to invest. The sad part is people lined up to invest their money. It was the whole furor of the real-estate market."

Anti-money Laundering Compliance Sparks Debate (MH)

By Jane Bussey

The Miami Herald, February 15, 2007

Banks -- facing the rising burden of complying with anti-money laundering rules -- often ask why federal officials are picking on them.

"Where are the criminals going to place their proceeds? At some point in banks," said Justice Department lawyer Lester M. Joseph, borrowing from Willie Sutton's purported quip that he robbed banks because that is where the money is.

Joseph, principal deputy chief in the Justice Department's asset forfeiture and money-laundering section, spoke Wednesday at the Florida International Bankers Association's annual Anti-Money Laundering Compliance Conference.

He said investigators simply follow the money and sometime end up targeting a bank for criminal enforcement if they discover it didn't have "a serious compliance program" in place.

Under the Bank Secrecy Act and the USA Patriot Act, banks must report suspicious activity and know their customers -- and that includes knowing whether those they do business with are drug traffickers, corrupt government officials or even an official's mistress.

Anti-money laundering consultant Brett Wolf said that the cost of implementing reporting programs was rising to the point where an anti-money laundering compliance officer can cost a bank half a million dollars.

"What everyone is concerned about is how do you balance the need for information with the compliance burden," said Wolf, anti-money laundering editor with Complinet, a New York company.

Throughout the three-day conference at the Radisson Miami Hotel, Washington officials emphasized the need to impose reporting requirements to counter drug trafficking and terrorist financing but also acknowledged the need to strike a balance.

They promised to listen, especially to concerns that stringent reporting rules are driving Latin American financial transactions away from Miami and to financial centers in Europe and elsewhere.

THE EURO FACTOR

Martin Redrado, the president of Argentina's Central Bank, said some of the hurdles and higher costs mean U.S. banks are losing business as Latin American banks simply decide to take their transactions to Europe and do business in euros.

"For a policy to be effective, you need to build consensus. It cannot be imposed," Redrado said.

Banks from the United States and Latin America are meeting in Cartagena, Colombia from April 18-20 to discuss the challenges of enforcing anti-money laundering rules across borders.

Washington officials attending the FIBA meeting, however, made it clear that while the government is trying to modify its approach, anti-money laundering safeguards are here to stay.

"It is even more relevant as we have collectively watched the world becoming more dangerous," William F. Baity, acting director of the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, said Wednesday, the final day of the conference.

Further complicating the panorama for banks are 2005 rules that require them to carry out due diligence on all their correspondent banks, which adds an extra burden on South Florida banks that do business with hundreds of counterparts in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Although Redrado, the Argentine official, said he did not believe there was "any possibility of modifying" the anti-money laundering rules, he pointed out there are many gray areas that need to be cleared up to ease compliance. "Be specific," he said.

ACCRUING INTEREST

Interest in anti-money laundering compliance is on the rise. Some 1,100 people attended this year's FIBA conference compared to around 700 people last year, and about 40 vendors participated, offering software and other services to help banks with their compliance requirements.

This year there was also a significant increase in the number of domestic bank representatives attending the conference. "You can see all of the [anti-money laundering] regimen is being spread out all over," said Clemente Vasquez-Bello, an attorney from Gunster Yoakley and the conference chairman. ``In the past it was [just] applied to big money center banks and international bankers."

Ex-D.C. Engineer Charged With Bribing Inspector (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Federal authorities have filed bribery charges against a former D.C. Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs worker accused of paying off an inspector to reduce thousands of dollars in building code fines.

Yaw Oteng-Agipong faces up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong, working as a private structural engineer, in September attempted to bribe a D.C. government inspector in connection with a construction project on Fifth Street Northwest, according to charging documents.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong declined to comment when reached by phone.

A spokeswoman for the Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs said yesterday that Mr. Oteng-Agipong retired in 2005 and hasn't worked for the city since.

Spokeswoman Linda Argo said agency officials cooperated in the investigation, which she said was handled by the FBI and the D.C. Office of the Inspector General.

"This is, as far as we know, an isolated incident," Miss Argo said.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong was employed with the District from 1982 to April 2005, when he took voluntary retirement. Before retiring, he was a supervisory structural engineer.

According to charging documents filed Friday in federal court, Mr. Oteng-Agipong offered $2,000 in cash to a city inspector in hopes of lifting a stop-work order on the project because it violated provisions of a building permit.

The inspector also had issued $6,000 in fines, authorities said.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong offered the bribe to "lift the stop work order and reduce the fine," according to the U.S. attorney's office.

SoCal Doctors Charged In Alleged $12-million Medicare Fraud (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, February 15, 2007

LOS ANGELES - Doctors and others filed phony Medicare claims that bilked the government out of more than $12 million, according to charges filed Wednesday.

A federal grand jury in Orange County returned indictments accusing 18 people of billing the government for respiratory therapy for Southern California patients - services that either were not needed or never performed, the U.S. attorney's office said in a statement.

The two indictments alleged conspiracy, money laundering and 68 counts of health care fraud against nine doctors and others, including several administrators of board-and-care homes.

Prosecutors contend that the doctors paid people known as "cappers" and board-and-care operators to recruit "elderly, infirm and mentally ill patients" for respiratory therapy.

"The therapists were ordered to entice the residents to undergo the treatments with gifts, such as sodas, candy and doughnuts," federal prosecutors said.

If convicted, the defendants could be sentenced to a maximum of 10 years in federal prison for each count of health care fraud, 20 years for money laundering and five years for conspiracy.

In an unrelated case, a man who posed as a doctor was accused billing Medicare for more than $500,000 in phony or unnecessary services he provided to patients from three counties.

Betros Garabet, 40, of Glendale, was not licensed to practice medicine when he opened a Pomona clinic and he was accused of using another person's doctor's license in order to file Medicare claims for patients brought in from Los Angeles, San Bernardino and Riverside counties, the U.S. attorney's office said.

He hired cappers to recruit Medicare recipients, who were paid kickbacks to go to Garabet's clinic, according to a Feb. 7 indictment.

Garabet and three other people are charged with health care fraud. Garabet remained at large but the others were arrested Wednesday.

One defendant also was charged with making a false statement to the FBI.

Garabet could not immediately be reached for comment. There was no telephone listing for him in Glendale.

Neteller Patrons To See Longer Wait For Money (USAT)

By Jon Swartz, Usa Today

USA Today, February 15, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — The waiting game for thousands of U.S. patrons with money tied up in an online payment service under federal investigation just got longer.

The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York late Wednesday said it extended the deadline until March 16 to decide whether to indict the co-founders of Neteller, an Internet money-transfer service popular among gamblers. Stephen Lawrence and John Lefebvre were arrested in January on a charge of conspiracy to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling

For U.S. customers of the site, it was another delay in their efforts to recoup their money, which remains in Neteller accounts until the legal matter is resolved.

Neteller says U.S. authorities have frozen access to about $55 million in U.S.-based accounts.

"As a result of the restrictions placed by third parties, court-ordered seizures and related legal concerns, (Neteller) is unable to make payments to U.S. customers," says a posting on the company's website.

FBI agent Neil Donovan has said funds are being held in court as potential evidence. He did not provide a timetable on when customers may get their money back.

Though money-transfer companies such as Neteller do business with financial institutions and merchants, many also allow gambling companies to transfer money collected from U.S. gamblers to bank accounts outside the USA. Neteller last month closed its U.S. Internet gambling services, erasing about two-thirds of its business.

A law signed by President Bush in October bans the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for Internet gaming. U.S. residents place more than half of all bets to major offshore casinos in an estimated $10.6 billion industry. However, most online gaming sites are based offshore, outside the reach of American law enforcement.

With Neteller's financial future teetering in the balance, consumers might choose less reliable money-transfer services instead, says Ken Dreifach, an Internet attorney.

Man Pleads Guilty In Scam (MJS)

By David Doege

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 15, 2007

Clothing scheme may bring 20 years

A Brookfield man charged with using the Internet to traffic counterfeit clothing and defraud people around the country and in Germany pleaded guilty Wednesday in federal court to wire fraud.

Steven M. Weber told U.S. District Judge Charles Clevert that his scam began innocently under his parents' roof when he found a way to make money by connecting small-business people with clothing suppliers.

"I tried to go into business, tried to be an entrepreneur," Weber explained. "I started around 2004, right after high school."

But after realizing that he was passing on counterfeit designer clothing because customers complained and the suppliers were charging prices too good to be true, Weber said he continued in the trade anyway.

"I foolishly knew that it was counterfeit," Weber told Clevert, adding that he kept some buyers' money without sending them their merchandise.

Documents filed in state and federal court during the 2 1/2 years that Weber was under investigation say that he persisted in illegal Internet activities after warnings from police, the seizures of his car and two computers from his home, the freezing of a bank account, and prosecutors' statement in open court that Weber had become the focus of a federal investigation.

Weber was arrested in September after an investigation involving the FBI, Brookfield police and an area cyber-crimes task force, in which undercover agents bought counterfeit clothing from Weber and made clear to him in e-mails that they wanted counterfeit clothing.

The agents connected with Weber after investigating complaints from customers in several states and Germany, who said they sent him thousands of dollars for large lots of designer clothing that they never received.

According to the plea agreement in the case, investigators linked Weber to at least 22 victims who were defrauded of at least $213,000.

Weber, who is under house arrest, is to be sentenced June 8. The charge carries up to 20 years in prison.

Robberies, Assaults With Guns Increase 50% From '06 (WT)

By Daniel Taylor

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The number of violent crimes committed with guns in the first six weeks of the year has increased by 50 percent compared with the same period last year, according to Metropolitan Police Department statistics.

Preliminary statistics indicate that 267 gun-involved robberies and assaults have been reported this year through Tuesday, compared with 181 in the year-ago period.

"It's a big concern," 4th District Cmdr. Hilton Burton said yesterday. "We've definitely seen an increase in robberies since the beginning of the year."

Robberies involving guns jumped from 17 last year to 25 in the 4th District, which lies in Northwest east of Rock Creek Park. Assaults with guns have increased from five to 13 this year.

Such increases are sometimes due to a few criminals who go on crime sprees, Cmdr. Burton said.

"Generally, we find it's the same group of individuals that may be hitting over and over again," he said. "One, maybe two arrests will generally close out most of the cases."

But he has noticed that the recent robberies haven't been limited to one area.

"It's all across the 4th District," he said.

The biggest increase in robberies involving guns occurred in the 1st District, where such incidents jumped from 10 last year to 31. Assaults with guns went from seven last year to 10.

Cmdr. Diane Groomes, who heads the 1st District, said she isn't sure what is causing the increase. Her district -- which includes much of the downtown core -- showed the largest increase, with a 140 percent jump in gun-related assaults and robberies.

She attributed much of the increase to juveniles "going around in vans and jumping out on people."

The 7th District, located entirely in Southeast, showed a 200 percent increase in robberies with guns, going from 10 cases through mid-February last year to 30 cases. On Tuesday, an off-duty police officer was shot while being robbed by two men in that district.

Reports of assaults and robberies involving guns increased in every police district except the 6th District, which includes parts of Southeast and Northeast. That district showed no significant change.

There were 408 robberies, including those in which guns were not used, this year, compared with 404 last year.

Overall assaults have declined from 347 last year to 301.

The only substantial decline in gun-involved robberies occurred in the 3rd District, which recorded a drop from 35 last year to 31. However, gun-involved assaults in the 3rd District, which encompasses Columbia Heights and Mount Pleasant in Northwest, went from eight last year to 20.

"The 3rd District has been experiencing a continuing spike, and that has worried me very much," he said.

Charles H. Ramsey, the former police chief, had declared a crime emergency in July after a wave of armed robberies and assaults. Homicides and robberies dipped in the months after the emergency.

Council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat, said he also was concerned about gun-crime levels in the District, but he cautioned that the statistics only cover six weeks.

Mr. Mendelson, who heads the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, which has oversight of the police department, said the main concern remains the amount of guns in the city.

"It's a continuing problem," he said. "There are far too many guns."

An Outsider's Murder Trial Shakes A Southern Town (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

ABBEVILLE, S.C., Feb. 14 — It was a dispute over 20 feet of mean-looking land, a deadly squeeze of the trigger three years ago backed by pure conviction and an unwavering motto.

The Bixby family refused to budge for a highway-widening project, out of belief. "Live free or die," cried Steve Bixby, bespectacled and rigged out in camouflage and guns the day of the shooting, in a challenge to the authorities, witnesses said.

Mr. Bixby, 39, and his father, Arthur, 77, are accused of murder in the fatal shootings of two law enforcement officers who were trying to seize the land on behalf of the State of South Carolina. Both men face the death penalty. Mr. Bixby's mother, Rita, 74, was indicted as an accessory.

Now, with the opening Wednesday of Mr. Bixby's trial in the murder of Deputy Sheriff Danny Wilson, 37, and Donnie Ouzts, 63, a state constable, this Old South town with its intense Confederate heritage is reliving the winter's day in 2003 when the reclusive Bixbys held off the local police for 14 hours, after the shootings of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Ouzts.

The town is doing so gingerly. There were no supporters of the Bixbys on hand Wednesday as a jury sat in judgment over what the authorities say was Mr. Bixby's deadly act of resistance to authority. He is reviled in Abbeville, and the prosecutor had to pick his jury 160 miles away.

What the authorities said was Mr. Bixby's armed refusal to give up a small piece of his land for the widening of Highway 72 — "We will protect it to our last breath," he is reported to have proclaimed — is regarded here as senseless. Guns at the ready, Mr. Bixby was primed and waiting for his face-off with the police, witnesses said.

On the other hand, symbols of resistance to central authority, some of the South's most hallowed, abound here, lovingly tended in the quaint little town billing itself for passing tourists as the "Birthplace and Deathbed of the Confederacy."

Up the street from the mellow brick courthouse is the white-columned mansion where Jefferson Davis had his last cabinet meeting; nearby, one of the first rallies demanding secession was held in 1860. The monument to the Confederate dead outside the courthouse proclaims that "the soldiers who wore the gray and died with Lee were in the right;" the Confederate flag flies high above the highway; and a bookstore off the old brick square sells titles like "The South Was Right" and "Myths of Slavery."

The Southern Poverty Law Center, a civil rights organization in Montgomery, Ala., says the Abbeville area, in the western part of the state, has attracted others like the Bixbys — fanatics about property rights and resistance to authority who find the Confederate heritage nourishing. "We've pointed out that that area is one of the hotbeds," said Mark Potok, a staff director at the center.

Residents deny that there is any connection between the region's Confederate heritage and a violent property-rights ideology.

"I have no clue why the Bixbys moved here," said the man running the bookstore, Robert Hayes, who also is the state director for the League of the South, a neo-Confederate group still pushing for Southern independence. "He could have picked any place in South Carolina."

Indeed, one the first things people here say about the Bixbys is that they were "outsiders," as Mr. Hayes put it, "not us." About 10 years ago they moved from New Hampshire, where they were involved with an anti-tax/anti-zoning group, and had had run-ins with a judge.

Why the family chose Abbeville is, people here say, a mystery. "Abbeville is just not like that," said Cheri Standridge, executive director of the Chamber of Commerce.

Amanda Dean, who runs a coffee shop on the square, said the family had the wrong idea about the town. "This is a good, strong family town," Ms. Dean said. "It's just such a shame. They could feel like they're coming to their homeland, and that's what's so sad."

The Bixbys may have warmed to Abbeville, but the feeling was not reciprocated by the genteel town. Steve Bixby, heavy-set and marginally employed in construction and food-concession vending, a sometime karaoke singer at a local bar, remained an outsider, while he and his parents fulminated together in the modest little clapboard house about the horrors of government interference. It is still pock-marked with bullet holes.

Indeed, the culture clash between the Yankee Bixbys and their reluctant Southern hosts was on vivid display in the trial's opening testimony Wednesday. Several witnesses — plain-talking highway engineers who had encountered the Bixbys in the days before the shootings on Dec. 8, 2003 — testified with shock about the family's propensity for profanity.

"During all this they continued to cuss," said Drew McCaffrey of the South Carolina Department of Transportation. "There was a lot of cussing from Steve and Rita," Mr. McCaffrey said.

"They were cussing an awful lot, him and his mom," said Mr. McCaffrey's colleague Dale Williams, who recalled the "No Government Agents" sign in the front yard. Michael Hannah, another department employee, recalled, "They basically started making some threats, and there was cussing."

The verbal violence — "ranting and raving," Mr. Williams called it — presaged the physical, the witnesses said. A chilling scene confronted him when he drove by on the morning of the shooting: Steve Bixby, framed by his house, "a pistol in his right hand and a long gun in his left." The witness added soberly, "I knew at that time the officer was in trouble." Mr. Wilson was shot in the chest and Mr. Ouzts in the back, at the doorstep.

Both men were well-known and well-liked; a young man, asked if he knew them, bit his lip and ducked his head as he hurried out of the coffee shop on the square. "They want to put it behind them," said Bill Greene, a retired electrical technician, of the townspeople. "Lot of times, people move into these little towns, they think they can have things their way. But you have to obey the laws."

Research: Red-light Cameras Work (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, February 15, 2007

ATLANTA — Surveillance cameras at major intersections dramatically reduce the number of drivers who barrel through red lights, two new research reports say.

The findings come as debate about the controversial devices continues a decade after they were introduced. The battles include a proposal to ban the cameras here in Georgia, litigation in at least three states and legislative efforts to permit them in six other states.

The cameras automatically photograph vehicles that drive into intersections after the light turns red. Vehicle owners are then mailed citations instructing them to pay a fine or sign an affidavit that they weren't driving at the time.

More than 850 people die and about 170,000 are injured each year in crashes caused by drivers running red lights, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration says.

DOJ_NMG_0132422

The Philadelphia study, conducted by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety (IIHS), an industry group, examined red-light violations using a two-step approach. First, researchers found that violations dropped by 36% after yellow lights were extended to give drivers more warning that the light was about to turn red. After red-light cameras were added, remaining violations dropped by 96%.

"There's a dramatic change in driver behavior when red-light cameras are used," says Richard Retting, senior transportation safety engineer for IIHS. "The jury is in on that question."

The Virginia Beach study, conducted by Old Dominion University, examined signal violations at four intersections before red-light cameras were installed, while they were operating and after they were removed in 2005. Violations more than tripled by August 2006.

"That's a huge jump," says lead researcher Bryan Porter, an associate professor of psychology at Old Dominion. "The rate of red-light running was actually higher" than before the cameras were installed.

The popularity of the cameras is growing rapidly despite opposition that centers on constitutional grounds. About 250 communities around the USA use the devices, according to the Insurance Institute. Just 10 years ago, only New York and San Francisco had them.

Opponents say the cameras deny drivers their right to confront their accusers in court and are a ploy by local governments to raise revenue.

"There is a lot of money to be made with them," says Howard Bass, a Minnesota attorney who successfully challenged Minneapolis' red-light camera system in a case that will be argued before the state Supreme Court next month. "Ultimately, this is an issue that may have to be decided in the court of public opinion rather than courts of law. It's a public policy issue of how much surveillance creep we will tolerate in the 21st century."

MySpace Cleared In Sexual Assault Case (LAT)

By Dawn C. Chmielewski And Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

Whose fault is it that 13-year-old Julie Doe lied about her age, met a guy on MySpace and was sexually assaulted by him in a Texas parking lot?

Not MySpace's, a federal judge said in a decision released Wednesday.

The ruling appears to be the first time a federal court has extended to social-networking sites the same free-speech protections granted to Internet service providers. It could prove pivotal, coming as educators, lawmakers and states' attorneys general are leaning on News Corp.-owned MySpace to protect young users from online predators.

"A lot of people are angry about what kids are doing and what's happening on the Internet," said Parry Aftab, a leading Internet child safety expert. "That's fine. But it is not MySpace's role to raise your child."

Authorities in Travis County, Texas, charged a 19-year-old man with sexual assault in connection with the Julie Doe case. The girl's parents sued News Corp. for $30 million, saying MySpace didn't do enough to protect its members from harm. At least four similar cases are pending in Los Angeles Superior Court. MySpace is based in Beverly Hills.

"If anyone had a duty to protect Julie Doe, it was her parents, not MySpace," Judge Sam Sparks wrote in a ruling dismissing the case.

Sparks, of U.S. District Court in Austin, said MySpace couldn't be held liable for the actions of its users any more than Yahoo Inc. is responsible for what people write on its message boards.

The judge also said MySpace should not be punished for the failure of its safety measures -- if it were, the judge said, Internet companies would stop trying.

Since News Corp. acquired it in July 2005, MySpace has worked to counter its image as a haven for unsavory characters. The site hired a former federal prosecutor as chief safety officer, ran public service announcements on its site and TV channels warning children to be cautious of strangers online and began working on parental control software.

"MySpace has always been concerned about what happened to Julie Doe, because we take the safety and security of our community very seriously," the site said in a statement. "However, a lawsuit against MySpace was not the appropriate way to redress any harm to her."

In his ruling, Sparks applied the 1996 Communications Decency Act, in which Congress said Internet service providers should not be held liable for content posted on their sites by third parties. A year later, the Supreme Court struck down online censorship provisions that sought to protect minors from obscene and indecent material but left intact the immunity for ISPs.

"The concept is basically the same," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest research group in Washington, D.C. "The exact same things were happening in AOL chat rooms as are now happening on Facebook and MySpace and elsewhere -- people are exchanging information and meeting each other in online environments."

In the past decade, Rotenberg said, courts have interpreted that immunity broadly out of "recognition that, if ISPs became responsible for editorial content of anyone who participated in online chat, it would be impossible to host a site."

According to the court documents, the 13-year-old girl known as Julie Doe listed her age as 18 when she joined MySpace. In April 2006, she was contacted through the site by college freshman Pete Solis. The two exchanged e-mail and phone calls, then went out for dinner and a movie. Police say he then sexually assaulted her in a parking lot.

Austin lawyer Adam J. Loewy, who represented the girl, said they were disappointed in the ruling and plan to appeal.

"We were prepared for a very long battle in this," Loewy said. "This is simply the opening round. ... We feel MySpace does have a duty to protect the children on the site."

Bipartisan legislation was proposed last month to require sexual offenders to register their e-mail addresses with authorities and passed on to social networking sites.

Last year, the House overwhelmingly passed legislation that would have prohibited schools and libraries that receive federal funds from allowing minors to access social networking sites. The legislation never came up in the Senate, but last month Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, incorporated it in a proposed bill to protect children online.

CIVIL LAW:

Advocates Urge Improvements To FOIA Process (TECHD)

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, February 15, 2007

Civil libertarians and national security experts told lawmakers Wednesday that the longstanding law that lets citizens request full or partial disclosure of previously unreleased government documents is essential for government accountability.

Caroline Fredrickson, the American Civil Liberties Union's top lobbyist, said in prepared congressional testimony that the Freedom of Information Act is "democracy's X-ray" and is a priceless tool for revealing government waste, fraud, abuse and corruption.

Recent documents uncovered by the ACLU thanks to FOIA showed that the government has been spying on peace groups and torturing detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Afghanistan and Iraq, she told the House Government Reform and Oversight Information Policy Subcommittee in a mid-afternoon session.

But Fredrickson said in her statement that FOIA's effectiveness has been undermined by the Bush administration, specifically through an October 2001 directive by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft for agencies to adopt a policy of non-disclosure.

The current White House is "intentionally and improperly shielding itself from public view, using 'national security' as a barrier to prevent Americans from seeing what's happening inside our government," Fredrickson said. She urged Congress to rescind the Ashcroft memorandum and emphasize the presumption toward disclosure.

Meredith Fuchs, general counsel for the National Security Archive, said in her testimony that plenty of good comes from FOIA, but the process is "plagued by inefficiency, delay and sometimes outright obstruction."

FOIA requires agencies to process requests within 20 business days, but a 2003 archive audit identified unprocessed requests as old as 16 years, she said. The examination was repeated two years ago with similar findings.

According to Fuchs' testimony, addressing the delays requires better reporting so problems are identified promptly; improved leadership and tracking of requests by agencies; more resources to handle FOIA requests; and penalties for departments that do not answer requests within the required timeframe.

Clark Hoyt, who testified on behalf of the Sunshine in Government Initiative, also had some recommendations. He said a FOIA ombudsman should be created within the federal government to serve as a "champion for FOIA training and compliance [and] a place where individuals seeking to exercise their rights under FOIA can go for help short of filing a lawsuit."

Hoyt's group consists of 10 media groups committed to openness in government. "FOIA has become an essential tool for journalists attempting to find out for the public what the vast and complex federal government is up to," he said.

Subcommittee Chairman William Lacy Clay, D-Mo., called FOIA "one of the cornerstones of our democracy" and said a bill introduced last session provided a "practical and measured approach to remedying problems identified by the requester community."

That measure would have reduced the number of disputed FOIA requests through mediation and improved the information reported by agencies, he said. The bill is "an excellent starting point for legislation this Congress," Clay said.

Linda Koontz, director of information management for the Government Accountability Office, and Melanie Ann Pustay, acting director for the Justice Department's office of information and privacy, also were expected to testify at the hearing.

NIAGARA FALLS: Arrests Made In Temple Vandalism Case (LOCKUSJ)

By Rick Pfeiffer

Lockport (NY) Union-Sun & Journal, February 15, 2007

Two teenage skaters are charged with hate crimes

Now, two members of a “skakeboard club” known as DNA, are behind bars and charged with hate crimes. The arrests follow an investigation by local and federal law enforcement into a continuing series of acts of vandalism at Temple Beth Israel Conservative on College Avenue.

Shawn Michael Blount, 18, and a 14-year-old boy, whose name is being withheld because of his age, were picked up Wednesday morning by Falls Police Juvenile Division detectives and an agent from the FBI’s Joint Terrorism Task Force. Blount will be arraigned later today on charges in Falls City Court, while the juvenile appeared in Niagara County Family Court late Wednesday afternoon.

Blunt has been charged with third-degree criminal mischief and second-degree harassment as felony hate crimes. He also faces charges of third- and fourth-degree criminal mischief, first-degree aggravated harassment, fourth-degree criminal facilitation, fourth-degree stalking, making graffiti, possession of graffiti instruments and unlawfully posting advertisements.

The juvenile was charged with second-degree menacing, second-degree aggravated harassment and third-degree criminal mischief as felony hate crimes. He was also charged with third- and fourth-degree criminal mischief, first-degree aggravated harassment, fourth-degree criminal facilitation, fourth-degree stalking, making graffiti, possession of graffiti instruments and unlawfully posting advertisements.

In addition, police charged the juvenile with second-degree assault and resisting arrest after he fought with detectives as they tried to take him into custody. Two detectives suffered minor injuries in the scuffle.

“(The juvenile) has an awful lot of anger and hate in him,” Falls Police Captain John DeMarco said. “He didn’t want to go (with cops), but he did (go).”

The trouble at the temple has been going on for the last two years, but escalated dramatically over the summer and into the fall of 2006. The most recent incident at the temple occurred on Jan. 12, when duct tape was used to spell out the message "Kill the Jews" on a temple door.

Other acts of vandalism included spraying painting "DNA" on the concrete steps of the synagogue, destroying fencing and peppering the walls of the temple with eggs and paintballs.

The use of the temple property for skateboarding apparently began DNA's interest in the property. Having established their turf, the group refused to leave.

"They wouldn't go," said Dr. Lawrence Wolfgang, president of the temple congregation. "They wouldn't leave no matter who told them to go. They'd even bring out the skateboard ramp (as temple representatives told them to leave their property)."

On one occasion, Wolfgang said he confronted Blount and the juvenile outside the temple, as they were skateboarding. He said the confrontation was scary.

"They responded with a string of four letter words, right in your face," he said. "I'm kind of lucky they didn't hit me. These are big kids, bigger than me. They were scary to talk to. They had no respect for the property or for (temple members) as individuals."

After the duct tape incident in January, Wolfgang met with agents from the Buffalo office of the FBI and the local Joint Terrorism Task Force. Niagara County Sheriff's Department Investigator and JTTF Agent Mike Messina joined forces with Falls Police Juvenile Division Detective Shawn Larabee to look for leads in the case.

"We did a neighborhood canvas and that yielded some results," Messina said. "We were then able to identify (Blount and the juvenile)."

However, the intimidation of Blount, the juvenile and others made the investigation anything but easy.

"Every person we spoke to was afraid to call the police, because they were afraid of retaliation," Larabee said.

Larabee and Messina said they were able to eventually build a strong enough case to arrest Blount and the juvenile and they said they will continue to keep a close watch on DNA and its members.

"We were able to gather intelligence that didn't necessarily lead to arrests, but will show us who to watch," Larabee said.

Falls Police Superintendent John Chella said he and other law enforcement officials met with Wolfgang on Tuesday to let him know the arrests were coming.

"Myself, the United States Attorney and district attorney met with Dr. Wolfgang to pledge our support and to make sure that not only is justice done in this case, but going forward we will protect the synagogue," Chella said.

U.S. Attorney Terrance Flynn had considered filing federal hate crime charges against Blount and the juvenile, but decided it was better to keep the case in New York state courts.

"The federal charges are more focused on adults. Below 18, runs into a problem," Wolfgang said. "(Flynn) felt it would be better to handle (the cases) in one place. I know (Flynn) did consult with (U.S. Justice Department officials) in Washington, D.C., so they took this very, very seriously."

The temple leader praised the work of local police in cracking the case.

"I really have to say the city police tried really hard to solve this problem over the last two years," Wolfgang said. "They are keeping a close eye on this group. I'm hopeful (the vandalism is over). These seem to be the two main perpetrators or leaders."

Officials Manipulate Elections With Polling Location (AP)

By Joe Stinebaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2007

HOUSTON — Officials in two Houston-area elections recently manipulated polling locations to clear the path for their supporters to vote and to toss numerous roadblocks before their opponents.

Sponsors of a local community college bond election tried last year to put all their polling locations on their campuses, making voting easy for students and employees — a natural support base — but less convenient for opponents. That move prompted the U.S. Department of Justice to step in, and the election was postponed.

And officials with a suburban school district scheduled their bond election on the same day as the state's general election in November — and then spent $64,000 extra to set up separate polling places. State law would normally bar such a move, but a large loophole allows such maneuvers in the Houston area only.

"I'm sort of astonished that election law in Texas allows somebody to buy their way onto a different ballot," said Henry Brady, a political scientist at the University of California, Berkeley. "It's just astonishing to me."

Such maneuvers go on to a lesser degree all over the country.

Some Minnesota schools hold bond elections in frigid January. Fire departments pushing bond elections in New Jersey routinely place their polling booths in remote fire stations. And elections officials in Ohio and California have been accused of uneven distribution of voting machines, causing long lines in neighborhoods that support one party and a quick passthrough for supporters of the other party.

Such machinations allow government officials to assist their favored candidate or to help pass bond issues — and their resulting property tax increases — without mounting expensive campaigns. Controlling the location of polls allows supporters to turn out in their usual numbers, while opponents have to drive farther, or to several places, to vote.

But election experts said that unless there are clear civil-rights violations against a minority group, federal authorities are unlikely to step in. Polling place manipulation doesn't fall under the Voting Rights Act, so the Justice Department is not authorized to police such moves.

"These are things that can often fly beneath the radar," said Dan Tokaji, a professor specializing in elections law at Ohio State University. "Unless somebody notices it and makes a big stink through the ordinary political process, you're not going to hear a lot about that. And it's very easy for these sorts of decisions to slip through without detection."

The North Harris-Montgomery Community College District, in Houston's northern suburbs, planned a $250 million bond and board of trustees election in May. But instead of joining with other jurisdictions holding elections, district officials chose to hold a separate election. Citing budget concerns, officials cut the number of polling places from 80 to 12 — all on district campuses — and left some voters up to 20 miles from a polling place. The League of United Latin American Citizens and other critics accused district officials of trying to dilute Hispanic voting strength and limit voter turnout to those who work and study at the college.

"The reasoning behind the eliminating of voting locations is to eliminate voters," Fred Blanton, an unsuccessful board candidate, said.

The Justice Department ultimately intervened in the community college election, and the district ended up postponing it until November and offering dozens of polling places throughout the area. The bond proposal failed by 12 percentage points.

In Pearland, where the campaign to replace former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay guaranteed a higher-than-usual turnout in the general election, school district officials scheduled a $115.6 million bond election for the same day.

But consultant Richard Murray, a political scientist at the University of Houston, advised the district that they would be "much more at risk" if the bond issue was on the same ballot as the general election.

"It might cost you 10 points if you have everybody voting," he told school board members. "They know less about the bonds. If somebody emerged that was publicly opposing the bonds, an ad hoc group, they could make a lot more headway."

So the Pearland schools spent an extra $64,000 to hold a separate election, meaning people would have to make two stops to complete voting.

It worked. Forty percent of Pearland voters turned out for the general election, but only 9 percent turned out for the bond election, most of those in early voting.

The bond proposal passed with 70 percent of the vote.

Pearland schools Superintendent Bonny Cain said the election was held independently to accommodate early voting.

"It wasn't a perfect decision," Cain said. "We just felt like we were following through with a long tradition of bringing the voting booth to the voting public."

But the area elections administrator, Janice Evans, estimated that four times as many bond-issue voters would have turned out had the bond election been held along with the general election at the usual polling places.

Brady called the Pearland election "bizarre."

"The notion that you could buy your way out and have a separate ballot, I mean start thinking about what that would mean," Brady said. "It's pretty astonishing. ... It's pretty easy to put polling places in the right places and to therefore discourage some people and encourage others."

In California, local officials rely on their local voter registrar to fend off several obviously partisan attempts to manipulate voting sites. Alameda County's "voting bus" — a van stripped of passenger seats and equipped with electronic voting machines — is sent to areas around the county in an effort to boost voter turnout and help disabled voters reach the polls.

Alameda County officials were bombarded with requests from partisan groups wanting the bus to visit sites with a disproportionate numbers of voters from one party or another.

Election law experts said such tactics could result in trouble if registrars aren't careful about where they place the alternative polls.

Many states, Texas included, require that local governments holding elections on the same day as a November general election use the same polling locations as the general election. But the Houston area — Harris County and seven surrounding counties — is exempt.

Republican state Rep. Dan Gattis, who wrote the law, said he stripped the eight counties out of his original bill at the request of a Houston-area legislator who threatened to organize opposition to kill the bill.

"I believe the constituents of Harris County and those seven surrounding counties are being ill served by not being under the same rules and regulations as the rest of the state," Gattis said. "It is pure manipulation that is going on with some of these elections."

Tokaji agrees.

"I do think that there's a great potential for manipulation of elections," he said, "and it's probably something that should get a lot more attention than it's received so far."

Genetic-Discrimination Ban Nears Congressional Approval (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A bill barring discrimination by employers and insurers based on genetic information is moving swiftly through Congress, drawing praise from privacy advocates and objections from business groups that the measure is too broad.

The legislation would be the first federal law prohibiting health insurers from denying coverage or charging higher premiums based solely on genetic information. It also would forbid employers from using the information to make hiring, firing and other job-placement decisions.

The bill was approved by the House Committee on Education and Labor yesterday and is expected to pass the full House. The Senate, which previously passed the legislation twice, is expected to vote on it within two weeks, and President Bush has indicated he will sign it. The legislation has been debated for a decade but was opposed by House Republican leaders.

Rep. Louise Slaughter (D., N.Y.), the bill's co-author in the House, said the legislation will "encourage Americans to seek out preventive health care and participate in clinical trials critical to finding cures for some of our most deadly genetic-based diseases."

Genetic testing has increased over the past decade, and tests for about 1,000 diseases are available clinically, according to the Genetics and Public Policy Center in Washington. These tests can help diagnose, predict diseases and guide treatment, but the lack of a federal antidiscrimination law, advocates say, has made some consumers reluctant to participate in genetic research. Many states bar discrimination based on genetic tests, but the protections vary widely.

Some business groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, oppose the legislation. Michael Eastman, the group's executive director of labor policy, said the bill would encourage employees to file discrimination lawsuits. He said the bill would affect how employers collect health information in general because the line between genetic and other health information isn't always clear.

"We think it's really based on the politics of fear and anecdote and not on reality and reason," said Neil Trautwein, a vice president at the National Retail Federation.

International Business Machines Corp., which includes genetic nondiscrimination in its employment policy, supports the bill, according to testimony prepared for a recent hearing of the House Education and Labor Committee. But the company also said Congress should monitor implementation to prevent "expansive interpretations."

Francis Collins, director of the National Human Genome Research Institute at the National Institutes of Health, said the legislation would encourage more people to participate in genetic testing for risks such as colon cancer. "All of us are at risk for genetic discrimination if protections are not put in place because there are no perfect human specimens," he said.

Maywood Suburb Wants Investigation Of Police Misconduct (LAT)

By Hector Becerra

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

Allegations of sexual misconduct, racism and brutality are roiling the Police Department in the small suburb of Maywood, prompting the City Council this week to request an immediate investigation by the state attorney general's office.

The request for the probe comes after years of accusation from residents and activists that the Police Department has mistreated Latino immigrants, who make up the vast majority of the 30,000 residents.

The council called for the probe late Wednesday at the urging of Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, who in a letter to the council called the growing catalog of alleged misdeeds deeply concerning.

One of the allegations the attorney general would examine is that the Police Department enforced a policy of afternoon sobriety checks that was actually designed to nab unlicensed illegal immigrants and generate money for the city.

Nearly 2,000 cars a year have been impounded from immigrants. Residents have also come forward with allegations that officers beat up people for no reason. Several woman claim that officers stalked and sexually abused them, while parents claim that their teenage daughter was groped by an officer, according to a document listing the allegations obtained by The Times.

Even top city and police officials admit there is a problem. "Do I feel some of the residents have valid points? Yes, I do," said Maywood Police Chief Richard Lyons.

Two officers have been suspended pending internal investigations, Lyons said, and other officers are under investigation. "There's a handful of renegade cops out there we need to build cases on," said Councilman Sam Pena.

Maywood garnered national headlines last year when a new pro-immigration council majority was elected and declared the city a "sanctuary" for illegal immigrants.

That issue has polarized the city. Felipe Aguirre, the councilman who pushed for the sanctuary movement, was later the target of death threats by City Clerk Hector Duarte, who opposed the new direction of the city. Duarte pleaded guilty to the death threat allegation.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Settles Iowa Consumer Antitrust Lawsuit (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Bob Van Voris

Bloomberg, February 15, 2007

Feb. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Microsoft Corp., the world's biggest software maker, reached an undisclosed settlement in a lawsuit claiming it used its monopoly position to overcharge Iowa consumers for software products including Windows and Word.

Microsoft reached the deal with a statewide class of consumers who had purchased Microsoft products since 1994. The plaintiffs claimed the company violated Iowa antitrust law to charge inflated prices by taking advantage of its monopolies in personal computer operating systems and software applications.

``I think everyone in the courtroom is a little stunned," Roxanne Conlin, a lawyer for the consumers, told an Iowa state judge and jurors today in Des Moines after announcing the accord.

The settlement, which must be approved by the judge, ends a trial that began in December and resolves one of the last private antitrust cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. The Iowa customers claimed $329 million in damages, which could have been tripled under Iowa law.

Judge Scott Rosenberg ordered both sides to keep details of the settlement secret until they file papers formally asking him to grant initial approval of the settlement, expected in April. Similar cases that settled have provided class members with vouchers for discounted software.

Last of Dozens

The case, and a similar suit in Mississippi, are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers following an antitrust case against Microsoft filed by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998.

Microsoft, based in Redmond, Washington, claimed it didn't limit competition and said the company is successful because it offers high-quality software at low prices.

``We're happy to have this matter behind us so we can focus on the future," Rich Wallis, a Microsoft associate general counsel, said in a joint statement issued by the parties.

The case settled during the consumers' part of the six-month trial, before Microsoft would present its defense. The company's lawyers said they had planned to call as witnesses Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates and Chief Executive Officer Steve Ballmer. Conlin showed jurors a tape of Gates's testimony in the Department of Justice case.

After they were excused from the courtroom today, members of the 11-member jury could be heard whooping and cheering in the jury room.

`Digital Divide'

In an interview after the proceeding, Conlin said the settlement includes a program to ``close the digital divide" by ensuring that every Iowa student graduates high school with necessary computer skills. She declined to say how much the program will cost, citing the judge's order. Conlin said serious settlement talks began on Feb. 11 and a deal was reached by 6 p.m. yesterday.

During the trial, many internal Microsoft documents were made public for the first time.

In a 2004 e-mail to Gates and Ballmer disclosed during the trial, Windows chief Jim Allchin said ``we have lost our way" and ``I would buy a Mac today if I was not working at Microsoft."

In another e-mail, a Microsoft executive said he wanted to ``whack" computer maker Dell Inc. over its relationship with Linux software distributor Red Hat Inc., the same week in 2002 a federal judge ordered the company not to retaliate against competitors.

Class Action

The Iowa case was filed in 2000 by Joe Comes, a Des Moines businessman. It was certified in 2003 as a class action, or group lawsuit, on behalf of indirect purchasers of Microsoft software from May 1994 to June 2006. The consumers, including individuals and businesses, bought computers loaded with Microsoft software, or purchased the software from sources other than the company.

Conlin claimed that Microsoft's monopoly allowed it to raise the price of Windows by an average of $42.49, and $10.55 for Word.

In addition to settling the lawsuit by the U.S. government, Microsoft has reached accords in antitrust cases in 18 states and the District of Columbia, it said in a Jan. 25 filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

Under those settlements, consumers get vouchers for rebates on computers and software. The value of the deals depends on how many vouchers are redeemed. Microsoft estimates the total cost will be from $1.5 billion to $1.8 billion.

In 2004, Microsoft settled a Minnesota case during trial, the only other private antitrust suit against it that went to a jury.

Monopoly Power

Shares of Microsoft rose 37 cents to $29.40 in Nasdaq Stock Market trading. They have risen 11 percent in the past 12 months.

Before the trial, Rosenberg adopted many of the findings from the Justice Department trial, including the conclusion that Microsoft held illegal monopoly power in the market for Intel Corp.-compatible personal computer operating systems before June 1999.

Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs almost 95 percent of the world's personal computers, released its new Windows Vista operating system in stores Jan. 30.

Microsoft Settles Iowa Antitrust Case (AP)

By David Pitt, Ap Business Writer

Microsoft Corp. on Wednesday settled a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of thousands of Iowans who bought the company's programs between 1994 and 2006. Terms of the deal were not immediately disclosed.

The lawsuit sought more than $330 million from Microsoft for allegedly engaging in monopolistic and anticompetitive conduct that caused customers to pay more for software than they would have if there had been competition.

On Wednesday, Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg ordered attorneys to refrain from disclosing details of the settlement until April.

"The court will be advised of the terms of the settlement in April and there will be a hearing on April 20 for preliminary approval and if all goes as scheduled there will be a hearing for final approval on Aug. 31," said Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis.

The world's largest software maker has faced 206 class-action lawsuits across the United States since 2000. The company said 108 were consolidated in a federal antitrust case and 96 remained in state courts.

Most were dismissed or settled before trial.

Only two, the Iowa case and one in Minnesota, went to trial. The Minnesota case was settled after about two months into the trial.

Attorneys Roxanne Conlin and Rich Hagstrom filed the Iowa lawsuit in 2000.

"It was a mutual decision to settle and you kind of have to see the cards lay down. That's part of what happens for both sides," Conlin said. "You have to assess your risk and you have to assess what's in the best interest of your clients."

Both sides agreed the settlement will include making money available to buy computers and software for Iowa schools.

"We're going to take half of the unclaimed amount and use that to close the digital divide in Iowa," Conlin said.

Conlin would not say whether the settlement would take the form of cash or vouchers for computer equipment. Previously, she said she would refuse to accept vouchers.

In the Minnesota case, the lawyers sought more than $300 million from the company. During trial, the case settled for $174.5 million. Lawyer fees were about $59.4 million, according to court documents. The six plaintiffs who brought the case forward received $5,000 each

Time To Face The Music On File Sharing (WP)

By Rob Pegoraro

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Customers might not like the idea of technology that allows some uses of music (like copying iTunes downloads to their iPods) but forbids others (like copying the same song to another kind of music player). But until recently, it didn't seem to bother the executives behind these anti-piracy systems.

They all agreed that anybody selling downloadable music and movies needed to police what customers did with their purchases.

Last week, however, the person responsible for the most successful copy-control software in the music market, Apple chief executive Steve Jobs, ruffled feathers with the question: Do we need any of this in the first place?

In an essay called "Thoughts on Digital Music" on Apple's site, Jobs wrote that his company's iTunes Store used copy-control software called FairPlay only because major record labels insisted on it. Those same labels' demands made it impossible for Apple to share its technology, he said. So his proposed solution to the "this download will only play on my iPod" problem is to abolish copy-control software altogether.

Since that remarkably blunt piece of writing hit the Web, the debate over whether technology can curb illegal file sharing has come back to life. That's good. But in the process, a lot of old myths are resurfacing -- and believing them will stop you from understand the deeper problems with the digital-media market. The myths include:

Â· "Apple can't share FairPlay with other companies, because the technology could get leaked and eventually prompt the labels to pull their catalogues from the iTunes store."

That's not necessarily so.

You can't completely dismiss Apple's contention; only Apple knows the fine print of its deals with the record labels. We don't. But the simple way Apple's copy-control system works should make it relatively easy for outsiders to join the FairPlay game.

FairPlay assigns the police work to the iTunes program on your Mac or PC, not the iPod. As a result, you can plug a friend's iPod into your computer and copy your iTunes purchases to it, even if that iPod is already loaded with your pal's iTunes downloads.

Plus, Apple has already taken a baby step toward putting FairPlay in other companies' hardware, in the form of Motorola cellphones that include a miniaturized version of iTunes. If the iTunes Store survived that experiment, it should be able to live through the addition of FairPlay compatibility to other playback-only devices, such as handheld organizers or car stereos.

It would be different if Apple were to let somebody design a competitor to iTunes. A lot more would be at stake in that case.

That depends on how you define "solved."

Microsoft can point to dozens of PlaysForSure devices from various companies, not including its own incompatible Zune. Even users of Palm organizers and smartphones can join the fun, by using NormSoft's Pocket Tunes. But when it comes to anything more complex than a handheld gadget, Microsoft takes a different stance.

Although the company allows other people to develop Window Media-compatible programs for other operating systems, such as Telestream's Flip4Mac for Mac OS X, it won't let them add PlaysForSure support.

When asked why PlaysForSure should be confined to Windows, Microsoft says it would be too difficult to keep that software secure on another operating system. That's almost the same excuse Jobs used in his online essay, except that Apple still managed to ship a Windows version of iTunes.

Either Microsoft needs to upgrade its understanding of competing operating systems, or it should admit that promoting Windows outweighs living up to its own talking points.

Â· "This is the price we have to pay to stop illegal file sharing."

Just try to prove that.

First, as Jobs noted in his essay, the vast majority of music sold today comes on audio CDs that impose no copying restrictions. DVDs include copying controls, but they were breached years ago.

Even if you abolished these old formats in favor of media locked up with technologies like FairPlay or PlaysForSure, you'd still have no bar to music file sharing. Both Apple and Microsoft's systems allow buyers of a song to burn it to an audio CD that can then be copied back to a computer in an unrestricted format.

The side effect: It only took a few minutes with a file-sharing program to find MP3 copies of songs sold only on iTunes. And even without the audio-CD workaround, hackers have repeatedly dismantled the defenses of FairPlay and PlaysForSure.

Either way, all you need is one unprotected copy loose in the wild; that copy can then be duplicated endlessly. And no existing anti-piracy system can stop people from downloading and playing those copies.

The technology can still serve a role in online music or movie rental services, which have drawn far fewer customers than stores like iTunes, but for purchases it does too little to justify its costs. In practice, it only stops copying by the unmotivated, the over-scheduled or the inexperienced -- the people most likely to buy a song or movie online as long as they can do so quickly, easily and cheaply.

In the music industry, a growing number of outlets beyond the big-name companies, from tiny indie-rock operations to the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Smithsonian Institution's Folkways label, have realized the futility of copy-restriction software and now sell digital downloads in open, unrestricted formats.

At this point, this all amounts to little more than expensive psychotherapy for Hollywood executives. It's the height of arrogance for them to keep sending us the bill.

Justice Official Bought Vacation Home With Oil Lobbyist (WP)

By Susan Schmidt And James V. Grimaldi

Washington Post, February 15, 2007

A senior Justice Department official who recently resigned her post bought a nearly $1 million vacation home with a lobbyist for ConocoPhillips months before approving consent decrees that would give the oil company more time to pay millions of dollars in fines and meet pollution-cleanup rules at some of its refineries.

Sue Ellen Wooldridge, former assistant attorney general in charge of environment and natural resources, bought a $980,000 home on Kiawah Island, S.C., last March with ConocoPhillips lobbyist Don R. Duncan. A third owner of the house is J. Steven Griles, a former deputy interior secretary, who has been informed he is a target in the federal investigation of Jack Abramoff's lobbying activities.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department said yesterday that Wooldridge sought and received approval from a career ethics official in her office before buying the vacation property. Wooldridge's lawyer and officials at ConocoPhillips said that Duncan had no role in negotiating the consent decrees and never lobbied Wooldridge.

Wooldridge, who earlier served in senior positions at the Interior Department, lives with Griles in Virginia. Her investment with Griles and the oil lobbyist took place on March 13, 2006, property records show, during a wide-ranging Justice Department criminal investigation that involves Griles and lobbyists at Interior. The joint purchase and Wooldridge's role in the consent decrees were reported yesterday by the Associated Press.

Stephen Grafman, an attorney for Wooldridge, said his client owns a 25 percent share of the vacation property. "She used her own money," Grafman said. He said that Wooldridge was called in November before a grand jury investigating Abramoff and Griles but that she is not under investigation.

In November 2006, ConocoPhillips reached proposed consent decrees with the federal government and four states that would modify an agreement the company had reached with the Environmental Protection Agency in 2005 to settle charges it was violating the Clean Air Act. The proposed changes, which must be approved by a federal judge overseeing the case, would give the company more time to install equipment and processes that would cost an estimated $525 million to cut emissions at some refineries.

Wooldridge, as head of the Justice Department's environmental division, signed the agreements on behalf of the federal government.

In lobbying disclosure forms filed last year, Duncan -- ConocoPhillips's vice president for federal and international affairs -- said he lobbied Congress on revisions to the Clean Air Act. He did not report lobbying the Justice Department or other federal agencies.

Duncan "was not involved at all" in the consent decrees, said ConocoPhillips spokeswoman Kristi Desjarlaif, who said the negotiations were handled by company lawyers. Nevertheless, Duncan sought approval from the company's legal division last year when he sought to invest with Griles and Wooldridge. "Our legal division said she needed to get clearance from DOJ ethics officials," said Desjarlaif, something she said Wooldridge was already pursuing.

Wooldridge submitted her resignation from Justice last month, three days after Griles's lawyer was informed by the department's criminal division that Griles faces potential criminal charges in connection with his dealings with Abramoff. A Justice spokeswoman has said that Wooldridge returned to the private sector and that her departure was voluntary.

Wooldridge and Griles "do own a small condo together," said Griles's attorney, Barry M. Hartman. Of the South Carolina property, he said: "This is a shared investment among people who have been close personal friends for years. What exactly is wrong with three close personal friends sharing a vacation/rental home?"

Griles, who resigned his deputy's job in 2005 and now is a mining and energy lobbyist, was a lightning rod for criticism during his four years at Interior. Sources close to the federal probe have said he is being investigated for making possibly false statements about a job offer from Abramoff, who lobbied Interior heavily on behalf of Indian tribal clients with casinos.

Griles was harshly criticized in a 2004 report from Interior's inspector general for maintaining ties to lobbying clients who had business before the department. Inspector General Earl E. Devaney found that Griles had used his official position in dealings with clients of his former firm even as he continued to receive payments from the firm amounting to more than $1 million. His report did not draw conclusions about whether Griles broke any law or ethics rules. The Office of Government Ethics, in reviewing the findings, said that, with two possible exceptions, Griles did not violate ethics rules.

Wooldridge, who was deputy chief of staff to the interior secretary and later became solicitor at Interior, provided ethics advice to Griles and advised then-Secretary Gale A. Norton on how she should handle the inspector general's allegations. She did not tell the inspector general of her personal relationship with Griles, according to sources familiar with the investigation. About August 2002, according to the inspector general's report, Wooldridge replaced Griles's special assistant as his ethics screener, a role in which she helped him determine when he should recuse himself from matters that posed a conflict of interest. After Griles's departure from Interior, Wooldridge disclosed to investigators in the Abramoff probe that she and Griles began dating in February 2003, sources familiar with the probe said.

Wooldridge and Griles both filed amended financial disclosure reports late last year that reported thousands of dollars in gifts and trips they gave one another in 2003. During that time and afterward, Wooldridge was contacting investigators, answering questions and writing a memorandum defending Griles's activities as deputy at Interior.

The memo, dated Feb. 8, 2004, concerned Griles involvement with a bid by some former clients to gain concessions to extract coal-bed methane in the Powder River basin of Wyoming and Montana. Griles had contacted EPA officials to urge that a dispute over an environmental study not delay the project.

In the memo, Wooldridge argued to the inspector general and to the Office of Government Ethics that Griles's actions were not a violation because they were not a "particular matter involving specific parties."

Norton took no action against Griles at the time of the inspector general's report and declared that he had been "cleared" of any wrongdoing.

Norton's handling of the matter angered members of Congress, including Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who had initiated one aspect of the investigation. Lieberman said the report had painted a "disturbing picture of repeated questionable conduct."

Lobbyist, Fed Lawyer Share Vacation Home (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin, The Associated Press

WASHINGTON -- Nine months before agreeing to let ConocoPhillips delay a half-billion-dollar pollution cleanup, the government's top environmental prosecutor bought a $1 million vacation home with the company's top lobbyist.

Also in on the Kiawah Island, S.C., house deal was former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles, the highest-ranking Bush administration official targeted for criminal prosecution in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe.

Just before resigning last month, Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge signed two proposed consent decrees with ConocoPhillips: one giving the company as much as two to three more years to install $525 million in pollution controls at nine refineries and the other dealing with a Superfund toxic waste cleanup.

Last April, Wooldridge, ConocoPhillips Vice President Donald R. Duncan and Griles had gone together on a $980,000 home in a gated community at Kiawah Island. Records from the Charleston County Auditor's office obtained by The Associated Press list Duncan as a 50 percent owner of the home and Wooldridge and Griles as 25 percent owners.

The deed is filed under Duncan's name, but the mailing address for the South Carolina property _ tucked among pines, palmettos, a pool, golf course and tennis club several hundred yards from the beach _ is Griles' home in Virginia. He and Wooldridge jointly own a condo there.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee said Wednesday night it will open an inquiry and request documents into the real estate transaction and consent agreements.

"There appears to be a breakdown of ethics at the Justice Department, said the committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. "Senior Justice Department officials should not be handling cases that affect their close friends and investment partners."

ConocoPhillips said in a statement Wednesday night that Duncan had no involvement in negotiating the consent agreements.

"We object to the suggestion that the real estate transaction involving Don Duncan, which was cleared in advance by the ethics office of the Department of Justice, had any impact whatsoever on the consent decrees entered into by ConocoPhillips or the recent SEC filing amending ConocoPhillips code of ethics," company officials said. "Any savings resulting from these delays are expected to be offset by the cost of additional and stricter controls agreed to in the amended agreement."

Griles, now an oil and gas lobbyist, began dating Wooldridge while he was her boss at Interior. He was the department's No. 2 official from July 2001 to January 2005, behind only former Secretary Gale Norton. He and Duncan, a ConocoPhillips vice president who runs the company's Washington office, both served on President Bush's presidential transition team, Griles for the Interior Department, Duncan for the Energy Department.

Duncan has played a major role in getting the Bush administration's backing for a proposed $25 billion natural gas pipeline reaching from Alaska to Midwest markets.

Wooldridge and Griles have known each other at least since the first year of the Bush administration in 2001, when Wooldridge became deputy chief of staff and counselor to then-Secretary Norton. Bush used a recess appointment to make Wooldridge the department's solicitor _ its top lawyer _ in June 2004.

After she became solicitor, Wooldridge told the department's ethics office she and Griles had begun dating, an Interior spokesman said.

From 2001 through 2004 Duncan was lobbying the department on a wide range of issues. The topics, according to his lobbying records on file with the government, included oil leases in the eastern Gulf of Mexico, coal-bed methane in the San Juan Basin of New Mexico and the Powder River Basin in Wyoming, and permits for the proposed Alaska natural gas pipeline.

After Griles resigned from Interior, Bush appointed Wooldridge to head the Justice Department's 600-employee environment division, representing virtually every federal agency on cases related to pollution, natural resources, wildlife, some Indian issues and land condemnation. She began work at Justice in November 2005. The division is now handling about 6,800 cases nationwide.

Griles, meanwhile, had signed up as lobbying clients the American Petroleum Institute, Newmont Mining Corp. and other energy and mining clients with a broad range of legal and financial interests before the government.

As for the vacation home, Stephen W. Grafman, Wooldridge's attorney, said she paid for her share and was told by the Justice Department's ethics office a month before the sale went through "that the purchase was not a problem."

"There was no need to recuse herself from ConocoPhillips since she was advised by the appropriate ethics officials that there was not a conflict," Grafman said. "Mr. Duncan invested in the property as an individual and friend. He has no business before the environment division. He never lobbied Ms Wooldridge on an issue on behalf of himself. In point of fact, he never lobbied her on behalf of ConocoPhillips."

A Justice Department spokeswoman, Cynthia Magnuson, confirmed that Wooldridge "sought the advice of ethics officials who informed her that the purchase did not raise ethical issues."

Magnuson said the consent decrees with ConocoPhillips "were approved through the normal management channels and were presented to Sue Ellen with the unanimous recommendations of her career staff as well as those of the EPA."

Griles' lawyer, Barry M. Hartman, called the home "a shared investment among people who have been close personal friends for years. What exactly is wrong with three close personal friends sharing a vacation/rental home?"

Wooldridge submitted her resignation letter to the Justice Department on Jan. 8, three days after other prosecutors in the department met with Griles to outline criminal charges they are seeking against him. She said in the letter she wanted to return to work in the private sector.

The federal task force heading the Abramoff corruption probe also has become interested in Wooldridge and her connections to Griles, people familiar with the investigation said on condition of anonymity, citing the issue's sensitivity.

Paul Light, a professor at New York University's Wagner School of Public Service and an expert on presidential appointees, said Wooldridge's participation in the Kiawah Island partnership and the ConocoPhillips settlement "creates the impression of favoritism, or favors due."

"From an appearance standpoint it's awful, and from a legal standpoint it's questionable," Light said Wednesday. "Political appointees have been indicted for less."

Wooldridge's last day at Justice was Jan. 19. All of the other parties to the ConocoPhillips agreement _ four states, the Environmental Protection Agency, a local pollution control agency in Washington state, and the company _ signed it in November.

Wooldridge's signature is not dated, but the document with it as well as the other signatures weren't submitted to the U.S. District Court in Houston, where ConocoPhillips is headquartered, until Jan. 11. It was published in the Federal Register on Jan. 25, triggering a 30-day public comment period before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake can decide whether to approve or reject it.

One of the proposed agreements would change the terms of a major air pollution settlement announced with fanfare in 2005 by Wooldridge's predecessor at the Justice Department, Thomas Sansonetti. In addition to installing a half-billion dollars in new pollution controls, ConocoPhillips agreed to pay a $4.5 million fine to settle charges of Clean Air Act violations.

The new agreement Wooldridge signed delays many of the deadlines the government had imposed on the company _ some by two to three years _ for cutting emissions of chemicals from its refineries that cause smog and soot. It also postponed by more than a year some potential penalties and pollution reporting requirements. The agreement cited damage to a refinery in Belle Chasse, La., from Hurricane Katrina as justification for some of the delays. EPA referred all comment to the Justice Department.

Wooldridge did not list her purchase of the South Carolina resort community home with Griles and ConocoPhillips' Duncan in a financial disclosure report she submitted a month after the real estate deal. That report covered calendar 2005 and Wooldridge resigned before having to submit a financial disclosure report covering 2006.

The other refineries covered in the consent decree are in the Los Angeles and San Francisco areas in California, Roxana, Ill., Linden, N.J., Trainer, Pa., Borger and Old Ocean, Texas, and Ferndale, Wash.

Wooldridge also put her undated signature on a proposed consent decree filed in January involving ConocoPhillips and a Superfund toxic waste site. The agreement calls for nearly 100 companies to pay $500,000 in damages and up to $10 million to clean up an 8-acre former solvent recycling facility in Elkton, Md., that closed in 1988.

Separately, Justice Department prosecutors notified Griles by letter last month that he faces possible criminal charges of lying to Congress and fraud under a 1988 law that says citizens are entitled to "honest services" from public officials.

The charges involve questions about whether Griles passed on information from Abramoff to other Interior officials and falsely testified in 2005 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee about Abramoff's attempts to hire him away from Interior. Abramoff is serving about six years in prison for a fraudulent deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida and awaits sentencing in Washington after pleading guilty to corrupting government officials and their staff members with bribes.

Duncan had no comment.

On Monday, ConocoPhillips notified the Securities and Exchange Commission of changes in its bylaws and ethics code. The company reiterated its policy that the "promise, offer or delivery to an official or employee of the U.S. government of a gift, favor or other gratuity in violation of these rules would not only violate company policy but could also be a criminal offense."

Ex-Official Is Not Target Of Abramoff Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — The government's former top environmental prosecutor has been told by Justice Department officials that she does not face charges in the corruption investigation centered on the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, her lawyer said Wednesday.

The former prosecutor, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, stepped down last month as an assistant attorney general and head of the department's environment and natural resources division.

Her lawyer, Stephen W. Grafman, said Ms. Wooldridge had cooperated fully in the investigation of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation and ties to lawmakers and senior officials in the Bush administration. Among the officials was J. Steven Griles, the former No. 2 official in the Interior Department, with whom Ms. Wooldridge has had a romantic relationship.

"We have been advised by Justice Department officials on several occasions that she is not now, nor has ever been, a target of the grand jury," Mr. Grafman said in an interview, responding to what he said were false news reports suggesting that Ms. Wooldridge was under scrutiny in a criminal matter.

Mr. Griles was notified by the Justice Department last month that he was probably going to be indicted on charges that he had lied to federal investigators about his relationship with Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff's records show he repeatedly sought Mr. Griles's help at the Interior Department.

The Associated Press reported Wednesday that Ms. Wooldridge, Mr. Griles and a lobbyist for the oil company ConocoPhillips had jointly bought a $980,000 vacation home in South Carolina last year, about nine months before Ms. Wooldridge signed two major consent decrees that allowed ConocoPhillips to delay environmental cleanup projects.

Cynthia J. Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said that Ms. Wooldridge's purchase of the home with the lobbyist had been cleared last year by the department's ethics office, and that she had not been barred from contacts with ConocoPhillips.

Ms. Magnuson said that Ms. Wooldridge had signed the consent decrees after they had been recommended to her unanimously by career officials at the Justice Department and by the Environmental Projection Agency.

Ms. Magnuson said she could not comment on the status of the criminal investigation.

Mr. Griles, who left the Interior Department to return to a career as a corporate lobbyist, has denied wrongdoing and insisted that he did no special favors for Mr. Abramoff. A spokesman for ConocoPhillips declined to comment on Wednesday.

Mr. Abramoff entered prison last year after pleading guilty to conspiring to corrupt public officials.

Climate Change's Cold Economics (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball

Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

With mandatory curbs on U.S. global-warming emissions looking increasingly likely in the next several years, industries are starting to argue over who will pay for the cleanup. One thing is clear: Whatever the cost, it will get passed along to consumers.

A new report from the utility industry's think tank, the Electric Power Research Institute, says the U.S. utility sector could ratchet back its global-warming emissions to 1990 levels by 2030. That would be a major feat, given that emissions are projected to rise significantly over the next few decades.

But Congress is unlikely to boost taxpayer-funded energy research by enough to develop the necessary technologies, says Jeffry Sterba, chairman of the institute, who is expected to present the study today at an energy-industry conference. One option he said utilities are considering proposing: that the government allow them to tack an additional modest charge onto consumers' electric bills to raise roughly $2 billion a year to cover the cost.

As the Democrats who now control Congress start pushing for federal global-warming regulations, industry heavyweights are changing their stance on the issue. Exxon Mobil Corp., which has long opposed emission constraints, now is talking about how such rules should be structured. And the Edison Electric Institute, the electric-utility industry's chief trade group, announced last week that it is dropping its longstanding opposition to mandatory emission limits.

The corporate change is a concession to political reality. Even if they would prefer not to have an emissions limit, industries targeted by regulators are angling to shape whatever they get slapped with to minimize their portion of the bill.

The Electric Power Research Institute's study estimates some of the potential costs of an effort to curb U.S. global-warming emissions and puts a lengthy timeline on the task. It reflects a message likely to be heard increasingly from heavily emitting industries: They are confident they will be able to develop technologies to reduce global-warming emissions, if politicians, consumers and certain other industries are willing to foot the bill.

That "if" shows how the global-warming debate is moving beyond political rhetoric to questions of economic reality.

Achieving that emissions cut in the power industry -- the nation's biggest source of global-warming emissions -- would require aggressively rolling out a broad array of technologies, some of which aren't yet economically proven, the study says. Among those technologies: energy-efficiency improvements, for instance in buildings and appliances, to slow the projected growth in electricity demand; increases in the penetration of renewable and nuclear power; higher-efficiency coal-fired power plants; and capturing the carbon dioxide emitted from power plants and storing the global-warming gas underground.

Developing the necessary technologies so they could be widely deployed will require roughly $2 billion more in annual low-carbon-energy research spending in the U.S., the EPRI says. That's money beyond the approximately $3 billion the institute says the federal government currently invests each year in that area.

The power industry could raise the roughly $2 billion a year for new clean-energy research by increasing the average U.S. electric customer's rate by 0.05 cent a kilowatt hour, said Mr. Sterba, who stressed the utility industry hasn't yet proposed such a fee. That would increase the average American's monthly electric bill about 0.5%, to $89.07 from $88.60, according to government data.

EPRI officials believe the $2 billion collected would advance the technologies to a point where they are economically competitive with conventional technologies. The expectation is that private investors then would be willing to finance deployment of the technologies, because then they could earn an attractive profit, the officials said.

Mr. Sterba, the chairman and chief executive of PNM Resources, a New Mexico utility, says the study suggests that the cost of addressing global warming is significant but not insurmountable. "I'm concerned we may be being a little bit naive" about the likely costs, he said. "At the same time, I think there are people who may be being a bit too gloom-and-doom."

The study also marks an attempt by the utility industry to deflect regulators' attention to other sectors of the economy that utilities argue are ripe for emission cuts themselves. Utilities will need decades to develop technologies to significantly cut their emissions, Mr. Sterba said, but other industries capable of reducing their emissions more quickly and cheaply should be asked to do their share.

Among the technologies the study proposes to bring 2030 emissions back down to 1990 levels, for instance, is the widespread sale of so-called "plug-in" hybrid vehicles. Plug-in hybrids would get even better fuel economy than today's gasoline-and-electric hybrid cars because they would get more of their power from their electrical system, requiring the cars to be plugged into electrical outlets to be recharged. But deploying plug-in hybrids widely would require big shifts by auto makers.

In addition, taking steps to preserve more trees and inducing farmers to change the way they till their land would be lower-cost and quicker ways to begin reducing emissions than relying solely on the utility sector for the bulk of the cuts, Mr. Sterba said. Trees and soil absorb carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas.

Other studies are coming to similar conclusions. A new report by consultant McKinsey & Co. argues that the least-expensive options to curb global-warming emissions are some of the most basic: improving the energy efficiency of buildings, air conditioners and lights, for instance, and planting more trees. Such moves will be cheaper than some higher-technology methods, such as capturing the CO2 that is emitted from power plants and then burying that CO2 underground, McKinsey says.

The cheaper options do present a political hurdle, the McKinsey report notes. They involve "billions of small emitters -- often consumers -- rather than a limited number of big companies already subject to heavy regulation."

Oil Company To Pay $200 Million In Toxic Dumping In Ivory Coast (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen And Marlise Simons

New York Times, February 15, 2007

CONAKRY, Guinea, Feb. 14 — An oil trading company based in the Netherlands has agreed to pay almost $200 million to the government of Ivory Coast to settle claims that it illegally dumped toxic petrochemical waste in Abidjan last August.

The company, Trafigura, said the payment was not an admission of fault by any party. It said the money would help pay for a new waste disposal plant, a new hospital and an audit to determine the cause and effects of the dumping.

At least 10 people died and thousands more were sickened in Abidjan after hundreds of tons of toxic sludge, pumped from the hold of a ship named the Probo Koala, was dumped at more than a dozen sites, some of them densely populated.

About 100,000 people sought medical treatment, swamping the country's health care system, and public outrage at the suspicion that corrupt government officials had allowed the dumping led to the resignation of the entire cabinet, though much of it was later reinstated.

In announcing the settlement on Tuesday, Trafigura said in a prepared statement that three of its employees, who had been held since September, had been released.

Trafigura had leased the Probo Koala, a Greek-owned tanker flying a Panamanian flag, to transport petrochemical products. It arrived in Amsterdam on July 2, on its way to Estonia, to unload what the company said was 250 tons of "regular slops," wash water from a ship's holds, which is normally laced with oil, gas, caustic soda or other chemicals.

But when Amsterdam port workers began pumping out the tanker, they noticed that the liquid was thicker than normal and smelled foul; they refused to finish the job for the agreed-upon price, about $15,000, telling the company that safe disposal in Europe would cost about $300,000. (Trafigura said that with the extra cost of the delays, the amount could have been twice that.)

The waste was eventually shipped to West Africa, where it was dumped by an Ivorian company called Tommy for $20,000. An inquiry by the Ivorian government later said that the company might have been created just to dump the waste, and that it had "neither the qualifications, the competence or the technical ability to treat this waste."

President Laurent Gbagbo of Ivory Coast described the settlement as a "a good agreement that will allow the state to compensate the victims," according to The Associated Press.

But environmental activists said the incident highlighted how toxic waste often ended up on the doorstep of the world's poorest people.

Greenpeace called the deal premature and inadequate. "It does not do justice to the facts because the full liability and the damages have yet to be assessed," said Helen Perivier, a spokeswoman for Greenpeace International. She said she feared the government might absolve Trafigura of liability for the waste transport. The incident prompted a number of other investigations. A class action suit on behalf of thousands of victims is before a British court. In the Netherlands, a criminal investigation into the ship's moves while in Amsterdam's port is in progress, a spokesman for the Dutch government said. And there is a criminal investigation under way in Estonia, where the ship loaded cargo and left unhindered.

Achim Steiner, director of the United Nations Environment Program, told reporters on Wednesday that the incident had drawn attention to what he called "a whole unregulated and often illegal trade in toxic hazardous waste. This is not just some minor problem."

Effects Of Genetically Engineered Alfalfa Cultivate A Debate (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, February 15, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — The government was premature in deregulating production of alfalfa that is genetically engineered to resist a weed-killing herbicide, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture should not have acted as it did in 2005 without assessing the environmental effect of crops genetically modified to resist the herbicide Roundup, ruled U.S. District Court Judge Charles Breyer of the Northern District of California. The suit against the USDA was filed by the anti-biotech Center for Food Safety, the Sierra Club and organic alfalfa (hay) farmers. It accused the USDA of violating federal law by not requiring the environmental assessment.

Opponents of biotech crops, which are genetically engineered to have certain qualities, such as resistance to weed killers, have expressed concerns that they could interbreed with wild plants and create herbicide-resistant weeds.

Alfalfa is the nation's fourth-largest crop and is fed to farm animals, especially dairy cattle.

"There's potential for these crops to contaminate non-genetically engineered alfalfa," says Will Rostov, senior attorney for the Center for Food Safety. This is particularly a concern for organic farmers, because genetically engineered plants cannot be sold as organic.

The Roundup Ready alfalfa cited in the suit was developed and sold by Forge Genetics of Minnesota, using technology from Monsanto. It allows growers to spray fields with Monsanto's Roundup herbicide, in which the chemical glyphosate is the active ingredient, killing weeds without hurting the alfalfa.

Monsanto submitted a detailed environmental analysis of the alfalfa to USDA, says company spokesman Chris Horner. "Reading the ruling, it's unclear how much of that was taken into consideration." All weeds built up resistance to herbicides over time, he says.

Breyer ruled that both sides must sit down together and propose remedies to him by Feb. 26.

Rostov says his group plans to push for an injunction on the planting, sale and distribution of Roundup Ready alfalfa until the USDA has done an impact assessment.

Only about 197,600 acres of the 22 million acres of the alfalfa grown in the USA in 2006 was genetically engineered, according to the International Service for the Acquisition of Agri-Biotech Applications.

The USDA is "very committed to protecting the environment" and is evaluating the ruling, says spokeswoman Rachel Iadicicco.

However, even if the USDA does an environmental assessment, it's unclear that it would have any effect on whether or not Roundup Ready alfalfa can be sold.

The judge ruled that under the National Environmental Policy Act, the USDA must do an assessment if there was the potential for "a significant environmental impact."

But under the Plant Protection Act, the basis for USDA's regulatory authority, it can adopt regulations only to prevent the introduction and dissemination of plant pests.

"If they find that the only thing it does is cause organic farmers harm, that may be an environmental impact, but under the Plant Protection Act, it may not be something that (USDA) can take into consideration," says Greg Jaffe, director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest's biotechnology project.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Attorney To Plead Guilty To Leaking BALCO Testimony (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 14, 2007

A lawyer admitted in court documents Wednesday that he provided a Chronicle reporter with transcripts of confidential grand jury testimony by Barry Bonds and other athletes about steroid use, and federal authorities said they would drop their effort to send the reporter and a colleague to prison for 18 months for refusing to disclose their source.

The lawyer, Troy Ellerman, 44, who once represented the founder and another executive of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, agreed in court documents to plead guilty to four charges of disclosing the transcripts in violation of a judge's order. The plea agreement calls for a sentence of up to two years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

The agreement must be approved by a federal judge, and Ellerman can withdraw his admissions and go to trial if the judge rejects the two-year sentence or any of the other terms of the deal. No court date has been set.

Ellerman admitted allowing a Chronicle reporter, Mark Fainaru-Wada, to take verbatim notes of grand jury testimony by Bonds, fellow baseball players Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield, and sprinter Tim Montgomery in his Sacramento office in June and November 2004.

Articles in 2004 by Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams quoted Giambi and Montgomery as admitting they used performance-enhancing drugs. Bonds and Sheffield both testified they didn't knowingly take steroids, but the substances they described taking matched prosecutors' descriptions of steroids supplied by BALCO.

While he was secretly leaking the transcripts, Ellerman acknowledged Wednesday, he was publicly complaining to a federal judge about the leaks, and even filed a motion in October 2004 to dismiss charges against BALCO's founder, Victor Conte, arguing that the disclosures made a fair trial "practically impossible."

Based on those admissions, he agreed to plead guilty to obstruction of justice and making a false declaration, in addition to two counts of contempt of court for leaking the transcripts.

Once U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White accepts Ellerman's guilty plea, grand jury subpoenas to Fainaru-Wada and Williams will be withdrawn, the Justice Department said.

The subpoenas, received last May, demanded that the reporters identify the source or sources of the grand jury testimony, and that The Chronicle turn over any documents that might reveal the source.

When Fainaru-Wada and Williams refused to testify, White held them in contempt last September, saying a 1972 U.S. Supreme Court ruling had established that journalists have no special privilege to withhold evidence from a grand jury.

The judge ordered the reporters imprisoned for up to 18 months, unless they agreed to testify earlier, and also fined The Chronicle $1,000 a day for defying its subpoena.

The penalties have been suspended while the reporters and the newspaper appeal to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which had scheduled a hearing for March 7.

Their lawyers have argued that a 1996 Supreme Court ruling opened the door for federal judges to recognize a journalist's right to protect confidential sources when the value of the reporting to the public outweighed any harm caused by the leak.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-San Francisco, and several other congressional leaders have urged the Justice Department to withdraw the subpoenas and have expressed support for a federal "shield law" for journalists, similar to laws in effect in California and most other states.

Fainaru-Wada, Williams and The Chronicle all withheld comment on Ellerman. Eve Burton, a lawyer for the reporters and the newspaper, said, "As we have said throughout, we do not discuss issues involving confidential sources."

Ellerman's admission does not end the BALCO case, which has already resulted in guilty pleas from Conte and four other defendants, congressional hearings on steroids in sports, and a new steroid-testing policy for professional baseball.

The question that still looms over the case is whether a separate grand jury, convened last year, will indict Bonds for perjury in his 2003 testimony that he never knowingly took steroids. Bonds' former trainer, Greg Anderson, who pleaded guilty to drug distribution in the BALCO case, has been in prison since August for refusing to testify against Bonds.

Bonds' lawyer, Michael Rains, said Wednesday he thinks Fainaru-Wada and Williams should be prosecuted on charges of conspiring with Ellerman to disclose the grand jury transcripts.

"I think they're co-conspirators in a criminal enterprise with Troy Ellerman ... a deceitful attempt to undermine orders of a federal judge," said Rains, who unsuccessfully sued the reporters, the publisher of their book about BALCO, "Game of Shadows," and The Chronicle on similar grounds last year. "They bragged about getting these materials. They knew they were secret grand jury materials."

But a news media advocate was relieved.

"In a sense, the system worked," said Peter Scheer, executive director of the California First Amendment Coalition. "The reporters honored their promise of confidentiality to their source, which is both their right and their responsibility to the First Amendment." And ultimately, he said, the government uncovered the leaker on its own.

Another media advocate was uneasy, however, about the prosecution of Ellerman.

While the reporters deserve applause for not revealing their source, "someone who may be thinking about leaking information to the press may think twice if he knows he's going to go to jail," said Mark Feldstein, a journalism historian and associate professor of media and public affairs at George Washington University. That could keep important information from coming to light, he said.

Ellerman, of Woodland Park, Colo., represented Conte and BALCO vice president James Valente at different stages of the case. His name surfaced publicly in December when Yahoo.com quoted a former defense investigator, Larry McCormack, who was once fired from his job by Ellerman, as saying that the lawyer was the reporters' source.

Prosecutors said in a news release Wednesday that "a previously unknown witness" had approached the FBI last fall offering to help prove that Ellerman was the source.

On Dec. 13, prosecutors said, FBI agents confronted Ellerman at his home and he "made admissions that could be used to prove his guilt."

But nine days later, prosecutors filed a brief urging the appeals court to uphold the contempt-of-court orders against the two reporters and send them to prison. In an apparent reference to Ellerman, prosecutors said they were also submitting sealed documents to the court with new information about their efforts to identify the reporters' sources.

Ellerman's lawyer contacted the U.S. attorney's office about three weeks ago and said his client was prepared to admit disclosing the grand jury testimony, leading to negotiations that produced Wednesday's plea agreement, prosecutors said.

The development comes amid other controversies about reporters and sources.

In Washington, D.C., the trial of former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on charges of lying about disclosing a CIA agent's name to the press, has included testimony from a series of reporters, including Judith Miller of the New York Times, who spent 85 days in prison until she got permission to identify Libby as her source.

In San Francisco, blogger Josh Wolf has spent nearly six months in prison -- the longest incarceration of a journalist in U.S. history -- for refusing to surrender a videotape of a July 2005 anarchist protest to federal authorities.

Balco Source Confesses, Likely Sparing Reporters From Prison Terms (MERCN)

By Karen De Sá

The San Jose Mercury News, February 15, 2007

A defense attorney Wednesday agreed to plead guilty to leaking secret grand jury testimony in the Balco steroids probe to the media, likely sparing two San Francisco Chronicle reporters from an 18-month prison term for refusing to disclose their source's name. The reporters had used the leaked testimony to expose alleged steroid use among big-name athletes, including baseball players Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi.

According to an agreement filed in San Francisco's U.S. District Court, Troy Ellerman, 44, who counseled two key figures in the steroids probe, will plead guilty to the 2004 leak, as well as lying about it, obstructing justice and disobeying a court order not to disclose grand jury information. The agreement freed the reporters -- awaiting an appeal of their case -- from having to serve time on contempt of court charges. The subpoenas seeking to force the reporters to reveal their source will be withdrawn once the plea is formally entered, a Justice Department spokesman said.

Federal prosecutors, searching for the source of the leaks, early on set their sights on Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, who wrote in December 2004 that Bonds testified he might have unwittingly used steroid-laced substances. Bonds later denied using steroids, claiming he thought the substances were flaxseed oil and a legal ointment.

Williams said Wednesday that he had dashed out of the office early to pick up Valentine's Day flowers for his wife when a television reporter called with the news. He's reluctant to get too exuberant, he said, until the agreement is approved.

``If we're not going to jail, of course that's great," Williams said. ``But it will take a little while to sort that out."

The case of the two threatened reporters had taken on broader significance as yet another example of the federal government using tough tactics to coax reporters into spilling their sources amid high-profile investigations. Journalists must often promise sources confidentiality in order to get critical information to the public -- especially when the stakes are high.

Peter Scheer, executive director of the California First Amendment Coalition, praised the recent development in the Balco case but noted that Wednesday's agreement does not mean the larger issue has been resolved. With the ``Scooter" Libby CIA leak trial ongoing and the pending case against freelance journalist Josh Wolf -- now in a Dublin jail for refusing to turn over videotape of a 2005 political protest in San Francisco -- reporting freedom remains in jeopardy, he said.

``There's tension between the press and the government. The government tries to keep secrets, and the press tries to get those secrets and report on them," Scheer said. ``The Balco case is one example, but better examples very recently include warrantless wiretapping by the National Security Agency or the CIA's extraordinary rendition program in Europe and elsewhere."

The steroid scandal involving the Bay Area laboratory not only raised fundamental issues of press freedom, but it also tarnished the reputations of adored athletes, from Bonds and Giambi to sprinter Tim Montgomery -- once billed as the world's fastest man.

But now it's Ellerman -- a former rodeo cowboy and the commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association -- who is in the spotlight. His expected guilty pleas to four charges of disclosing confidential transcripts in violation of a federal judge's order calls for a prison sentence of up to two years and a $250,000 fine.

Ellerman met Balco President Victor Conte Jr. in 1997, after helping one of Conte's daughters with legal problems. When investigators raided Balco in September 2003, Conte called Ellerman for help. The broad-shouldered lawyer with a shaved head eventually represented Jim Valente, Balco's vice president. Both Conte and Valente were among five men convicted for giving elite athletes illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

Ellerman, who lives in Colorado and worked as a criminal defense lawyer in Sacramento until 2005, often blamed the government for the leaks.

He did not return calls seeking comment Wednesday night, but he's spoken with the Mercury News in the past. In March 2004, he told the newspaper that the prosecution's request for a trial within 70 days, while turning 34,000 pages of documents and evidence over to the defense, ``smacks of a political agenda."

``Bush wants to have a summit on steroids," Ellerman said of the Balco case.

Conte, the Balco mastermind who had been accused in court papers of being the source of the leak, said Wednesday he was happy to have his name cleared and called Ellerman's actions outrageous.

``I'm shocked at this news," he wrote in an e-mail. ``This man was an officer of the court who was highly paid to provide the services of a criminal defense attorney. Instead, he chose to serve his own agenda and act in a way that was damaging to his own clients."

Reporters Avoid Jail In Balco Case (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 14 — Two reporters from The San Francisco Chronicle who wrote a best-selling book about steroid use in baseball will avoid jail time after a defense lawyer agreed Wednesday to plead guilty to leaking them secret federal court documents, prosecutors said.

The lawyer, Troy L. Ellerman, will plead guilty to two counts of contempt, as well as one count each of obstruction of justice and filing false statements in a federal court, according to a statement from the United States Attorney's Office in Los Angeles.

As part of the plea, the Justice Department will withdraw subpoenas issued to the reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada, who had been held in contempt by a federal judge since September for refusing to say who their sources were for a series of Chronicle articles and their 2006 book, "Game of Shadows."

"The government believes that Ellerman's guilty pleas alleviate the need for the reporters to testify," the statement read.

Ellerman faces up to two years in prison and a $250,000 fine, said Douglas M. Miller, one of the prosecutors in the case.

Ellerman, who did not return a call to his cellphone for comment, had once represented Victor Conte Jr., the founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, the company from Burlingame, Calif., at the center of a continuing federal investigation into steroids in sports. Ellerman had also represented James J. Valente, the vice president of Balco.

Conte and Valente served time in prison in connection to distributing steroids through their company, whose client list included some of the biggest names in sports, including Barry Bonds, the San Francisco Giants slugger; Tim Montgomery, the Olympic sprinter; and the baseball stars Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi.

All four athletes testified in front of a grand jury in 2003, and court documents filed Wednesday show that Ellerman admitted that he had allowed the Chronicle reporters to see transcripts of each of the men's testimony in 2004 in violation of a court order.

Attorney's action will spare San Francisco Chronicle reporters from prison for contempt in refusing to reveal source.

A defense attorney in the BALCO steroid scandal has admitted that he revealed secret grand jury testimony from Major League Baseball players to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters, ending a constitutional standoff between federal prosecutors and the press, and eliminating the threat of prison for the journalists.

Troy Ellerman, 44, who represented the vice president of the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, agreed to plead guilty to two counts of contempt of court, one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false declaration with a federal court, according to an 18-page plea agreement filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on Wednesday.

Once he enters his plea, the U.S. Justice Department intends to withdraw the grand jury subpoenas issued to reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, who had been sentenced to prison on contempt charges for refusing to comply with the subpoenas, a government spokesman said. Fainaru-Wada, 41, and Williams, 57, had remained free while appealing the sentence.

"The government believes that Ellerman's guilty pleas will alleviate the need for the reporters to testify before the grand jury," Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles, which investigated the leak, said in a news release.

Williams, reached by phone, said Wednesday's news caught him and Fainaru-Wada by surprise. He declined to confirm that Ellerman was their confidential source.

"The whole point of our situation is that we're not going to give our sources to anyone as long as we have a confidentiality agreement in place, and we do," Williams added.

At the same time, Williams said if the prospect of prison is removed, "Of course, that's great."

The case was seen as a tipping point in a series of court battles between journalists and federal prosecutors seeking to unmask their sources. This week, a procession of reporters has filed into a Washington courtroom to testify about who leaked the name of CIA agent Valerie Plame.

Media advocates, however, contended that unlike the Plame matter, the BALCO case did not involve sensitive security issues and the reporters performed an important public service by exposing drug abuse in national sports.

Attorneys for the Chronicle argued before U.S. District Judge Jeffrey S. White that forcing journalists to disclose their sources would undercut the 1st Amendment and ability of the media to gather news.

But White agreed with the prosecutors, who argued that letting people get away with violating a judge's order to keep information confidential would deeply erode the system of justice.

And according to the plea agreement, Ellerman very much flouted that system in 2004 as his client, James Valente, was headed to trial for allegedly illegally distributing steroids.

Ellerman allegedly invited the reporters on two occasions to his law offices to take verbatim notes of the testimony given by baseball stars Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield and sprinter Tim Montgomery.

When the Chronicle's subsequent stories connecting the athletes to the steroid ring rocked the sports world, Ellerman blamed the government in a court hearing for the leaks, according to the plea agreement. He then filed a motion to dismiss the charges, saying that the media coverage of the confidential testimony made "fair trial practically impossible anywhere in the country," the plea agreement said.

For misleading the court, Ellerman was charged with obstruction of justice. Although he could face up to 15 years in prison and fines of $500,000, the U.S. attorney's office has agreed that he should be sentenced to no more than two years, and he could get probation. If the judge decides to give him more time than the agreement stipulates, Ellerman can withdraw the plea.

"The government acknowledges that Ellerman's decision to plead guilty has saved future government resources by resolving the leak investigation now, has saved the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals from having to consider and rule on the appeal filed by the reporters and the Chronicle, and has avoided the potential that Fainaru-Wada and Williams would serve time in prison," Mrozek said.

The BALCO case began in 2003, when agents raided the Burlingame laboratory that produced performance-enhancing drugs and a grand jury probe was begun.

As professional athletes were called before the grand jury, reporters scrambled to learn the names of those who got illegal drugs from the firm.

But when indictments were announced in February 2004 against four defendants — including Valente and BALCO founder Victor Conte — prosecutors had removed the athletes' names.

The transcripts of the grand jury testimony, revealing the athletes' names, were distributed to the defendants and their attorneys. Judge Susan Illston made the parties sign a protective order not to disseminate them to the press.

About four months later, however, Ellerman "willfully disobeyed" Illston's order and invited Fainaru-Wada to his Sacramento law offices to take verbatim notes from Montgomery's sealed testimony, according to the plea agreement.

The June 24 headlines were: "Sprinter admitted use of BALCO 'magic potion' " and "Track star's testimony linked Bonds to steroid use." Illston asked the Justice Department to investigate the leak.

Ellerman expressed outrage about the leak in court. In mid-July, he filed a declaration under penalty of perjury stating that he "had no idea who provided the information to the media concerning Mr. Montgomery's grand jury testimony nor why it was done." He wrote that the leak was "very damaging to [the defendant's] right to a fair trial."

In October, he made the motion to dismiss while subsequently inviting Fainaru-Wada back to his offices to take notes from the testimony of Giambi, Bonds and Sheffield. The resulting stories caused an international uproar over the use of steroids by top stars in professional sports.

This fall, according to Mrozek, a "previously unknown witness approached the FBI offering to help prove that Ellerman was the source of the leaks." The FBI secretly taped Ellerman admitting that he was the source of the grand jury transcripts, according to the plea agreement.

Media advocates were delighted to hear that Williams and Fainaru-Wada would avoid prison.

Lucie Morillon, the Washington director of Reporters Without Borders, said the whole episode still damaged journalists' ability to dig up information.

"This source has been forced to come forward and this does not help to instill trust between reporters and their sources," she said.

Traditionally, the Justice Department has opted to subpoena reporters in only the most extreme circumstances, such as to protect national security or public safety, but critics said that changed under the Bush administration. Eve Burton, corporate counsel for the Hearst Corp., which owns the Chronicle, said the number of media subpoenas has increased markedly in recent years, according to research the company did to prepare for this case. Of 91 federal subpoenas issued to journalists since 1991, 41 have been filed since January 2003, she said.

The Justice Department has said it does not have a tally of the total number of subpoenas issued to reporters.

Fred Brown, vice chair of the ethics committee of the Society of Professional Journalists, said the case also raises ethical issues for journalists who grant confidentiality to sources whose motives for releasing the information might be questionable.

"I think it shows you don't make that promise unconditionally," Brown said. "You should leave yourself an out if your source does something unethical."

By Paul Foy, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2007

(AP) - SALT LAKE CITY-The FBI said Wednesday it has no reason to believe the shooting spree that killed five people in a shopping mall was an act of Islamic terrorism, leaving a young Bosnian immigrant's motives a mystery.

"It's just unexplainable," FBI agent Patrick Kiernan said. "He was just walking around and shooting everybody he saw."

Sulejman Talovic, 18, fired randomly at shoppers Monday, killing five and leaving four others injured before he was shot dead by police.

"We are Muslims, but we are not terrorists," the boy's aunt, Ajka Omerovic, said Wednesday at the family's house. She rejected any religious motive for the shooting and said the family cannot explain it.

The Talovic family fled war-torn Bosnia for Utah in 1998 "to be free," she said.

Talovic's parents do not speak English and are not answering knocks on their door. Omerovic said the boy's mother is distraught and that the father normally works "dusk to dawn" in construction.

Authorities are investigating how Talovic acquired one of his weapons, a .38-caliber pistol, which is illegal for a teenager to possess, said Lori Dyer, in charge of the local office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Those efforts were delayed Wednesday when an East Coast storm shut down ATF offices, she said.

Talovic was heavily armed with ammunition and a shotgun as well.

"You can buy long guns at 18. That's not a problem. The handgun he shouldn't have had, so obviously we're going to look at where he got that gun," Dyer said.

Omerovic said Talovic never displayed any guns. "We want to know, who sold these guns to him," she said.

Meanwhile, less than 48 hours after the killings, the mall reopened.

Salt Lake City Police Chief Chris Burbank said the rampage could have been even worse if not for the quick actions of an off-duty officer, Ken Hammond, who engaged Talovic in a shootout before other officers arrived.

Investigators knew little about Talovic, except that he lived in Salt Lake City with his mother. He was enrolled in numerous city schools before withdrawing in 2004.

He was a legal U.S. resident, arriving with family members as war refugees in 1998, said Virginia Kice, a spokeswoman with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

At 16, Talovic was taken out of high school by his mother to work, Salt Lake City school district spokesman Jason Olsen said Wednesday. He was employed at Aramark Uniform Services, where managers refused to comment.

Talovic was only 4 when he and his mother fled their village of Talovici on foot after Serbian forces overran it in 1993, people close to the family told The Associated Press in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

He lived as a refugee in Bosnia from 1993 to 1998, when his family moved to the United States, they said.

During that period, he spent some time in Srebrenica, the northeastern enclave where up to 8,000 Muslim men and boys were slaughtered in 1995 by Serb forces.

Talovic left Srebrenica two years before the massacre, but acquaintances suggested it may have left an indelible mark on the quiet little boy they knew.

"That's why I'm convinced the war did this in Utah," said Murat Avdic, a friend of the family. "There cannot be any other reason."

The four people injured remained in hospitals, with two in critical condition and two listed as serious.

Associated Press writers Debbie Hummel in Salt Lake City and Aida Cerkez-Robinson in Sarajevo contributed to this story. 2007-02-14T19:55:32Z

FBI Taps Raytheon For Info-sharing System (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 15, 2007

The FBI has awarded a contract to the Raytheon Co. of Waltham, Mass., to build out the National Data Exchange (N-Dex) law enforcement information-sharing system, sources said.

According to a bureau official, FBI systems specialists expect to meet with their Raytheon counterparts within the next two weeks to plan the IT work leading up to the N-Dex system rollout.

N-Dex uses advanced information sharing that harmonizes data entered into various types of law enforcement systems for common search, acquisition and analysis. N-Dex acts as a counterpart to R-Dex, a regional data exchange system that provides a “pointer” to the location of specific information held by other law enforcement agencies.

Technical descriptions of the N-Dex project emphasize its use of standards such as the Global Justice XML Data Model and the National Information Exchange Model to foster information sharing.

The Justice Department likely will provide funds for N-Dex during 2007 and 2008, and the FBI will assume funding responsibility in 2009 and later, sources said.

N-Dex is intended to facilitate data analysis and the detection of links among people and places, as well as events such as crimes, objects such as weapons, drugs and currency, and gangs to help intelligence analysis. The project has progressed for about six years under the auspices of the bureau’s National Criminal Information Services Division in Clarksburg, W.Va. FBI officials have worked with their counterparts in many federal agencies as well as states and cities to create the framework and standards for the system.

Raytheon declined to comment. FBI officials were not immediately available for comment.

An FBI official close to the project noted that the bureau had structured the acquisition as a performance-based contract. The official said N-Dex likely would begin full-scale operation in about a year.

'Breach' Draws a Fresh Angle on the Story of the FBI Mole, But the Mystery of Why He Did It Endures Six Years Later

Why did the FBI's top spy hunter -- a Cold War warrior who repeatedly professed his love of God, family, country and J. Edgar Hoover -- sell his nation's most sensitive secrets to the Russians?

It's a question that hangs unanswered over Washington, the city where Robert Hanssen was arrested on Feb. 18, 2001, for the worst security breach in the FBI's history.

Ever since, it has confounded not only his family, friends and colleagues, but also untold numbers of authors, forensic psychologists, criminologists and intelligence analysts. And that question is further compounded by the enigma of Hanssen himself -- a counterintelligence officer who passed classified materials to the Soviet and Russian governments undetected for 22 years; a devotee of the Catholic order of Opus Dei who encouraged a friend to secretly observe him having sex with his wife; who bought a Mercedes-Benz for a Washington stripper; and who was obsessed with pornography.

Six years, virtually to the day, after Hanssen's capture, a new movie brings that perplexing question back into play with a previously undisclosed story -- that of Eric O'Neill, the 27-year-old surveillance operative whose job it was to closely monitor Hanssen while the FBI maneuvered to ensnare him. O'Neill's story does not appear in any of several books written about Hanssen since his capture because -- until recently -- the FBI forbade him to speak publicly.

Directed by Billy Ray, "Breach" offers no "Rosebud" revelations to explain Hanssen's treason. But it places audiences in the same unnerving situation O'Neill (played by Ryan Phillippe) found himself in in January 2001 -- posing as office assistant to Hanssen (Chris Cooper), securing his trust and reporting his every move until the double agent made the crucial mistake that led to his apprehension. Hanssen was arrested a month later, after stashing a trash bag full of classified materials under a footbridge in Fairfax County's Foxstone Park -- a spy's "dead drop" intended for his Russian handlers.

"There are, I'd say, 500 stories that could be told about Hanssen," Ray acknowledges. "After all, there were 500 officers working on that case. But out of the 500, there was only one who was locked in a room with that guy every day -- Eric."

Hanssen, who turns 63 in April, is spending the rest of his life at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, Colo. Only after he pleaded guilty in 2002 -- and after most of the half-dozen or so books about the case had been published -- was O'Neill finally cleared to tell his story. He pitched the "Breach" project to Hollywood.

Which is to explain how the real Eric O'Neill and Ray come to be sitting in a lunchroom -- right across the street from FBI headquarters -- and revisiting the baffling conundrum that is Robert Hanssen.

Both acknowledge they are telling only one small corner of the story and both agree that, in terms of explaining Hanssen's motivation, "Breach" can only offer informed conjecture. But that's as close as anyone can expect to evoke the man, insists Ray, who has read all the available research on Hanssen and can reel off the prevailing theories about him.

"His father told him he was a loser," Ray begins. "He didn't want to look bad in front of his wife. He was mad at being passed over for promotion. The Russians treated him like James Bond and that really got him going."

But Ray, whose 2003 film "Shattered Glass" probed the motives of another Washington schemer, journalistic fabricator Stephen Glass, has his own interpretation.

"The truth is, we just don't know him," says Ray, 43, boyish and gentle-voiced. "And ultimately, does it matter why he did what he did? His wife's going to have to think about why he did what he did. But I didn't spend a lot of time thinking about it. I imagine Chris Cooper spent some time thinking about it. Why did Stephen Glass write all those [false] articles? I can give you 50 reasons -- all totally valid. But at the end of the day, he did it. And I think, ultimately, you are what you do."

For Ray, the bottom line was this: Hanssen "had an absence of a moral rudder. He didn't have that part of the gut that says: 'Don't do this. It's illegal, immoral, dangerous and wrong.' "

"I believe that moral rudder was there, but it was just ignored," counters O'Neill, a clean-cut, bright-eyed man of 33, now a government contracts lawyer in Washington. "He knew the right things to do but he made excuses for himself. And because his religion was so central to his life -- and he knew he was doing immoral things, hurting people -- he believed himself evil and doomed."

"Breach" is also fascinating, ironically, for what it doesn't tell, and how those stories -- found in numerous articles and such nonfiction books as David Wise's "Spy: The Inside Story of How the FBI's Robert Hanssen Betrayed America" and David A. Vise's "The Bureau and the Mole" -- yield even more perplexing questions about Hanssen.

"Ultimately, who knows the heart of a double agent?" asks "Spy" author Wise. "Does a spy even know what drives him to betray everything -- his wife, his country, himself? It's a complicated business."

In the case of Hanssen, the more that these writers uncover, it seems, the darker and more elusive he becomes.

In a 2001 article, intelligence affairs author James Bamford, who came to know Hanssen personally, remembered that Hanssen "would much rather talk about the immorality of abortion and the dangers of Planned Parenthood than the latest draft picks." And when Bamford finally agreed, at Hanssen's request, to attend one of his Opus Dei meetings, the FBI man "reveled in that closed society of true believers, like a fraternity brother exchanging a secret handshake."

But "hidden deep behind that pious, anti-Communist facade," Bamford wrote in the New York Times Magazine, "was a disturbing, bifurcated psyche. A Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hanssen."

A tall, brooding loner -- nicknamed "the mortician" for the dark suits and clothes he always wore -- Hanssen pursued a shadowy double role in virtually every facet of his life. As the head of the Soviet unit at the FBI, he was in charge of catching enemy spies but, according to court documents, books and published reports, received an estimated $1.4 million over 22 years for passing classified materials to the Soviet and Russian regimes.

Hanssen would duck out of work early so he could attend antiabortion rallies, yet had no compunction about sending three young men to their deaths -- Russian double agents whose identities he sold to Moscow. And according to Vise's book, Hanssen was never too busy working for his country's enemies to feed the media damning information about the Clinton administration's purported cover-up of financial contributions from communist China.

"You have to understand he was a compartmentalizer," Vise says. "How else could he be married and a father and go to church every day and, at the same time, commit treason?"

According to Wise and Vise's books and others, Hanssen spent his share of secular time at "gentleman's clubs" in downtown Washington. He befriended several strippers, including Priscilla Sue Galey, on whom he lavished several thousands of dollars in cash and jewelry. (She was the one for whom he bought the Mercedes -- used.)

On one occasion, he took Galey on a free trip to Hong Kong, while he attended an FBI conference there. Yet to her surprise, Hanssen never attempted to have sex with her. He was, he told her, trying to bring her closer to God. He neglected, however, to inform his wife, Bonnie, of his missionary work.

As the movie only alludes to, but most Hanssen books recount, Hanssen reserved the worst betrayal of all for his wife, Bonnie -- who, by the terms of her pension arrangement, cannot comment about her husband to the media. He ostensibly revered her, yet disseminated material about their sexual relationship on the Internet, and even rigged a secret surveillance camera in their bedroom -- unbeknown to her -- so a childhood friend could watch their lovemaking when he came to visit.

This highly secretive man also wanted to be discovered, maintains Vise; "otherwise, in his eyes, the world would never have had the chance to see how devilishly clever he was -- eluding detection for two decades."

That seemed clear to O'Neill on that January day in 2001 when he moved into Hanssen's office to begin his clandestine assignment. As the movie shows, his new boss immediately lectured him on the kind of spies to be on the lookout for: They would be in "the worst possible place," trying to do the most possible damage and for the best financial gain.

"There he was," O'Neill says. "Across the desk, sitting in that worst possible place, with access to everything. So we began our relationship with me thinking, 'Is it cat and mouse? Who's the cat and who's the mouse? Is he just being a mentor or is he saying: 'I know what's going on. See if you can catch me. You can't because you're a stupid, low-level clerk.' "

But O'Neill had the last word in that crucible of a relationship. On the day of Hanssen's impending arrest, knowing he'd never see Hanssen free again, O'Neill had a special farewell to make.

"I said 'Boss?' He turned and said, 'Yeah?' I said, 'I'll catch you later.' "

Judge To Reconsider Bail For Alleged Drug Kingpin (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 15, 2007

Thrice-convicted felon flight risk, prosecutor says

Dang, that sounds harsh.

Locked down in solitary confinement in an already tightly secured jail, forced to suffer from an untreated hernia and isolated from his wife and children - that has been the unfair life of Vicente Corona since he was alleged by authorities to be the top dog of a massive mail-order drug distribution network, his attorney argued Wednesday.

But, wait. Call Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck crazy, but he's thinking all that extra security might stem from Corona's alleged threat to escape, kill a witness and slay an accused conspirator.

"The defendant has communicated to a person in the Blount County Jail his intent to escape," Winck told U.S. District Judge Thomas Phillips at a hearing Wednesday. "He was going to use his brother, Roberto, to help him escape (during) his hernia operation.

"The defendant also communicated he intended to have one of the witnesses killed," Winck continued. "The defendant communicated he would have had another co-conspirator killed."

Winck said authorities have proof to show that Corona's brother rented a hotel room in the area around the time of the alleged escape attempt.

It was only because the U.S. Marshals Service got wind of the alleged plot that security was beefed up. Corona waseventually allowed to have his hernia operation under heavy guard, Winck said.

Johnson countered that Winck was telling tales he couldn't back up.

"I would note for the court he's relying on someone who is an inmate at the Blount County Jail who is unidentified," Johnson said of the alleged source of Winck's information.

It was a pretty bold move on Johnson's part Wednesday to ask Phillips to reconsider an earlier ruling by U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton that Corona should be locked up pending trial.

Consider the facts Guyton relied on:

Corona is an illegal immigrant caught in California with fake identification. He is alleged to be the kingpin of a mail-order drug business that shipped more than a half-ton of marijuana and a quarter-ton of cocaine from California to Knoxville in just three years.

He has three prior felony drug convictions, which Winck contends makes his punishment a mandatory life term if he is convicted. His wife and children live in California. He has no relatives in the Knoxville area, although he has a few in Chattanooga.

"Persons who continually violate the (federal drug laws) are a danger to our community," Winck said. "Because he's facing a term of imprisonment of life, I also submit he is a risk of flight."

Johnson counters that it is unduly harsh to keep Corona locked up in the Blount County Jail, where inmates cannot even watch television.

"Pretrial detention in a county jail is, I submit, the harshest alternative," Johnson said.

Phillips said he would issue a written ruling on the issue. He also is set to decide Johnson's bid to have the case tossed out for trial delays. The odds are not good given that Phillips called Johnson's bluff with an offer to move up the July trial date if Johnson would drop pending motions. Johnson declined.

Congressional Delegation Staying Out Of Hemp Debate (AP)

WASHINGTON North Dakota legislators are urging Congress to make it easier for farmers around the country to grow hemp. But the state's congressional delegation won't be rushing to help.

Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan and Rep. Earl Pomeroy, all Democrats, are staying out of the congressional debate over industrial hemp. At issue is whether it should be treated in the same way as marijuana or whether commercial hemp production should be allowed.

The North Dakota House passed two resolutions on the issue this week, urging Congress and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration to allow farmers to grow the crop. The state last week issued the nation's first licenses to two farmers seeking to grow industrial hemp.

In an interview, Pomeroy said he does not want to interfere in discussions between the DEA and the commercial hemp industry.

"At this point in time, I'd like to leave this to the experts, and no one has ever accused Congress of being that group," Pomeroy said.

He has not decided how he feels about the issue, he said.

"I haven't reached a conclusion. I am watching with interest," he said. "I am learning from North Dakota's experience."

Spokesmen for Conrad and Dorgan said neither senator would be sponsoring or co-sponsoring legislation dealing with hemp. They did not say whether the two senators support making it easier for farmers to grow it.

Conrad spokesman Chris Thorne said Conrad worries the Bush administration will object.

"At this point, we don't see much room for success there," he said.

North Dakota Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson met with DEA officials earlier this week to try to persuade them to accept the two state licenses. The farmers must get approval from the agency, which has not allowed commercial hemp production but has said it would consider applications to grow it.

"I felt that we've got a long ways to go with DEA," Johnson said after the meeting. "They made it quite clear that they still do not understand or believe the distinction between industrial hemp and marijuana. That's a pretty fundamental issue."

He said he would rather see the DEA change its rules than try for a controversial battle in a busy Congress.

Garrison Courtney, a spokesman for the DEA, said the agency will give full consideration to the North Dakota applications.

"It's still in the very beginning stages," he said. "It would be premature to speculate on what our decision is going to be down the road."

Hemp is a cousin of marijuana that contains trace amounts of the chemical that causes a marijuana high, though hemp does not produce the same effects. The sturdy, fibrous plant is used to make an assortment of products including paper, rope, clothing and cosmetics.

Industrial hemp cultivation is legal in Canada and other countries but is banned in the United States. Law enforcement officials worry that industrial hemp can shield the growing of marijuana, although hemp supporters say that fear is unfounded.

North Dakota is one of seven states that have authorized industrial hemp farming. The others are Hawaii, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Montana and West Virginia, according to Vote Hemp, an industrial hemp advocacy organization based in Bedford, Mass.

Losing Afghanistan To Opium? (WT)

By Ileana Ros-Lehtinen

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The spring opium harvest will soon begin in Afghanistan. So will a murderous spring offensive by the Taliban and its allies against U.S. and coalition troops. The two events are directly related, for the Taliban and the warlords are funded by the billions of dollars deriving from the massive, illegal opium trade.

The deteriorating security in Afghanistan has been made possible by the opium crop's skyrocketing expansion. Much of the money is used to buy sophisticated weapons for the Taliban and warlords, pay their fighters, purchase supplies, bribe Afghan and

Pakistani officials and provide an impoverished population with the means to earn a living and thereby secure their allegiance and support.

Seen in this context, it is clear that U.S. and coalition forces in Afghanistan are battling more than merely a few thousand militants. They are at war with an expanding narco-state that extends throughout the country. Without this support, our enemies would be hard-pressed to operate, much less continue increasing their numbers and firepower. Given this reality, the odds against success are lengthening.

After five years of sustained U.S. effort in Afghanistan, it should be apparent to all that our strategy has not succeeded. Yet as a new approach is about to be rolled out, it does not appear that those formulating this new proposal fully understand that the Taliban and its allies cannot be defeated without also targeting their principal source of financing -- the illegal drug trade.

Our anti-narcotics policy has long been hobbled by conflicting views and bureaucratic battles between the various players, including the Departments of Defense and State, the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), and other U.S. agencies, along with our NATO allies, especially the British. There is little prospect these long-entrenched divisions will be reconciled by themselves.

To encourage the administration to focus on this central problem, I and four of my colleagues on the House Foreign Affairs Committee recently sent a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates recommending a number of steps be taken immediately, including:

• Appointing a high-level coordinator of Afghan narco-terrorism policy to create and lead a unified campaign against drugs and terror that utilizes all U.S. agencies, assets and assistance, as we are doing successfully in Colombia.

• Implementing a new DEA "ride-along" policy with the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) and our own military forces on the ground in Afghanistan in order to combine ongoing U.S. and NATO military operations when these overlap with those of the DEA.

• Extraditing to the U.S. major drug kingpins and drug warlords, using a new narco-terrorism provision in the USA PATRIOT Act that makes the use of illicit drugs to support acts of terrorism or foreign terrorist organizations a federal crime. Extradition has worked well in Colombia, and can work in Afghanistan.

• Expediting training by the Colombian National Police's elite anti-narcotics unit, which visited Afghanistan last year, of their Afghan counterparts. We were pleased to see Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, note recently the key role our Colombian allies, and U.S. experience in Colombia, can play in the fight against illicit drugs in Afghanistan.

• Helping develop and facilitate trade promotion and increased trade-building capacity for Afghan products and industries in order to increase exports and create legitimate livelihoods in place of illicit opium farming and production today.

Of course, these recommendations must be part of a much broader effort that includes a greatly enhanced effort by Pakistan to secure its tribal areas and the president's proposals to increase funding for roads, rural electrification, alternative livelihood programs, and training for security forces. But without a comprehensive counternarcotics policy, these efforts by themselves are unlikely to succeed.

The problem with our strategy in Afghanistan is not primarily one of resources, but of policy. Our enemies draw their strength not merely from their weapons and their fanaticism, but from the opium in the fields as well.

Report: Teens Using Prescription Drugs (AP)

By Karen Matthews

AP, February 14, 2007

NEW YORK (AP)— Junior's been helping himself to Mother's little helper. That's the conclusion of a report released Wednesday by White House drug czar John Walters that found while U.S. teenagers' use of marijuana is declining, their abuse of prescription drugs is holding steady or in some cases increasing.

"The drug dealer is us," said Walters, the national drug policy director.

According to an analysis of national surveys prepared by Walters' office, 2.1 million teenagers abused prescription drugs in 2005, the most recent year for which figures are available.

While their use of marijuana declined from 30.1 percent to 25.8 percent from 2002 to 2006, use of OxyContin, a painkiller, increased from 2.7 percent to 3.5 percent over the same period. Use of Vicodin, another painkiller, increased slightly from 6 percent to 6.3 percent.

Teens are also abusing stimulants like Adderall and anti-anxiety drugs like Xanax because they are readily available and perceived as safer than street drugs, Walters said.

Walters said adults should keep track of prescription drugs and throw them out when they expire.

"People just aren't aware that they need to be careful, and so they leave prescriptions in the medicine cabinet and they don't think anything about it," he said.

The report is based on the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, a survey of 68,308 families, and the 2005 Monitoring the Future Survey of 50,000 eighth-, 10th- and 12th-graders conducted by the University of Michigan.

Dr. Terry Horton, the medical director of Phoenix House, which operates nearly 100 substance abuse programs in nine states, said the belief that prescription drugs are safer than street drugs is false.

"These medicines cause dependence and addiction when misused and have the potential to cause death," he said. "We're talking about medicines that are related, pharmacologically, to heroin and have very similar effects."

CBS News/AP, February 14, 2007

That's the conclusion of a report released Wednesday by White House drug czar John Walters that found while teenagers' use of marijuana is declining, their abuse of prescription drugs is holding steady or in some cases increasing.

"The drug dealer is us," said Walters, the national drug policy director, who released the report Wednesday at a news conference in New York. "We have to have a response that keeps that very important fact in mind."

Teens who are being treated for prescription drug addiction agreed.

"It's available and you can get high off of it," said Michael Robin, a 17-year-old who is being treated for addiction to drugs, including Xanax and OxyContin, at a Phoenix House facility on Long Island.

Walters said in some cases teens use the Internet to obtain drugs or to visit Web sites that provide what purport to be instructions for taking safe amounts of various prescription drugs.

Victoria Winebarger, a therapist at the Pathway Family Center in Southfield, Mich., said some of her clients have also used the Internet to research symptoms of conditions including depression and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder so that they can get a doctor to prescribe drugs for them. "That's not uncommon," she said.

Winebarger told CBS News correspondent Sharyn Alfonsi that all but four of the kids in her classroom abused prescription drugs.

"These kids think they're cleaner because of the package they're in," she said.

According to an analysis of national drug surveys prepared by Walters' office, 2.1 million teenagers abused prescription drugs in 2005, the last year for which figures are available.

While their use of marijuana declined from 30.1 percent to 25.8 percent from 2002 to 2006, use of OxyContin, a painkiller, increased from 2.7 percent to 3.5 percent over the same period. Use of Vicodin, another pain reliever, increased slightly from 6 percent to 6.3 percent.

Teens are abusing pain relievers as well as stimulants like Adderall and anti-anxiety drugs like Xanax because they are readily available and perceived as safer than street drugs, Walters said.

"Fifty-seven percent of them say they get them free from friends or they take them out of somebody's medicine cabinet," Walters said in a telephone interview Tuesday.

The report is based on the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, a survey of 68,308 families, and the 2005 Monitoring the Future Survey of 50,000 eighth, 10th and 12th graders conducted by the University of Michigan.

According to the National Survey on Drug Use and Health, marijuana use is still more common than prescription drug abuse among youths 12 to 17 years old.

Three percent, or 840,000, of 12-to-17-year-olds said they had abused prescription drugs in the past month, compared with 7 percent who had used marijuana.

The Monitoring the Future Survey found that the list of drugs abused by 12th graders was headed by marijuana, with 31.5 percent reporting they had used it in the past year. The rest of the top five were prescription drugs — Vicodin, amphetamines, cough medicine, sedatives and tranquilizers.

Teenagers and drug counselors said the popularity of prescription drugs is fed by the belief that they are less risky than street drugs.

"It seemed a lot safer because I knew what they were putting in them," said Sara Johnson, a 16-year-old who is being treated for drug addiction at the Pathway Family Center in Southfield, Mich.

Johnson, who planned to attend Wednesday's news conference, said she abused drugs including Xanax and Adderall before bottoming out and going into treatment.

"I would ask people, 'Oh, do your parents have any painkillers at the house?'" she said. "'Or do they use Adderall?' It was really easy after a while."

Dr. Terry Horton, the medical director of Phoenix House, which operates nearly 100 substance abuse programs in nine states, said the belief that prescription drugs are safer than street drugs is false.

"These medicines cause dependence and addiction when misused and have the potential to cause death," he said. "We're talking about medicines that are related, pharmacologically, to heroin and have very similar effects."

Walters said adults should keep track of prescription drugs and throw them out when they expire.

"People just aren't aware that they need to be careful, and so they leave prescriptions in the medicine cabinet and they don't think anything about it," he said. "Once you tell them there is a hazard here, there are easy steps to take to put these things in a safe place, to monitor them and also to toss them once you've used them."

A Shift In Teenage Drug Abuse (NYS)

The trend replicates a nationwide increase in prescription drug abuse, according to the study, conducted by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. According to the study, nearly one in five teenagers nationwide reported abusing prescription medications, making prescription drugs the second most commonly abused illegal drugs among teenagers, after marijuana.

"This is attractive to young people, we found in the study, because they think it's safer," the director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, John Walters, said during a videoconference with reporters convened in Manhattan.

Officials said abuse of prescription drugs among teenagers in New York is most popular upstate. The majority of teenagers steal drugs from medicine cabinets at home or get drugs from friends. In New York City, the three most popular prescription drugs sold on the street are Elavil, Xanax, and Vicodin.

"It's a dangerous epidemic," the editor-in-chief of Seventeen magazine, Ann Shoket, said. Seventeen, which featured a teenager who died from a prescription drug overdose on the cover of its March issue, partnered with the White House to release the study.

New York Press, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132453

A new report from the White House indicates that teenagers no longer prefer marijuana and other illegal street drugs when it's time to get high, showing an increasing preference for prescription pills. Director of National Drug Control Policy John P. Walters is urging parents to be wary of just about everyone, especially your family, since stereotypical drug dealers are not typically the culprits in such prescription drug abuse.

"Parents need to know that teens are turning away from street drugs and increasingly abusing prescription drugs to get high. They should also be aware that suppliers of these drugs might not be sinister characters on the street corner, but are more likely close friends or relatives," said Walters. "Too many young people see popping pills as a painless high."

The report does note that overall teen drug use has dropped 23% over five years, so it's not all suspicious glances at distant cousins.

'The Drug Dealer Is Us' (MET)

Metro, February 15, 2007

MIDTOWN. For Michael Robin, a Long Island teen receiving treatment for his addiction to Xanax and OxyContin, getting the drugs was as simple as a trip to the bathroom.

"It was just everywhere, unfortunately," the 17-year-old said. "You could go to a friend's house and look in their medicine cabinet and you could find something."

Robin, of Oceanside, said he was one of the 2.1 million teenagers who abused prescription drugs in 2005, the last year for which figures are available. A report released yesterday by White House drug czar John Walters found that while use of marijuana is declining, abuse of medications is on the rise. From 2002 to 2006, marijuana use by teens declined from 30.1 percent to 25.8 percent as abuse of powerful painkillers such as OxyContin increased from 2.7 percent to 3.5 percent.

In New York, where the average for overall prescription drug use among teens (7 percent) is below the national mark (9 percent), roughly 181,000 youth ages 12 to 17 reported current use of illicit drugs and one out of every 14 reported abusing prescription drugs in the past year. The problem is even bigger upstate, according to the report, where more than 156,000 teens, or 19 percent, have used pills to get high.

Robin, who is now being treated at a Phoenix House facility on Long Island, said it took an overdose of OxyContin for him to realize he had a problem.

"I actually purchased it from somebody I met after a while of getting it through friends," he said. "It became something that I felt was essential to my life. I became addicted to it."

Walters, who released the report in New York via satellite from Washington, said 57 percent of respondents acquired the drugs without cost, typically from friends or from a medicine cabinet. They're readily available and often perceived as safer than street drugs such as cocaine.

"Because these are medicines and not polluted street drugs, young people have the false view ... that this is safe," he said. "It's not."

Walters urged parents to monitor prescription drugs in the home and to throw them out when they expire.

"The drug dealer is us," he said.

Other findings

• Next to marijuana, the most common illegal drugs are prescription medications.

• 11.9 percent of respond-ents said they've used prescription pills to get high.

McClatchy Newspapers, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON - For the closest U.S. ally in Latin America, crunch time is near.

Top Colombian officials have hit Washington in recent weeks in a stepped-up effort to lobby Congress for a new multibillion-dollar anti-drug trafficking plan and a free trade agreement that has run into fierce opposition among the Democratic majority in Congress.

Colombian Vice President Francisco Santos met with key Democratic and Republican lawmakers and Bush administration officials during a two-day trip that ended Wednesday. Earlier this month, Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos was in Washington.

Both officials pushed a massive $44 billion anti-drug trafficking effort, informally known as Plan Colombia II. The United States contributed $4 billion in the first Plan Colombia, unveiled in 1999. And now Bogota hopes to obtain a similar amount from Washington for the successor program, Francisco Santos told The Miami Herald Wednesday.

The Colombians have been telling lawmakers the initiatives are crucial to a democratic U.S. ally that has embraced open markets at a time when socialist Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez blasts U.S. initiatives as imperialistic.

But though many Democrats seem supportive of Plan Colombia, they want Bogota to include stronger labor provisions in the free trade deal. Vice President Santos says the Colombians are willing to make concessions once they know exactly what the Democrats want.

"(The Democrats) tell us labor is an important issue but they don't say how," he said. "The truth is it feels like we're chasing ghosts ... Colombia is willing to do what it takes to ease the concerns of the Democrats."

A text on the free trade deal must be submitted to Congress by March 31 if it is to be approved under a special trade promotion authority, which gives Congress the power to pass or reject free trade agreements but not amend them. Peru and Panama are also awaiting ratification.

Santos said that under Plan Colombia II, Washington would provide money for the security side and the Colombians would focus on reforming the judiciary and promoting alternate crops to coca farming.

He said the first Plan Colombia succeeded in bringing down violence in Colombia, which is battling several armed insurgent groups. Kidnappings are down ten-fold in the past four years and the annual murder rate has dropped from 28,000 to 17,000, he said.

The second phase seeks to consolidate those gains, he said. Drug trafficking is still widespread in places like southern Caqueta and Putumayo provinces, where leftwing insurgents are strong.

Colombia also faces a tough sell on some aspects of its counter-insurgency efforts.

Critics say aggressive herbicide fumigation campaigns under Plan Colombia has displaced coca farming to more remote areas but not stopped it, and that the reach of right-wing paramilitary groups and drug traffickers is still too pervasive in state institutions.

A government "peace and justice" program to disarm paramilitary fighters has come under fire from rights organizations that say the terms are too lenient, and that former paramilitary units are resurfacing under a new guise.

Santos says the plan has disarmed 30,000 paramilitary fighters and that the new groups that are taking their place are small and more "gangster-like" than an organized political or military force.

IMMIGRATION:

On US-Mexico Border, Illegal Crossings Drop (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2007

YUMA, ARIZ.

One phrase sums up both the chief achievement and complaint of National Guard soldiers and airmen posted along this dusty strip of border with Mexico: "Nothing happening."

That's good news for Operation Jumpstart, President Bush's eight-month-old initiative to reinforce America's southern border with National Guard troops until enough border patrol agents are trained. The extra troops appear to be discouraging people from trying to cross illegally.

Apprehensions of illegal immigrants in the Yuma sector – one of the busiest for the past two years and a top target for the operation – have dropped 62 percent in the last four months compared with the same period a year ago. That's the biggest drop of all nine border patrol sectors on the frontier with Mexico and double the average decline. The amount of marijuana seized in the Yuma sector fell 36 percent for the same period.

The figures for the entire southern border – a 27 decline in apprehensions and a 51 percent increase in marijuana seized – are encouraging, experts say.

"If those numbers hold [for the entire fiscal year], that would indeed represent a significant drop," says Luis Cabrera, an expert on transnational justice issues at Arizona State University in Tempe. "We're pretty sure there's a deterrence effect."

President Bush visited this busy crossing point last May to introduce his program to supplement US border patrol agents with National Guard soldiers and airmen for two years (6,000 the first year, 3,000 the next).

Of those, 2,400 are posted in Arizona, which has the two top-priority sectors in the operation – Tucson and Yuma.

"We have had 49 states participate in the border mission in Arizona, with 7,758 [troops] coming through Arizona," says Maj. Paul Aguirre, spokesman for Operation Jumpstart in Arizona. "Roughly 40 percent of the effort is in Arizona."

Moreover, some 500 additional border patrol agents have bolstered the efforts in the Yuma sector this past year, as have added infrastructure – National Guard helicopters, miles of triple fences, lights, cameras, and sensors.

Still, it's the highly visible National Guard troops that most here say are having the biggest deterrent effect. With their limited support roles (they can't apprehend nor arrest individuals), they are freeing border patrol agents from routine duties, such as fence-building and repair, so they can spend more time nabbing illegal infiltrators.

Watching the smugglers watch them

A few miles from town along the dusty levee between the Colorado River and the Salinity Canal, two National Guard soldiers man a station. (The media can no longer identify the soldiers because border patrol intelligence officers have learned that smugglers have placed a $30,000 to $50,000 bounty on their heads.) The two Guardsmen from North Carolina are dressed in camouflage fatigues. They carry M-16 rifles and high-powered binoculars that enable them to see clearly across to Mexico – often to see smugglers looking back at them through their binoculars.

They stand in front of a Chevy Blazer painted in camouflage next to their tent. Their shifts vary, but they are mainly deployed in groups of four for 48 to 72 hours. Two stand watch for four- or six-hour shifts while the other two sleep in the tent.

The North Carolina men, who were previously deployed to Iraq, have been posted here for the entire time.

The days "start to run into each other after a while. We basically observe and let border patrol know what we see," says one.

In the entire four months they've stood here, watching and waiting, they've seen only two families – four or five people in each group – attempting to cross. One of the men says it is difficult to report these people. "I wonder what would make me do that – climb into that icy cold river holding my child above my head? You can be compassionate, but you have to do your job, report them."

In both cases where the Guardsmen observed people attempting to cross, they called the border patrol who arrived within 15 minutes and apprehended the illegal immigrants.

A little farther down the dirt road is another outpost, one of 20 to 60 such sites strategically located according to intelligence gleaned from smugglers at various spots along the Yuma sector's 125-mile border section.

The two Guardsmen manning this post, also previously deployed in Iraq, are from Washington State. These two men – dressed similarly and toting the same weapons – have been here since October.

"We haven't seen anybody in a long time – maybe since November," says the more talkative of the two. "But there's always stuff to do, like we make Crystal Light, sanitize our hands, make sun tea. Talk to the BP and get their input when they stop.

"They," he says, pointing to border patrol senior agent Chris Van Wagenen, "have to put up with driving and air conditioning. We don't."

Mr. Van Wagenen responds that it's because of these highly visible men that the Yuma sector is now apprehending about only 100 illegal immigrants per day, compared with 500 to 600 a year ago.

The Washington Guardsmen's boredom is briefly interrupted by Rosita's catering truck from San Luis, a nearby town. This is the fourth day of servicing the National Guardsmen, according to John Anguian, the driver. These men – and several others along the levy – are thrilled to eat tostadas and refried beans rather than their MREs (meals ready to eat).

Overall, the Guardsmen say they are content with their roles and even praise it as a mission providing good training for Iraq – "We're staying in a tent in the dust – it's a lot like over there."

There have, however, been some close calls. border patrol agents say that one of the indicators that Operation Jumpstart is successful is that violent attacks on officers are up at the border (a 28 percent increase in the Yuma sector alone).

"We are definitely putting a dent in their pocketbooks," says Van Wagenen, "and they are going to try to intimidate you, resort to violence."

Most assaults are rock-throwing incidents, but there have been other, more-serious incidents. In early January, for example, four armed men from Mexico approached an Arizona observation post manned by a team of four National Guard soldiers, armed with M-16s.

The incident has been controversial in that many politicians in Arizona, especially, are calling for the National Guard to become more proactive.

Still, many believe the initiative is beneficial, but wonder how long the operation can be maintained and what will happen if and when the National Guard leaves.

"Once the resources are brought in, you have to not only make the change, but those resources have to stay there to maintain the change," says Doris Meissner, a senior fellow at the Migration Policy Institute in Washington, D.C., and former commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. "You can't simply do an interruption and go back to the status quo ante and expect that it is going to hold."

Professor Cabrera agrees: "To truly gain operational control of the border – to stop unauthorized immigration in the way people speak about – will resemble a major military operation in cost and size of undertaking."

Democrats Hit Visa, Citizenship Fee Raise (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Democrats yesterday said the fee increases for naturalized citizenship and visas proposed by the Bush administration amount to a "citizenship tax" and vowed to fight it, saying taxpayers should pick up the bill for many immigrants.

Some Democrats also proposed a means-tested type of system, where those with higher incomes would pay more for citizenship or other benefits.

"Many in the immigrant community see the increase for what it is -- increasing the cost of the American dream, telling those least fortunate among us they probably need not apply," said Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat.

He and fellow Democrats said the fee increases, proposed last month by U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, will hurt poor immigrants and could force some of them to try coming to the country illegally.

"Don't you provide them an incentive to do an end-around and come here illegally?" Rep. Artur Davis, Alabama Democrat, told USCIS Director Emilio Gonzalez during a hearing held by the House Judiciary immigration subcommittee on the proposed increases.

But Democrats' options are limited. The proposed increases are in the form of an administration regulation, which means once they are tweaked and finalized by the agency some time this summer they will take effect unless both houses of Congress pass a measure blocking it.

The debate goes to the heart of the nation's legal immigration system.

USCIS' budget comes mostly from fees paid by those seeking a visa or citizenship, though Congress has appropriated some money to help with specific projects. Democrats, though, say it's time to consider changing that and having Congress spend money to cover general operations.

Mr. Gonzalez rejected that, saying a fixed appropriation would tie his hands while collecting fees allows him to be flexible -- if more people apply, he gets more fees.

He said immigrants will see almost immediate improvements in services with the higher fees, while without them the agency will return to the days with application backlogs in the millions.

"We're simply not going to be able to keep up with our workload," said Mr. Gonzalez, adding that would hurt the agency's core mission. "We're going to be suffering from a national security perspective."

Under the changes, applying for naturalized citizenship would cost $595, up from $330, and the cost for processing fingerprints and other biometric information would increase $10, to $80. The cost of some complicated applications would jump by more than $1,000.

On the other side of the ledger, Mr. Gonzalez has proposed eliminating the fee for applying for a visa as a victim of human trafficking.

Republicans generally seemed to support the increases, saying citizenship or the chance to work in America is worth it.

Rep. Lamar Smith, Texas Republican, called citizenship "one of the greatest values in the world," and Rep. Dan Lungren, California Republican, said those who are applying should be the ones who pay.

"Maybe I'm old-fashioned, but I believe one of the marks of responsibility is people pay for what they get," Mr. Lungren said.

Mr. Conyers told Mr. Gonzalez he is not likely to see any money from Congress this year because there are so many needs competing for limited dollars.

But Republicans said Mr. Conyers showed a misunderstanding of the process because USCIS isn't seeking a large congressional appropriation this year. In fact, Mr. Lungren said, Mr. Conyers' argument about competing federal needs makes the argument for why USCIS needs fee increases.

Democrats were also concerned about the effect on poorer applicants, and proposed to keep down the costs on them by charging high-income applicants much larger fees.

Rep. Bill Delahunt put forward the case of a hypothetical wealthy German businessman making $2 million a year.

"I don't mind whacking him," the Massachusetts Democrat said.

Mr. Gonzalez said USCIS already allows a waiver for applicants making less then 125 percent of the poverty level. He said 85 percent of those who apply are granted one.

Fox News, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers are lashing out at Bank of America Corp. over its new program to offer credit cards to customers without Social Security numbers, saying it creates a dangerous loophole for terrorists and illegal immigrants.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., called for a federal investigation of the program on Wednesday, sending Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff a letter requesting a review of the program.

"After September 11, we were told that money was the lifeblood of terrorists, and that we should do everything possible to block their access to financial resources," Tancredo said in a statement. "Today we are hearing a far different message: Bank of America, it's everywhere terrorists want to be."

The program welcomes applicants without a Social Security number and credit history if they have held a checking account with the bank for three months without an overdraft, The Wall Street Journal first reported in Tuesday editions.

Another Republican lawmaker criticized the program, saying it should be stopped to avoid security risks with illegal immigrant members of the program.

"If an individual wants to get a credit card, they can get that in their home country," Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn., told FOX News.

"This is something that is of deep concern to me, that Bank of America would choose to market to those that have chosen to break U.S. law to enter this country and then they would give credit to them," Blackburn said.

Bank of America stands by its program, saying that it complies with all U.S. banking and anti-terrorism laws. Rep. Ed Royce, R-Calif., said a loophole in a Treasury regulation allows Bank of America to act within the law.

"It's risking our security and it's happening because the administration and Democrats in Congress won't close this loophole," Royce told FOX News.

In 2004, Royce unsuccessfully tried to close the loophole, a provision in the Patriot Act that allows banks to use unsecured forms of identification — like the easily obtained matricula consular cards issued by the Mexican government — to open bank accounts, transfer funds and do other transactions.

"The American public should demand that this loophole be closed," Royce said, calling it a controversial flaw that allows banks to take advantage of U.S. law.

Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., said the program should be reviewed but he's a "little skeptical" that the program will threaten U.S. security.

"I think it bears looking into and obviously if there's something being done to make it easier for terrorists to strike America, we need to close that down," Bayh said. "I think we ought to not be hysterical about it until we get the facts."

The program was tested last year at five Bank of America branches in Los Angeles. It was expanded to 51 branches in Los Angeles County last week.

In Virginia, The Harm Of An Anti-Immigrant Bill (WP)

By Nancy Lyall And Teresita Jacinto

A young mother who wants to support her first-grader and get a better-paying job. A man in his late 50s who has diabetes but no access to health care. A 16-year-old day laborer who is hungry and needs winter clothes. These and thousands of others like them are the people who will be most harmed if Virginia enacts House Bill 2937.

Last month, the House of Delegates voted 70 to 29 that no organization receiving state or local funds "shall use those funds to provide benefits or assistance to ineligible persons such as undocumented immigrants." As volunteers with the Woodbridge Workers Committee in Prince William County, we regularly work with members of the immigrant community and know the disastrous effects a cutoff of state money could have for new immigrants who may lack official residency paperwork.

The immigrant population in Prince William has risen significantly in the past five years in response to the need for construction labor. Because no jobs were available back home, many immigrants are here trying to provide for their loved ones. The growing Northern Virginia economy not only thrives on their labor but also would collapse without it.

Current federal immigration policy provides no legal avenue for their presence, so many immigrant workers cross the border without authorization. Most of these people are hardworking and focused on supporting their families. But if this bill becomes law, not only will immigrants suffer but the organizations that try to help them also will be compromised.

Let's look at the lives of some undocumented immigrants:

One gentleman in his late 50s has diabetes and had no access to health care. We referred him to the Family Health Connections mobile clinic of Potomac Hospital, where he was given advice and medicine to correct his failing health. Family Health Connections is funded by public-private partnerships but also receives significant state funding. Under the House bill, this man would have been denied care and probably become seriously ill. He might have ended up in an emergency room with his care ultimately paid for by Virginia taxpayers.

Then there's the young mother with limited income who wanted to support her first-grader's education and get a better-paying job. She found year-around English classes right in her neighborhood through which she could learn to communicate with her child's school, help her child complete assignments and read simple books. She became a committed student, attending class twice a week. Under the House bill, the group that sponsors the classes would have to deny this mother services or risk losing its nonprofit status.

A 16-year-old Totonac Indian with limited Spanish skills recently arrived from his village in Puebla, Mexico. This young man had no winter clothes and hadn't eaten in three days. We referred him to the Hilda Barg Homeless Shelter, where he was fed and given warm clothes. The Hilda Barg center, which currently provides assistance to all without question, plans to discontinue clothing and food distributions if the House bill becomes law. This would be catastrophic for all who count on the shelter for help, not just undocumented immigrants.

Organizations such as Prince William Action in Community Through Service and the Salvation Army are among those that could be affected if the House bill becomes law. Although the Woodbridge Workers Committee is staffed entirely by volunteers and has never sought or received state funding, this bill would directly affect our work. Churches and other not-for-profit community groups that assist us may withdraw their support. Some of these groups themselves operate soup kitchens, participate in clothing drives, provide transportation or housing, or otherwise assist immigrants. Most community service organizations don't have the resources to implement the onerous regulations required by this legislation. Although the bill stipulates that it would affect only people over age 19, it would surely hurt children the most, as their parents would be denied any assistance.

It is scandalous to us that Del. Jackson Miller, who sponsored this bill, and others would be so callous when it comes to hungry children, those with urgent health-care needs and others who are struggling in this brutal winter. This is the opposite of good public policy. We hope the Senate will rise above the House's cynical political opportunism and soundly reject HB 2937.

TAX:

Merck Agrees To Pay IRS $2.3 Billion To Settle Tax Disputes (AP)

By Linda A. Johnson, The Associated Press

Merck & Co., mired in multibillion-litigation over its withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, has eliminated another legal headache, resolving several tax disputes with the Internal Revenue Service by agreeing to a $2.3 billion settlement.

In announcing the agreement Wednesday, the Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based company said the settlement resolves all outstanding tax disputes with the IRS, covering the years 1993 through 2006. Merck had faced potential taxes, interest and penalties totaling as much as $3.8 billion, but the agreement apparently reduced that amount.

The IRS said in its own statement that the settlement resolves all issues in dispute for the years 1993-2001.

"It can't be seen as anything but positive" for Merck to resolve the case, said analyst Steve Brozak of WPP Securities.

Merck still has a $1.76 billion tax dispute with Canadian authorities and has filed an appeal with the Canada Revenue Agency that is expected to be reviewed this year, spokesman Raymond Kerins said.

Merck had disclosed both tax cases in November in a routine filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Merck said the Canadian dispute "related to certain intercompany pricing matters."

Tax and accounting analyst Robert Willens of Lehman Brothers said in such cases drugmakers generally sell medicines at low cost to subsidiaries in countries with lower tax rates, which can then mark up the price and keep more profit after taxes.

"This is a constant tug-of-war between the IRS" and companies, Willens said.

He said Merck paid a very high percentage of the amount of taxes in dispute -- about 60 percent -- far higher than the one-third or so that is typical.

"That would suggest Merck must have felt it had a fairly weak case," Willens said.

Merck said the IRS settlement is not expected to materially affect its profit for 2007 because it had previously reserved money to cover those costs. Kerins declined to say how much was reserved and when that was done.

Brozak said the stock price likely did not shift much because the tax dispute is not as significant as other problems Merck is juggling. Those include looming generic competition to key drugs, a limited number of new ones coming to market and more than 27,400 personal injury lawsuits alleging harm from Vioxx -- the former blockbuster arthritis pill it pulled from the market in September 2004 after finding in increased risk of heart attack and stroke.

"How many things can you focus on at one given time?" Brozak said.

Merck said the IRS settlement was in the company's best interests given the uncertainty and cost of potential litigation.

The settlement relates to a subsidiary Merck set up in 1993 in tax-friendly Bermuda with a third-party investor as a way to raise capital.

Merck's November SEC filing states the IRS had notified the company it was proposing adjustments to tax returns related to the partnership; IRS was planning to disallow deductions for royalties and other expenses and to designate as taxable income money Merck reported as loans from foreign subsidiaries, among other things.

Another drug company, Britain's GlaxoSmithKline PLC, agreed in September to pay the IRS $3.4 billion in what was the largest tax settlement ever.

Associated Press Writer Andrew Bridges in Washington, D.C., contributed to this report.

Merck To Pay $2.3 Billion In Tax Case (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

Merck & Co. will pay the federal government $2.3 billion to resolve roughly a decade of disputed back taxes, in one of the largest publicly disclosed settlements between a U.S. corporation and the Internal Revenue Service.

The agreement is the latest such high-profile settlement between the IRS and a corporate taxpayer as part of a general crackdown on tax shelters. In the fall, the IRS announced a $3.4 billion deal with GlaxoSmithKline PLC to settle a dispute over the tax treatment of transactions between the British drug maker and its U.S. subsidiary. And the government has notched court victories in the past year against General Electric Co., Black & Decker Corp. and aerospace-products maker Coltec Industries Inc. over the use of tax shelters.

The agreement between Merck and the government covers taxes, interest and some penalties, settling three separate disputes spanning from 1993 to 2006 that could have totaled at least $3.8 billion, according to Merck's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The biggest of the disputes involved a complicated transaction dating back to 1993. At the time, Merck set up a Bermuda-based subsidiary with a unit of British bank Abbey National PLC, to which it transferred two lucrative patents for its cholesterol-lowering drugs Zocor and Mevacor. Merck then paid the subsidiary to use those patents. The payment stream allowed Merck to allocate taxable income to Abbey within the partnership, while not comparably reducing the income it reported to shareholders under accounting rules. Because of differences between U.S. and United Kingdom tax laws, Abbey never had to pay taxes on most of that income either, effectively permitting it to disappear between different tax jurisdictions.

The settlement announced by Merck could be bad news for Dow Chemical Co., which is in litigation with the government in U.S. district court in Baton Rouge, La., over its use of a nearly identical partnership deal. There, the IRS and U.S. Department of Justice claim the company improperly lowered its taxes by roughly $130 million by shifting income to a consortium of European banks. Dow says the arrangement was legitimate financing and is suing the government to retain the money. Dow didn't return a call requesting comment.

Merck said the $2.3 billion settlement represents its expected "final net cash cost" from the pact. The agreement is actually for $2.9 billion, the company said, but $1.2 billion is interest, and therefore tax-deductible, and $200 million had already been paid to the government. Of the total settlement, $100 million represents penalties, which prompted some observers to point out that Merck will still come out ahead.

"It's a huge settlement," said David Weisbach, a tax-law professor at the University of Chicago. But the tiny portion devoted to penalties "means there remains a strong incentive to engage in shelters even if they end up not working. Without effective penalties, they might as well take risky positions."

In an interview, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson defended the agency's approach. Although he wouldn't comment on the Merck case specifically, he said: "Any credible observer would admit that we've strengthened our enforcement in the corporate arena and high-income individuals." He added: "It's not cheap to keep litigating something year after year....You could go for broke on each and every case and litigate it until the end, but that is not sound tax administration."

In a statement, Merck said it decided to settle "so as to remove the uncertainty and cost of potential litigation."

Merck previously booked reserves for the items. It said it doesn't expect the settlement to have a material impact on 2007 earnings, or to take any charges related to the settlement.

NARROW ESCAPE How A Chastened KPMG Got By Tax-Shelter Crisis (WSJ)

By David Reilly

Timothy Flynn, a top executive at KPMG LLP, was driving to a nephew's graduation in May 2005 when he got a phone call from the chairman: The firm faced imminent criminal indictment over tax shelters it used to sell.

Then a different sort of shock. One week later, the chairman, Eugene O'Kelly, learned he had a brain tumor that left him just months to live. Mr. Flynn, a down-to-earth accountant who once led KPMG's human-resources department, was suddenly thrust into its top job, where he faced an urgent task: to somehow persuade the government not to indict. He knew that criminal charges against the firm would probably kill it, as they did Arthur Andersen after the Enron scandal.

Mr. Flynn took a gamble. KPMG had for years stoutly denied any impropriety, calling its tax advice legal. But days after taking the helm, Mr. Flynn met with Justice Department officials and acknowledged that KPMG had engaged in wrongdoing.

He got no promises in return, and the admission could have sunk the firm. Instead, it provided flexibility to the prosecutors, who were aware that the collapse of one of only four remaining accounting giants could harm the financial markets. Two months later, the government gave KPMG a deferred-prosecution deal, holding off indicting if KPMG paid a $456 million penalty and met other conditions.

KPMG now is emerging from what some at the firm call a near-death experience. Last month a judge, satisfied with the firm's reforms so far, dismissed the deferred criminal charge. Mr. Flynn has put in place stronger controls, and a former federal judge now oversees KPMG's ethics and compliance efforts. Mr. Flynn also banned a type of incentive pay that many believe helped fuel the sale of improper tax shelters. For the most part, he has managed to retain partners and clients. In November, he was able to report that the firm's revenue had grown 2% in the fiscal year ended Sept. 30.

KPMG isn't out of the woods. It still faces lawsuits from tax-shelter clients. And though the firm hasn't been indicted, some of its former executives have, and their trial in September could cast the firm in a harsh light. Defense attorneys plan to argue that the shelters had approval from top management. KPMG says, "There's no evidence whatsoever to suggest that the management committee was aware that there was fraudulent conduct involved in the sale of tax shelters."

A government-appointed monitor of KPMG gives Mr. Flynn a vote of confidence. He has proved to be "the right person at the right time," says the monitor, Richard Breeden, a former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. Flynn grew up in a tightknit family with six children in the Minneapolis suburb of Bloomington. An Eagle Scout and high-school wrestler, he attended the nearby College of St. Thomas, his father's alma mater, and, along with two brothers, followed his father into accounting.

In 1979 he took a $13,700-a-year job in the local office of Peat Marwick & Co., a predecessor of KPMG, eventually impressing superiors with his technical accounting skills and management knack. Frequently described by those who meet him as earnest, Mr. Flynn, says former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt, is like "the parish priest who became pope."

Test of Skills

A test of his skills came in 2002. As Arthur Andersen was imploding after an obstruction-of-justice indictment, accounting firms rushed to snap up its clients and partners. KPMG initially fell behind in this scramble. Mr. Flynn and Jack Taylor, then vice chairmen of KPMG's audit business, refocused the effort. First, they made a priority of signing up Andersen partners, figuring clients would follow their auditors. Then, dividing the country between them, they spent the next three months on the road, meeting with about 1,000 Andersen partners in all.

One, Dan Doherty, recalls the approach. While executives from other accounting firms simply left messages at his home, he says, Mr. Flynn took the time to talk to his wife and showed a "clear empathy for the circumstance we were in." It "wasn't just this mad rush of recruiting.... I never felt I was in the back of the line," he says.

Mr. Doherty joined KPMG. In all, about 200 Andersen partners did. KPMG snagged 395 Andersen clients, second only to Ernst & Young's haul, according to research firm AuditAnalytics Inc.

But soon, KPMG had troubles of its own. The once-staid accounting world had changed, with big firms using their audit relationships with companies to pitch more-lucrative services. Among them were tax shelters: elaborate sets of financial transactions designed to shield income from taxation.

For example, some shelters created paper losses on foreign currencies, which wealthy individuals who bought the shelters could use to offset taxable gains -- despite having never really put any money at risk. KPMG developed a sophisticated marketing operation, including a cold-call center in Fort Wayne, Ind., to push its tax products, according to a 2003 Senate report.

As the Internal Revenue Service stepped up probes of such shelters early in this decade, KPMG's accounting-firm rivals stopped offering them and settled with the government. KPMG sold shelters longer than others and insisted there was nothing wrong with its products, a stance that angered the IRS, the Justice Department and some senators.

Shifting Strategy

KPMG began to shift strategy in early 2004. Under Justice Department investigation, it forced out people who worked on the shelters and started to work toward a resolution with the government. But as the process dragged on, in late May 2005 the U.S. attorney in Manhattan sent KPMG a letter saying an indictment was imminent.

Then came the shock of Mr. O'Kelly's tumor. He stepped down, and the firm promoted Mr. Flynn, now 50 years old. He took over as chairman just three days before a meeting with Justice Department officials set for Monday, June 13.

At 7 a.m. the Saturday before, executives huddled in the Washington offices of law firm Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. Among those there to plot strategy were Mr. Flynn, new deputy chairman John Veihmeyer, and a former federal judge who'd recently joined KPMG, Sven Holmes. KPMG still hadn't made a final decision on whether to admit wrongdoing, or, if so, what form an admission would take.

One adviser, Mr. Flynn recalls, warned that an admission, once made, couldn't be rescinded. Others raised the risk of civil liability. But Mr. Holmes says he told Mr. Flynn bold action was called for, because "you only get one chance to make a first impression in a meeting like this."

All were aware Arthur Andersen had faced a similar decision in 2002. Andersen later had its conviction overturned -- in one sense, a vindication of its defiance. It was a Pyrrhic victory, as by then, partners and clients had fled and Andersen was out of business.

"I think we have to just admit wrongdoing and accept responsibility," Mr. Flynn says he finally told the KPMG group. The firm agreed that, as an executive with no direct involvement in the shelter sales, Mr. Flynn was the right person to deliver the message. Though he was on the management committee when KPMG was selling shelters, Mr. Flynn was at human resources during much of the period and was never a tax partner.

On Monday morning, he attended the meeting with the Justice officials and -- sharply changing KPMG's position -- admitted it had sold shelters that helped people evade taxes. Justice officials basically just listened.

Later that week, after a Wall Street Journal report that the Justice Department was weighing an indictment, KPMG issued a statement taking "full responsibility" for "unlawful conduct by former KPMG partners" in offering tax services. Not long afterward, Justice Department lawyers let the KPMG side know they were willing to discuss a settlement.

Now KPMG had to fight to retain clients. Executives took to the road for long stretches. Mr. Veihmeyer's wife sent clothes to him by courier as he traveled. Over the summer of 2005, Messrs. Flynn and Holmes contacted more than 100 audit clients.

One was General Electric Co., KPMG's biggest audit client and one that paid it more than $109 million in fees that year, according to AuditAnalytics. Mr. Flynn met with GE directors. According to a person who attended, his message amounted to: "There's some stuff here, it's really ugly, it happened, and here's what we're going to try to do with this situation."

GE stuck with KPMG. A spokesman for GE says it is "pleased that KPMG and its leadership have aggressively addressed the compliance issues raised in the government's tax case."

KPMG was lucky in one way. Midsummer is late in the year for big companies to make auditor switches, because it can take months to negotiate terms of an audit engagement.

Clients weren't the only concern. Many KPMG partners were angry. Any exodus of partners would make it harder to keep audit clients.

Then in early August, a memo purporting to be from unnamed current and former KPMG board members circulated. Saying Mr. Flynn lacked "backbone," it blasted management for admitting wrongdoing and abandoning partners involved. "While the leadership may believe the path to pursue is the survival of the firm at all costs, we don't," the memo said. "The actions being taken will probably result in the demise of the firm anyway."

Mr. Flynn says the memo was "hurtful" and its claims were "lies." To calm partners, he personally reached out to hundreds of them, often singling out younger ones. Michael R. Gervasio, a young tax partner in Chicago, says he was impressed as much by Mr. Flynn's persistence as by what he said. Mr. Flynn phoned eight times over two days before finally connecting with Mr. Gervasio at home at 10 one night. "We really want you to stay," Mr. Gervasio recalls being told. He did.

Later that month, August 2005, KPMG won a new lease on life: The Justice Department announced a deferred-prosecution agreement. Besides the $456 million penalty, it required KPMG to stop selling prepackaged tax products, stop doing tax returns for most individuals, shed its benefits and compensation practice, and submit to federal monitoring through September 2008.

Special Meeting

Mr. Flynn called a special meeting of partners. Such sessions typically were staged. This time, Messrs. Flynn and Mr. Veihmeyer set up computer kiosks so people could submit questions anonymously.

"Why should we trust you guys now?" asked one question at the meeting in Dallas, which had drawn nearly all of the then-1,607 partners. Others asked why the penalty shouldn't be paid just by tax partners. Mr. Flynn said they all had to "sink or swim" together, and a big fine was the price they must pay to "get their firm back."

The firm says that from June 1 to Sept. 30, 2005, just 18 partners left, excluding normal retirements and some forced out because of the tax shelters. One thing that helped keep people aboard was a post-Enron boom in auditing. Auditors now had to do more and take more responsibility -- and they demanded bigger fees to do it.

KPMG also kept most of its clients. From June 2005 through the end of the year, it lost just three companies with stock-market values above $1 billion, according to AuditAnalytics.

Mr. Flynn set about changing how the firm was run. He scrapped an incentive-pay system blamed for encouraging partners to push the tax shelters.

In a two-day January 2006 board meeting, he urged directors to rethink KPMG's governance, and they crafted 14 changes. The head of legal and compliance, currently former Judge Holmes, is now one of the firm's top four executives. The chairman and deputy chairman no longer sit on the nominating committee, limiting their ability to fill the board with their allies. The board now has a lead director who is a counterweight to the chairman.

Mr. Breeden, the monitor, says KPMG has developed a good governance system, "but it needs more seasoning to be sure that it works as well in practice as it should in theory."

Although KPMG reached a $154 million settlement with investors it sold tax shelters to, it still faces suits from several dozen investors who opted out of the settlement. It has been quietly settling some of these.

KPMG remains in a wrangle over its refusal to pay legal fees for former executives who were indicted. In that and other cases, lawyers opposing KPMG say it is a sharp-elbowed litigator, as antagonistic as ever. Michael Avenatti, who represents tax-shelter investors suing KPMG, says, "They interpret court orders in the narrowest sense and to the utmost extreme to benefit their positions." KPMG says it defends itself "as appropriate and in a professional manner."

One former critic is impressed with changes at KPMG. Former SEC Chairman Levitt once called KPMG a "rogue operation." Mr. Levitt, who has offered informal counsel to Mr. Flynn, says that the chairman "stepped into a troubled situation and by sheer strength of personality and character saved that firm from destruction."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Urges Firms To Lobby Free Trade (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, February 15, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday urged the nation's manufacturers to lobby Congress in what he said would be a difficult battle to extend President Bush's special trade authority.

The authority, which expires on July 1, allows the president to negotiate trade agreements that must be considered by Congress on an expedited basis that bars any amendments.

"I think it's going to be a tough fight," Cheney said in a speech to the National Association of Manufacturers. "We're strongly supportive of it. It's very important for us to continue to have that authority, but we're going to need help on Capitol Hill."

On another business topic, Cheney said the president would veto legislation that would make it easier to form unions. Labor activists have said they believe they can get the Employee Free Choice Act through the Democratic-controlled Congress. But they have acknowledged that it might not be signed into law under the current administration.

The legislation would require formation of a union after a majority of workers signed authorization cards. Under current law, 30 percent of workers can request an election to form a union, a process that usually takes from six weeks to six months, said AFL-CIO organizing director Stewart Acuff. Currently, a company would have to agree to allow a union to be formed based on a majority signing authorization cards.

The proposal, which was to come up for a vote Wednesday in the House Education and Labor Committee, would also impose stronger penalties on employers who violate labor laws and allow for arbitration to settle first contract disputes. Leading business lobbies such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce oppose the legislation, saying workers should vote on forming unions by secret ballot rather than signing cards or petitions.

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said employers routinely threaten and coerce employees when they try to form unions.

"The Employee Free Choice Act levels the playing field to give workers a fighting chance to have a union and bargain for better wages and benefits," Sweeney said. "It puts in place real penalties for employers that violate workers' freedom to make their own choice about a union."

In Cheney's brief speech, which was followed by a question-and-answer session, the vice president said the administration was making inroads in a dispute over China's currency policy. U.S. manufacturers contend the Chinese yuan is undervalued by as much as 40 percent, making Chinese goods cheaper in the United States and U.S. products more expensive in China.

Cheney called on the Democratic Congress to make tax cuts permanent, saying it's time for skeptics to acknowledge that tax relief has driven U.S. economic growth. He pushed the president's energy, immigration and health care initiatives that were outlined in last month's State of the Union address, and pledged to work with Congress to reduce the use of earmarks — a common Capitol Hill practice of slipping pet projects into spending bills.

The group of businessmen were especially receptive to his comments on trade.

The administration won passage of the Central America Free Trade Agreement in 2005. But, Cheney said, it was one of the hardest votes he has been involved in during his six years as vice president.

The 217-215 House vote on CAFTA showed how tough it has become to get a trade deal through Congress. It required personal appearances on Capitol Hill by Bush and Cheney and — with Democrats united in opposition — some arm-twisting of wavering Republicans to avert what would have been a devastating defeat.

"Our ability to move forward and to continue to advance the trade agenda that we've had in the past is dependent on having trade promotion authority extended," Cheney said.

Democrats, White House Clash On Trade (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

DOJ_NMG_0132465

For a time yesterday, it seemed as if a new bipartisan spirit was flowering between the Bush administration and Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill over trade policy. Until, that is, flowers themselves entered the conversation during a Valentine's Day hearing.

The U.S. trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, told the House Ways and Means Committee that she was eager to find a compromise that would satisfy Democrats demanding stricter labor protections in proposed trade deals with Colombia, Peru and Panama. She cited the benefits of expanded trade, noting that U.S. exports are booming, the economy is growing and unemployment is low.

The chairman of the committee, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) praised Schwab for agreeing to discuss the labor issue, adding his hopes that Congress would soon pass the trade deals.

But then Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs the trade subcommittee, chided Schwab for focusing exclusively on U.S. exports: What about imports? What about the people losing factory jobs as cheap goods flow in from countries where workers, he said, are exploited?

"Imports do matter," Schwab assured him. "They matter to people who went out and bought roses today for their sweetheart, where they were able to buy inexpensive flowers at Safeway or Costco, where maybe a few years ago it would have been much more expensive to buy long-stemmed roses. That's trade."

Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. (D-N.J.) took no comfort from Schwab's point. "Those very flowers come from countries that have child labor and forced labor, and that's why the prices are cheaper," he said. "And if we don't concern ourselves about that, then we are not the country we pretend to be."

That exchange illustrated the significant divide that remains over trade policy, even as Bush administration officials meet behind closed doors with House leaders to try to hash out a compromise.

Democrats, eager not to be painted as protectionists, have in recent weeks toned down their rhetoric, with leaders saying repeatedly that they want to see a new round of trade pacts approved. The Bush administration, keen to win congressional approval for recently negotiated pacts with Peru, Colombia and Panama and intent on securing deals with Korea and Malaysia, has been speaking of compromise on labor protections, the most contentious issue of the debate.

But beneath that amiable talk, substantial disagreement remains over details, according to sources in the administration and on Capitol Hill and as evidenced by the sometimes sharp exchanges during yesterday's hearing.

Previous trade deals, such as the North American Free Trade Agreement, have included side letters that say countries must not tolerate forced or child labor and must allow labor groups to form unions. But much to the consternation of U.S. labor unions, those conditions have been subject to a more lenient enforcement standard than applies to other parts of the pacts, such as those governing the lowering of tariffs.

Democratic leaders have long insisted that trade deals include core labor standards enunciated by the International Labor Organization, an arm of the United Nations: the abolition of child and forced labor, no discrimination in employment, and the right to collective bargaining.

The administration has sought to finesse the issue, discussing with congressional staff members the possibility of adding language in which governments promise to abide by similar standards but with a different kind of enforcement mechanism.

In an interview yesterday, Levin, the trade subcommittee chairman, said that would not fly: "Now, we're in the majority, and they have to step up to the plate," he said. "They haven't so far."

When, during the hearing, Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Tex.) pressed Schwab to embrace ILO standards, she demurred. "I have made a commitment to this committee to try to bridge the divide on labor standards," she said.

Schwab said the committee should be "upbeat" about data released by the Commerce Department on Tuesday showing that the U.S. trade deficit reached a record $764 billion in 2006. Looking beyond that headline, she said, will show that exports are booming to countries with which the United States has trade deals, creating jobs for Americans.

"Upbeat," Doggett repeated scornfully. "You believe that we just need to stay the course."

Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) dismissed talk of low unemployment, asserting that parts of her district have a jobless rate pushing 14 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0132466

"In Ohio, workers -- fact or fiction -- believe that their jobs are gone because of the trade policies of our government," she said. What, she asked, was Schwab doing to "ease their worry"?

Schwab acknowledged a perception problem, adding that the majority of Americans have benefited from trade.

"There is a reality," Tubbs Jones replied. "People have lost jobs because of trade."

Just In Time, Senate Passes Spending Bill (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 (AP) — The Senate on Wednesday passed a $464 billion spending bill that closes out last year's unfinished budget business while providing clues about how the new Democratic Congress and President Bush will do business.

The bill, passed 81 to 15, sticks to Mr. Bush's overall budget caps but finds numerous ways around them to add money for education, health care, food inspection, mine safety and other programs favored by Democrats and many Republicans.

It pulls together nine unfinished spending bills for foreign aid and every domestic agency budget except the Homeland Security Department. Its passage winds up work that should have been completed months ago for the budget year that started on Oct. 1.

In the interim, Congress passed several stopgap measures to keep the government running.

The Democratic chairmen of the appropriations committees led House-Senate negotiations over the first several weeks of the year to produce the bill, which freezes most agencies at 2006 levels.

If Congress had not acted this week, food inspectors, Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and air traffic controllers faced furloughs, while more than 200,000 low-income people could have lost housing subsidies.

The measure now heads to Mr. Bush, who has signaled that he will sign it even though it does not include $3 billion needed for a 2005 round of military base closings. The money would help pay for the redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases and to prepare closed bases for development.

Democrats want to debate that spending next month when Congress considers a White House request for $100 billion for the Afghanistan and Iraq wars. They also want to tack on extras, like $4 billion or so in farm disaster aid, when the appropriations committees debate the measure.

The White House, meanwhile, wants to keep the Iraq spending bill as free as possible from such add-ons, but it is likely to have to accept some Democratic priorities as the price of getting the bill passed.

Then will come the fiscal 2008 appropriations cycle, during which Democrats are certain to transfer some of the proposed $50-billion-plus increase requested for the Pentagon budget, not including war costs, to domestic programs, which are almost frozen under Mr. Bush's budget proposal.

Among the beneficiaries of the measure approved Wednesday is the National Institutes of Health, which would receive a $620 million budget increase, or about 2 percent. The F.B.I. would get a modest $200 million increase in its $6 billion budget, while the maximum Pell Grant for college students would increase by $260, to $4,310.

The rapidly growing veterans health care budget got a 13 percent increase. And United States contributions to fighting AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas would rise 40 percent, to $4.5 billion.

The bill provides increases for underperforming schools and community health centers, and grants to state and local law enforcement agencies. Amtrak's budget would be frozen at $1.3 billion instead of having to absorb a $400 million cut proposed by President Bush.

The Senate yesterday passed a $464 billion spending bill that closes out last year's unfinished budget business while providing clues about how the new Democratic Congress and President Bush will do business.

The bill, passed 81-15, sticks to Mr. Bush's overall budget caps but finds numerous ways around them to add to programs favored by lawmakers, such as education, health care, food inspection and mine safety.

The mammoth bill pulls together nine unfinished spending bills funding foreign aid and every domestic agency budget except the Department of Homeland Security.

The bill provides small but welcome funding increases to agencies that have been limping along at or below last year's funding levels in the four months since the budget year started Oct. 1. Without the measure, food inspectors, FBI agents and air traffic controllers faced furloughs, while more than 200,000 low-income people could have lost housing subsidies.

Democrats put off some costs, chiefly $3 billion to implement a 2005 round of military base closings, for a $100-billion-plus war-funding bill to be debated next month.

The measure now heads to Mr. Bush, who has signaled he will sign it despite unease over the temporary cuts to the base-closing program. The money would help pay for the redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases and to prepare closed bases for economic-development projects and other uses.

The base-closing cuts amount to a shift from the Pentagon budget to domestic accounts, and they are a sign of things to come as Democrats move ahead on the budget front.

Next up is Mr. Bush's $100 billion Iraq and Afghanistan war-funding request, which is widely expected to draw Democratic extras such as $4 billion or so in farm disaster aid when the appropriations committees debate it next month. The White House wants to keep the Iraq funding bill as free as possible from such add-ons, but it is likely to have to accept some Democratic priorities as the price of getting the bill to Mr. Bush's desk.

Then will come the fiscal 2008 appropriations cycle, during which Democrats are certain to transfer some of the proposed $50 billion-plus increase for the Pentagon budget -- not including war costs -- to domestic programs, which are almost frozen under Mr. Bush's budget.

The bill passed yesterday clears away budget work that should have been completed months ago but was delayed because of election-year pressures.

Among the beneficiaries in the spending bill is the National Institutes of Health, which would receive a $620 million budget increase. The FBI would get a modest $200 million increase in its $6 billion budget, while the maximum Pell Grant for lower-income college students would increase by $260 to $4,310.

The rapidly growing veterans health care budget got a 13 percent boost. U.S. contributions to fight AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas would rise 40 percent, to $4.5 billion.

The bill provides increases for underperforming schools and community health centers, and grants to state and local law-enforcement agencies. Amtrak's budget would be frozen at $1.3 billion instead of absorbing a $400 million cut.

Congress Passes Spending Bill; House Clears Way For Iraq Debate (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Congress cleared and sent President Bush a $463.5 billion spending bill that bears the imprint of the new Democratic majority and presages budget battles over defense and domestic priorities.

Veterans' medical services, education and health care will see spending increases even as $3.1 billion is cut from Mr. Bush's 2007 request for military-construction funds to accommodate base closings overseas.

Senate Republicans had protested the cut, but 23 of them joined Democrats on a 71-26 procedural vote Tuesday that sealed passage of the bill, which will dictate spending for the final eight months of this fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

The final Senate vote came late today as the House continued debate on a resolution challenging Mr. Bush's decision to send at least 21,500 more U.S. troops to try to curb sectarian violence in Iraq. The twin events underscore how central defense spending will be to the 2008 budget debate this spring, and how emotions over the Iraq war can make the debate more difficult for both parties.

The administration's $481.1 billion defense budget represents an 11.3% increase, not counting an additional $141.7 billion for costs of the Iraq war and other overseas military operations, such as Afghanistan. By comparison, Mr. Bush's promises just a 1% increase in domestic non-defense appropriations; with passage of the bill now and the resulting effect on 2007 spending, the White House concedes that increase will be half what it said a week ago or 0.5%.

In shaping their budget, Democrats will surely trim from the president's defense request to pay for domestic priorities. The debate is more complicated this year because of the emotions of Iraq, changes in the defense industry, and pressure for emergency funds to meet demands from Gulf Coast states still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D., N.D.) must navigate in a chamber divided by Iraq, and with only a one-vote majority in the absence of Sen. Tim Johnson (D., S.D.), who is recovering from a stroke.

"I've got a 50-49 majority until Senator Johnson gets back," Mr. Conrad says. "Can you imagine holding those 50 on the war costs alone?"

The huge expenditures for Iraq have reflected a major government investment not in the high profile ships, fighters and tanks of past military buildups, but more in trucks, body armor, and communications equipment needed for a mobile Army in this type of war.

For example, Wisconsin's Oshkosh Truck Corp. saw its defense sales rise to $1.3 billion in 2006 from $774 million in fiscal 2004, a 68% increase. As midlevel defense contractors have commanded a greater share of the budget, there is potential competition with larger players such as Lockheed Martin Corp., which takes the lead in new weapons systems such as the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which the U.S. Air Force is trying to fund in part through the president's latest Iraq war supplemental request.

A third pressure point is the aftermath of Katrina, and Democratic promises to do more to help states facing huge reconstruction costs. The administration has opened the door by incorporating some domestic disaster aid into its Iraq supplemental, and that also sets up competition with defense funds.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) said Katrina would be a priority this spring, and housing issues affecting Gulf Coast states reflect larger pent-up demand for more federal action on low-income housing elsewhere.

Antipoverty groups have supported provisions in the bill that would redistribute $460 million in housing assistance, and while some cities will be net losers, supporters argue in many cases idle funds will be put to work.

"The old approach shorted hundreds of local agencies and caused them to cut their programs, even as other agencies piled up millions of dollars in unspent funds," said Bob Greenstein, of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities in Washington. "Under the new approach, such cuts will be avoided and more families in need will be served, because the funds will be distributed far more efficiently."

Senate Belatedly Passes Spending Bill For 2007 (WP)

By Paul Kane

Four and a half months after the legal deadline, the Senate gave final approval to a 2007 spending plan that funds almost half the federal government and averts any chance of a government shutdown.

By an 81 to 15 vote, the Senate approved a $463.5 billion measure that Republicans had threatened to block out of pique for being denied a chance to offer amendments. In the end, Republicans gave in and overwhelmingly supported the spending bill, which funds a litany of popular domestic programs through Sept. 30.

Before the vote, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said that his fellow Republicans were not willing to risk a partial government shutdown over complaints about how Democrats were running the chamber.

"This is funding for about half the government," he said. "We've got to get it done and move on."

That acquiescence by Republicans puts off until next month the first big showdown between the White House and Democrats on spending, which will come as part of deliberations over President Bush's anticipated request for additional funds for the war in Iraq.

Congressional Democrats blame Republicans for leaving them a fiscal mess from last year, when Congress approved just two of the 11 appropriations bills and forced them to craft an omnibus bill that would fund a large chunk of the government for the remainder of fiscal 2007.

The fiscal year began on Oct. 1, a deadline that Congress almost always misses, but both Democrats and Republicans acknowledge that mid-February is a particularly late time to pass the remaining spending bills. Bush is expected to sign the measure by Friday, when a temporary spending bill expires.

Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) and Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), chairmen of the Senate and House Appropriations committees, reached agreement on the $463.5 billion bill that would eliminate billions of dollars worth of earmarks, the special-interest provisions inserted into appropriations bills usually with no oversight.

The spending plan would maintain funding for most federal agencies at their 2006 level, but it would add billions of dollars in funding for Democratic priorities such as veterans' health care and Pell grants for higher education.

The additional funding for Pell grants would mean an increase of $260 per year, up to $4,310, for students, according to congressional estimates. The National Institutes of Health will have an additional 500 research grants to administer because of almost $620 million in increased funding.

The spending bill does not include the standard cost-of-living adjustment in congressional pay, leaving a rank-and-file member's salary at $165,800.

When the House recently passed what is called a continuing resolution, the Republican leadership protested vehemently that they were not allowed to offer any amendments to the spending measure.

Senate Republicans made similar protests last week when they took up the bill.

Though they backed down on the spending bill, Lott warned that Reid would face an insurrection if he continued to disallow GOP amendments.

"He's trying to turn the Senate into a mini-House," said Lott, a Republican leader.

A Lack Of Will (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Senate Republican leadership met behind closed doors this week to ponder Majority Leader Harry Reid's audacious power grab on the massive catchall appropriations bill. They decided they could not filibuster the bill for fear of being blamed for closing down the government, but they still wanted enough votes opposing cloture to make an impression. That would seem a formula for defeat, and indeed it was.

The cloture vote to end debate on the bill Tuesday was 71 to 26, with 23 Republicans -- including the party's two leaders -- voting with Reid. The GOP was accepting a bill that perpetuates earmarks, masks additional domestic spending under the disguise of fiscal responsibility and establishes a precedent of prohibiting the opposition party from amending an appropriations bill.

The Republican defeat would have been a plausible outcome if Democrats held a commanding Senate majority, even as large as their edge in the House. In fact, the Senate divide is 51 to 49, with Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota hospitalized and Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut barely a Democrat. What ails Senate Republicans is lack of principle and lack of will, two reasons they lost the 2006 elections.

After the bill passed the House under procedures that prevented any serious attempts at amendment, Republican Tom Coburn of Oklahoma went to the floor as the Senate's leading spending watchdog. He said that "to make the claim that there are no earmarks in this bill is an outright falsehood that the American people should not accept." He added: "There's no transparency with these earmarks. Most Americans will never know how they got there. The lobbyists will know, the members [of Congress] will know, the campaign checks that come from them will know, but the regular American Joe won't know."

Earmarks aside, Coburn declared that it is "a lie" that "we stay within the budget" in the omnibus bill because $3.1 billion in defense funds have been transferred to domestic programs. He correctly predicted that this money will be appropriated for defense again in the next supplemental money bill "for things that absolutely have to happen with our troops."

Finally, an HIV testing program for pregnant women, sponsored by Coburn, a physician, has been eliminated. That looks like vindictiveness toward Coburn, whose campaign against excessive spending has antagonized colleagues on both sides of the aisle. To call his broad-based "baby AIDS testing" program an earmark betrays animus.

But a proposal to restore money for popular HIV testing or any other amendment cannot be offered because of a parliamentary ploy by Reid.

The arcane technique of "filling the tree" with superfluous amendments, first used a quarter-century ago by a Republican majority leader (Howard Baker), prevents any changes from being offered on the Senate floor and has contributed to the degeneration of the Senate as a deliberative body. In his brief tenure as majority leader, Reid has filled the amendment tree twice -- first on the Iraq resolution and now on the omnibus money bill. Never before had this been done on an appropriations bill.

That left Republicans with these options: bow to Reid, or block the money bill with a filibuster as today's deadline for funding the government approached. But Republicans have never quite recovered from their political disaster in the 1995 shutdown of government and do not want a repetition. Thus, Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and Minority Whip Trent Lott, while deploring Reid's tactics, voted for cloture on Tuesday -- the white flag of surrender.

Republican sources say the leadership did not want to hurt senators facing uphill reelection contests in 2008 by risking a government shutdown. That is an admission of weakness by the Republican minority as the new Congress faces its first legislative tests. With only 49 unadulterated Democrats in their seats, Harry Reid showed he could stare down the GOP.

Bush Steps Up Hill Lobbying (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

Even as Congress debates President Bush's controversial proposal to increase U.S. troops in Iraq, the White House has been quietly negotiating with key lawmakers to try to advance some of its leading domestic priorities with the hope of rounding out a legacy now defined by an unpopular war.

Bush has dispatched Cabinet officials to Capitol Hill in recent weeks to kick off talks with both Democratic and Republican Senators and House Members on immigration reform, health care legislation, energy proposals, No Child Left Behind reauthorization and Social Security and entitlement revisions. The campaign began in earnest after Bush's Jan. 23 State of the Union address.

A knowledgeable White House official this week said the administration is lobbying lawmakers more intensely than in recent years, not only because Democrats now control the Congressional agenda but because the window is narrowing to pass Bush's priorities with just two years remaining in his second term. Bush officials also recognize that this year is their best hope to advance controversial bills such as immigration reform, given the politics of the 2008 presidential election already is taking hold.

"It's a harder environment, and there is less goodwill," the White House official acknowledged. "Therefore you have to do more outreach, more hand-holding. And, you don't get as much for it."

Many of the now-majority party Democrats in Congress remain skeptical of the administration, especially after six years of virtual neglect on legislative deal making. And while some Congressional Democrats say any increase in outreach by Bush is welcome, they have yet to be convinced that the White House truly is negotiating in good faith.

"They are beginning to relearn the art of compromise," one Democratic Senate aide said. "But don't expect Capitol Hill to throw open its arms. Bush has burned too many bridges with Democrats."

The obvious skepticism doesn't appear to be deterring the Bush administration, however.

Among those spearheading the discussions with the Hill are Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on immigration reform; Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and Transportation Secretary

Mary Peters on energy and climate change initiatives; Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman on budget and entitlement and Social Security reform; and Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt and National Economic Council Director Al Hubbard on health care initiatives.

"They get an A for effort, especially in the last few months," said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.). "I've had more Cabinet members in my office since the first of the year than in the last four years, which I appreciate."

Sources indicate the administration's outreach has touched both sides of the Capitol, but given the political landscape on the Hill, the Senate may provide a better opportunity than the House for White House initiatives given the compromising nature of the chamber, and the narrow political margins that could provide better opportunities for a deal.

Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) said Bush officials have a short period of time to work with Democrats and advance a truly bipartisan domestic agenda this Congress. Wyden has been leading a group of Democratic and Republican Senators trying to negotiate with the White House on reforming the nation's health care system, a move he acknowledges will require tough compromise on both sides.

"There's a real window between now and say late October for bipartisan work on key domestic issues," Wyden said. "But the White House is going to have to move and Democrats and Republicans are open to it."

Bush spent a large share of his annual State of the Union address on his domestic agenda, a break from recent years when he has focused almost entirely on the war on terrorism and the Iraq War. At the time, the administration got mixed reviews from Congress, with some calling his proposals dead on arrival and others offering hope for success.

Even so, the focus on the home front did little to distract a Congress almost entirely centered on the state of Iraq, and Bush's plan to deploy 21,500 more troops to the region. Bush's public approval ratings have continued to hover in the 30 percent range, largely because of his policies related to the conflict, and even members of his own party have criticized his Iraq policies.

The White House official said that even with Iraq dominating the headlines and Congress' attention of late, "the Cabinet can quietly work this other stuff."

Jim Manley, spokesman to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), acknowledged that Cabinet secretaries have been making the rounds on the Hill, but said the president has yet to follow through and play an active enough role working with Congress and its new leadership. Manley said while Bush may have a chance to move some priorities like immigration reform, he will have a tough time finding a welcome audience for some of his other proposals such as health care and Social Security reform.

"There are different conversations going on over different areas, but there's no significant increase in overall outreach to the Hill," Manley said.

Reid was one of a handful of Senators and House Members who went to the White House on Wednesday afternoon to meet with Bush — a session at which Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) planned to discuss the president's proposed supplemental spending request for the war, as well as the future of immigration reform and the Democrats' technology and innovation agenda. Reid also was expected to make clear that he wants and expects Bush to provide regular face time with Hill leaders, and wants substantive meetings that invite an exchange of ideas, Manley said.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), ranking member on the Budget Committee, said he doesn't know what degree of success Bush will have for his domestic agenda this Congress, but he agreed officials "certainly have been communicating." He said he's had several White House Cabinet and sub-cabinet secretary meetings in recent weeks, and also has been engaged in talks on entitlement reform with the administration and Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.).

"Efforts are being made, I know that," Gregg said.

At least on the Bush administration's hopes for overhauling Social Security and entitlement programs this Congress, there may be a heavy lift ahead. Despite the recent outreach, Conrad in a recent hearing with Portman expressed frustration over the state of the White House talks, saying "there will not be a conclusion because then you are only asking one side fundamentally to compromise."

"If both sides aren't prepared to compromise, there will not be resolution during this administration, and that would be a tragedy," Conrad told Portman.

But Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) said that at least one of Bush's proposals is likely to move this year, saying he believes immigration reform — with the White House's recent lobbying — may have its best shot yet at winning the Congressional nod. Martinez, who on Tuesday was en route to a meeting with Chertoff on immigration, said the administration's newfound attention to its domestic priorities gives him confidence that "we can pull together on a common vision for where we want to go."

"They are more engaged than they have been at any time than they were last year," Martinez said. "They are out and about."

Democrats, Bush Should Take 'Yes' For Answer, Start Entitlement Talks (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

It's time for the Bush administration and Democratic Congressional leaders to stop talking about talking about entitlement reform — and actually start talking about reform itself.

There's agreement on both sides that beginning soon, the costs of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid benefits for the baby boom generation will put unsustainable burdens on taxpayers and the economy — and that something must be done about it.

Top administration officials including Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman and White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten all have told Congressional Democrats they want to hold talks on entitlement reform "without preconditions."

A half-dozen specific proposals have been made for bipartisan negotiations on the problem. In fact, a meeting between Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and President Bush was scheduled for Jan. 17 to begin work on a plan hatched by Sens. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

But the meeting was postponed when House Democrats "got skittish," one insider said. And then Vice President Cheney made statements on "Fox News Sunday" on Jan. 14 that Democrats took to mean the administration was ruling out tax increases as part of the solution, and the meeting wasn't rescheduled.

On top of that, Bush — who said back in 2005 that he was "open" to raising the income cap on payroll taxes — said in an interview with ABC on Jan. 30 that "I've got a veto that will prevent [Democrats] from raising taxes." That only confirmed to Democrats that the administration does have preconditions.

This whole situation reminds me of a major turning point during the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962. On the brink of World War III, President John F. Kennedy got two conflicting messages from Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev —one private and conciliatory, one public and hostile. Kennedy decided to take "yes" for an answer, leading to a stand-down.

Democrats ought to take the "everything's on the table" messages they're getting — and keep getting, in public and private — from Paulson, Portman, Bolten and Bush as a "yes" and get on with actual talks about what everyone agrees is an impending crisis that can only be dealt with on a bipartisan basis.

Democrats do feel they've conceded upfront — Conrad told me in an interview that "it is going to take more savings on the spending side than on the revenue side" to solve the problem — but that the administration is refusing to concede in advance that "revenue" has to be increased.

At the same time, while Bush resists raising taxes, Democrats are just as hostile to his proposal for private investment accounts in Social Security. That's even more of a "precondition" on the Democratic side.

Besides distrust and ideology, talks may be complicated by disagreements about the scope and order of talks — and perhaps the shape of the table.

In the House, Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) is said to be enthusiastic about broad-gauge entitlement reforms, but Budget Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.) wants to start with shorter-term budget issues.

In the Senate, Conrad thinks that Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security and health care reform all have to be considered as part of the negotiations even though Social Security reform is conceptually the easiest.

"To me, it just doesn't work" to do Social Security first, Conrad told me. "You can't give people a sense of urgency because the system doesn't go broke until 2017 or 2018 and, frankly, if economic growth continues to be strong, 80 percent of the problem goes away."

It's true that Medicare and Medicare represent five times the fiscal burden of Social Security. On the other hand, if negotiators could agree on a Social Security compromise this year, it could set the stage for more difficult agreements later.

Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) are preparing a Social Security proposal that includes middle-ground answers to that "third rail" controversy — some additional revenues, a private savings system operating on top of (not in place of) guaranteed Social Security benefits, and reducing benefits for future retirees by indexing based on longevity and income.

It's significant that the seniors' lobby, AARP, has declared that it understands Social Security can't be secured without some reduction in future benefits. That's a major new concession that Congress should take advantage of this year.

In 2006, Bush proposed establishment of a bipartisan entitlement commission — an idea Democrats rejected. Now, Sens. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) and Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) are back with commission proposals, but Gregg and Conrad prefer direct talks between Congress and the administration.

So there is still some need for talks about talks, but the main thing is to get on with real talks. Sen. Reid, call the White House.

Senate GOP Offers Its Agenda (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

Senate Republicans today will unveil their legislative blueprint for the 110th Congress, a seven-point agenda laden with traditional GOP initiatives from tax cuts to a stronger national security designed to redefine them as the party of reform.

GOP Senators, in the minority for the first time in practically 12 years, are hoping the agenda will help guide them back into the majority in just two years. Republicans believe that they lost control of the House and Senate in the 2006 elections because they lost sight of the party's principles and failed to follow through on articulating their vision to the electorate.

Republican leaders will lay out seven "challenges" Congress must address over the next two years, beginning with the war on terror and including fiscal restraint, tax relief, health care, energy security, judicial nominations and immigration reform. Senators do not intend to tick off specific bills they plan to introduce but will discuss their general goals and how to meet them, sources said.

GOP Senators have been working to put together their agenda since early January when they held their first closed-door retreat in the aftermath of losing control of Congress. Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) spent the past two months surveying Senators about priority legislation, hoping to set an outline to guide the party as it seeks to reclaim the gavel in 2008.

"Looking forward, Republicans will once again become the party of big ideas to help solve America's problems at home and abroad," Kyl and Conference Vice Chairman John Cornyn (Texas) wrote in a letter to be circulated to their colleagues today. "We will immediately begin to pursue our agenda and will reach out to Democrats in a bipartisan way whenever possible to accomplish them."

Republican Senators will call for "redoubling our efforts" to maintain a safe homeland and find victory against terrorism. The agenda also calls for restoring smart spending and eliminating wasteful spending, preventing tax increases and continuing tax relief, and expanding health care insurance opportunities and choice. The Republicans also pledge to promote energy security through production, conservation and alternative resources, renew a commitment to fair and timely votes on judicial nominations, and reform the nation's immigration policies by securing the border and restoring "the rule of law."

Sources familiar with the platform said all the GOP Senators had a hand in developing it, released both privately and publicly heading into the first weeklong recess of the Congressional session. Republican leaders anticipate Senators will discuss the new agenda with their constituents over the break and think about specific legislation they'd like to incorporate into the overarching document.

Democrats hold a razor thin 51-49 hold on the chamber, a margin that requires bipartisan buy-in on controversial matters.

With that in mind, Kyl and Cornyn give their Conference high marks for holding firm on their priorities so far this Congress, saying: "We have worked cooperatively with majority Democrats while sticking to our principles and ensuring that the legislation that passes the Senate is based on what is best for the American people, not just narrow partisan interests."

White House Looks For Faster Top-secret Clearances (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — The White House is considering making it easier for people to obtain top-secret security clearances by eliminating some time-consuming background checks, says the Bush administration's point man on clearances.

The goal, says Clay Johnson III, deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget, is to speed up a process that, according to a series of government reports, wastes millions of dollars and endangers public safety by leaving thousands of defense, homeland security and intelligence jobs unfilled for more than a year.

Johnson plans to report to Congress today that the executive branch is making "significant progress" toward clearing a backlog of uncompleted clearance applications that government contractors and others say exceeds 350,000.

Three million federal workers now require security clearances for jobs ranging from routine computer system maintenance to sensitive analysis of spy satellite photos. All require at least a background check of personal and work history, foreign travel and finances. Top-secret clearance currently requires interviews with neighbors, references and current and former spouses.

A committee is considering eliminating interviews with neighbors and character references in cases where a candidate is cleared by other parts of the investigation, such as checks of criminal and financial records, Johnson says. "Do we really need to talk to five neighbors (of a candidate)? Do we really need all the colleges (the candidate attended)?" he asks.

Change 'overdue'

Clearances are "long overdue" for an overhaul, says Rep. Tom Davis, of Virginia, the top Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. Davis' district in the Washington suburbs includes thousands of government workers and contractors.

The delays in approving security clearances cost taxpayers "millions and millions," Davis says, as work goes undone and civilian contractors who already have clearances command higher salaries and big hiring bonuses.

Johnson's report today is required by a December 2004 intelligence-reform law that said 80% of clearance applications should be investigated, granted or rejected within 120 days.

Despite Johnson's claim of significant progress, contractors who supply workers for jobs that require clearances aren't seeing much improvement, says Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, an industry group. Evan Lesser, whose website, ClearanceJobs.com, caters to workers with clearances, says the backlog of uncleared applications is about 350,000 — virtually unchanged over the past two years.

"The system continues to be something that needs adult supervision," Davis says.

David Alston agrees.

Alston, 47, an information specialist from Iselin, N.J., outside New York City, thought he had landed a job late last year working on an Air Force e-mail system.

Alston had experience in the system the Air Force used. He didn't, however, have a current security clearance. To get one would take a year or more, the Air Force contractor who posted the job told Alston. Sorry, the contractor said, he would keep looking.

"It's maddening, unbelievably frustrating," says Alston, who has found temporary work as a limousine driver. "There are a ton of good (government) jobs out there. But if you don't already have a clearance or unlimited time to get one, you can pretty much forget about it."

Contractors pay a premium for workers with current clearances, often offering higher salaries and signing bonuses. That can cost an extra $10,000 to $40,000 per employee per year, all of which gets passed on to taxpayers, Davis says.

Delays in clearances are harming national security, Davis says. As more government departments have hired private contractors to do added work after 9/11, delays often mean some jobs don't get done.

One Pentagon office, the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency, has a more than 540-day backlog, according to a report filed last month by the Senate Intelligence Committee. Congressional and outside panels have criticized the agency, which analyzes images from spy satellites, for previous intelligence failures

Unless they bring a security clearance with them, contractors set to work for any agency also have to get in line. "There's no way (the backlog) doesn't impact on security," Davis says.

Outdated procedures

Critics of the clearance backlog say outdated security requirements are partly to blame.

World War II and Cold War-era rules still require extensive background checks for recruits who were born outside the USA or who have close family members overseas, says Tim Roemer, a Democratic former House member who was on the commission that studied pre-9/11 intelligence failures.

Those rules make it difficult for intelligence agencies to tap first-generation Americans with families in the Middle East, South Asia and other places where background checks are difficult, Roemer says.

"The intelligence community has to go from a risk-averse (clearance) system to a risk-management system," says Roemer, now president of the Center for National Policy in Washington.

The rush to clear the backlog, however, may be producing problems of its own.

Last year, the Government Accountability Office examined a random sample of 50 background investigations for top-secret clearances and found that 47 lacked one or more pieces of key documentation. In one case, investigators failed to pursue information suggesting that one applicant had had extramarital affairs and defaulted on "several thousand dollars" in loans.

In another case, an applicant who was known to have visited relatives "in an Asian country" was unable to supply their names or, in one case, a relative's home city. There was no record that the investigator followed up.

Justice Kennedy: Yes To Judicial Pay Hikes, No To Cameras At High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 15, 2007

In a rare appearance Wednesday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy made an impassioned plea for increasing judicial salaries and against allowing cameras in the Court.

The failure of Congress to give federal judges meaningful raises in recent years is "threatening the excellence of the judiciary," Kennedy said, adding that the traditional linkage between the salaries of judges and members of Congress "has hurt the judiciary very badly."

The Judiciary Committee says Kennedy's appearance marked the first time "in modern history" that a sitting justice has testified before the committee on legislative matters.

As for cameras in the Court, Kennedy said more than once, "We don't want it!" to the committee, whose ranking Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill last month that would require cameras at Court proceedings. "Please, senator," Kennedy continued, pointedly urging the Senate not to introduce the "insidious temptation" for justices to shape their comments and questions from the bench into catchy sound bites.

Kennedy has made similar points in the past, but his impassioned tone before the senators reached a level he usually reserves for students he lectures about the rule of law. The topic for the hearing was billed as "judicial security and independence," but the two-hour session ranged far and wide in subject matter.

Kennedy said that when the committee first asked Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. if a justice could testify, it gave the Court "some pause." But the justices decided it was worth doing. "This is an important time for the judiciary," Kennedy said, making it clear that the salary issue was foremost.

While recognizing "the intangible rewards of public service," Kennedy said the current salaries are undermining the ability to recruit judges from "the finest ranks of the practicing bar." Current pay for federal district court judges is $165,200, appeals judges are paid $175,100, associate justices earn $203,000, and the chief justice gets $212,100 a year. He angrily noted that Supreme Court law clerks often earn more than justices the first year after they leave the Court.

Justice Stephen Breyer, Kennedy said, told him recently that the ability to teach was another intangible benefit of being a federal judge. But Kennedy said that, ironically, judges -- whose pay used to exceed that of professors -- are being lured off the bench into academia. Without mentioning his name, Kennedy cited David Levi, who announced in January that he will be leaving his post as the chief judge of the Eastern District of California to become dean of the Duke University School of Law.

Committee Chairman Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said he had already introduced a bill calling for a cost-of-living increase for judges, and he agreed with Kennedy that congressional reluctance to give judges raises without also enacting raises for themselves should end. "The courts should not be held hostage to Congress," Leahy said.

Specter also pledged that legislation to fix the pay situation would pass in this session of Congress.

Specter went on to urge Kennedy -- and through him, the full Court -- to see the wisdom of requiring cameras in the Court, telling the justice that "the court's functions ought to be better understood." But Specter also linked his campaign for cameras with his longstanding grievances about the Court's recent run of overturning acts of Congress. Specter singled out, as he often does, the Court's 2000 decision in United States v. Morrison, in which the Court struck down a part of the Violence Against Women Act. Allowing cameras to broadcast oral arguments, Specter suggested, might help the public comprehend rulings like Morrison.

In his reply, Kennedy, with remarkable frankness, pushed back against Specter's point, telling him that linking the Morrison case with the need for cameras was "a non sequitur . ... It doesn't follow."

Kennedy acknowledged that the Court "probably should do more in the way of teaching" about its workings but said camera access was not the way to do it. With fervor, Kennedy said oral arguments are "a way of using the attorney to have a conversation with ourselves and with the attorney" -- a dynamic that would be ruined by the presence of cameras.

"We are judged by what we write," Kennedy said, not by questioning during oral argument.

Specter seemed taken aback by Kennedy's strong resistance. If Congress did pass his bill, Specter said in a conciliatory tone, "it would be our opinion," which could then be overtaken by "your opinion." Specter did not explain the comment.

On another subject, Specter asked Kennedy to account for the Court's reduced docket of argued cases -- 75 to 80 per term, or roughly half the number it was deciding 20 years ago. Kennedy said he was somewhat mystified himself why the Court was not agreeing to resolve more conflicts between the circuit courts of appeal. But he said the dearth in recent years of new and complex federal statutes -- which often generate multiple cases -- is one possible explanation for the smaller docket. Another, he said, is that "we understand the boundaries of the administrative state," requiring fewer decisions on deference to executive agencies and other administrative law issues.

Kennedy did note that the Court had recently granted review in a batch of new cases, which he said signifies that "we're climbing back" toward a docket closer to 100 cases per term.

Security Needs Swell Federal Work Force (FEDTIMES)

By M.Z. HEMINGWAY

Federal Times, February 15, 2007

The ranks of federal employees will grow again under President Bush's proposed 2008 budget. In all, the budget proposes a net increase of 13,000 employees in 2008.

Much of the hiring would be for homeland and national security programs: border protection, intelligence, military support and counterterrorism, among others.

The Homeland Security Department's Customs and Border Patrol would get money to hire an additional 3,000 Border Patrol agents.

And Customs and Border Patrol would get 300 more CBP officers to manage ports of entry. That number should be several thousand higher to meet staffing needs at ports of entry, said Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union.

"The relative handful of additional positions for CBP officers contained in this budget proposal pales in comparison to the pressing need for more staffing at the nation's land, air and sea ports of entry," she said in a statement.

Homeland Security's Citizenship and Immigration Services is seeking an additional 600 adjudication and support employees to process applications for immigration benefits and services. There also are increases for aviation and transportation security.

The Commerce Department has plans to hire 3,400 employees. Of those, 985 would go to the Patent and Trademark Office to help reduce the time it takes to process patent and trademark applications, which has been increasing. And the Census Bureau would boost its ranks by 2,200 as it prepares for a practice census in 2008 and begins opening field offices for the 2010 census.

The Health and Human Services Department is seeking more than 400 additional employees for the Food and Drug Administration's program on generic-drug safety, another 400-plus employees to fight bioterrorism and prepare for pandemic influenza at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and another 100 staff at health care facilities run by the Indian Health Service.

The Justice Department asks for 231 new FBI counterterrorism and intelligence agents, but the overall department work force will decline, mostly at the FBI and federal prison system.

The Transportation Department's Federal Aviation Administration plans to bring on an additional 400 personnel for the air traffic control and safety work forces and to help with contract oversight.

But some agencies would lose employees. The biggest loss would be at the Agriculture Department, which would lose about 4,700 staff positions.

The Forest Service would lose 2,126 staff, a cut of $363 million. "We'll most likely manage reduction through natural attrition and by not bringing on seasonal workers," said Forest Service budget director Lenise Lago.

Bush proposed a cut of 2,000 full-time employee equivalents at the Natural Resources Conservation Service. But agency spokesman Terry Bish said the numbers reflect the lack of a new farm bill, through which the agency is funded. The current farm bill expires this year.

"We need to have a farm bill before we can put a real [employment] number out there, and it's in negotiation right now," Bish said.

Generic Drugs Law Plans Threaten Makers (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Christopher Bowe

Financial Times, February 15, 2007

Big pharmaceutical companies are facing a barrage of legislative proposals that could have a dramatic impact on the industry's future earnings power and open doors to one of its biggest threats: generic drug manufacturers.

A proposal set to be unveiled on Wednesday by Hillary Clinton, the Democratic presidential hopeful, and a bipartisan group of lawmakers would allow generic drugmakers to manufacture cheaper versions of biotechnology drugs produced by companies such as Amgen and Genentech.

The proposal, which aims to cut the cost of high-priced biotech drugs, would empower the Food and Drug Administration, the US chief drug regulator, to approve the generic versions of biotech drugs, also known as follow-on biologics. Opponents, led by the Biotechnology Industry Organisation (Bio), say the proposal raises safety questions and threatens to hamper the willingness of branded biotechnology companies to innovate.

"I think it is natural that those who pay for healthcare – whether it is the government or insurance plans or individuals or employers – are looking for savings. What we have to be careful about is that we don't put the savings cart before the safety horse," says Jim Greenwood, chief executive of Bio.

Although the proposal was introduced and failed to pass under the Republican-controlled Congress, some analysts say increasing pressure from voters about the high cost of drugs could give new impetus to proposals that might strengthen the generic industry and lead to cheaper drugs.

A separate effort by a bipartisan group of lawmakers in the Senate that would prohibit big branded drugmakers from paying generic rivals to stay out of their markets is also gaining traction. If passed, the law would close the door on a practice that some regulators have complained allows branded drugmakers to thwart competition and keep drug prices artificially high.

The fight between branded drugmakers, including biotechnology groups, and generic drugmakers centres around two issues: the requirements determining how quickly a so-called biogeneric is approved, and what exactly constitutes a generic version of a biotech drug.

Both issues stem from branded drugmakers' argument that biologic drugs are reproductions of human proteins, whose structures are complex, never clearly defined and dangerously variable in their production from company to company. Biologics are made by using living cells that are genetically triggered to produce a specific protein identified to help an illness.

The generic drug industry counters that it is not as complex as biotech drugmakers contend and that they can safely produce their own "generic" versions of the branded biologics to treat disease. However, they add that in order to be able to offer them at lower-cost generic prices the US regulators must give them a fast-track approval process.

Generic versions of traditional pharmaceuticals are approved without the need for long, expensive clinical trials, but biotech drugmakers argue that the variability in producing proteins from live cells warrants that generic drugmakers should prove in expensive clinical trials that their protein is equivalent.

Last year, European regulators laid guidelines for approval of follow-on biologics. But without new legislation in the US, many analysts estimated that biogenerics might not reach the world's biggest drug market until at least 2010 as the FDA carefully worked to codify rules on how to approve follow-ons to biotech treatments.

Legislation Calls For Cheaper Biotech Drugs (USAT)

By Julie Schmit

USA Today, February 15, 2007

Congressional support is building to bring generic competition to life-saving biotech drugs that can cost thousands of dollars a year.

Legislation introduced Wednesday in the House and Senate would give the Food and Drug Administration the ability to approve cheaper copies of biotech drugs. Biologics, such as insulin and cancer drug Herceptin, are based on living cells, while traditional drugs are made from chemicals.

But biologics have been immune from generic competition partly because the FDA doesn't have authority to approve copies.

The proposal is likely to face opposition from biotech companies. They say true generics aren't possible because biologics come from complicated living organisms. Small manufacturing changes can also produce significant changes in final products, they add.

Biotech supporters also say that the FDA should require generic makers to do rigorous testing to prove to the agency that the copies are safe and effective. That usually isn't required for generic versions of traditional drugs. Such tests make up the bulk of the estimated $1 billion needed to bring a biologic to market, says James Greenwood, CEO of the Biotechnology Industry Organization.

The legislation says the FDA could approve "comparable" copies without rigorous testing if the FDA is satisfied that they would produce the same effects in patients.

Despite the measure's bipartisan backers, Citigroup analyst Paul Heldman said in a research note Wednesday that its passage in 2009 is more likely than this year.

Even with a new law, biologic copies are not likely to be as cheap as traditional generics, says Eric Bolesh of consulting firm Cutting Edge Information.

Small Business Administration Scolded For Katrina Response, Disaster Plan (USAT)

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — Poor planning, staff training and logistics hampered the Small Business Administration's response to the 2005 Gulf Coast hurricanes, resulting in a backlog that reached more than 200,000 loan applications, the Government Accountability Office said Wednesday.

In a 41-page report on the beleaguered agency, the GAO cited recent improvements under new Administrator Steven Preston but said the SBA still lacks a timetable for completing a disaster management plan. It scolded the agency for not relying more on simulations and models of catastrophes.

Asked if the SBA is prepared for the next big disaster, the GAO's William Shear told the House Small Business Committee, "We don't know yet."

The SBA came under heavy criticism in the months after Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans and the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, 2005. Small businesses, homeowners, members of Congress and even some agency employees complained about a computer system that broke down repeatedly and restricted access to a small number of staff even when it was running. Former administrator Hector Barreto resigned in April.

Preston said Wednesday that vast improvements have been made to the computer system. He said the agency has 2,200 staffers in its disaster loan program, compared with about 800 before Katrina. Another 750 are trained and able to respond within 48 hours.

The average processing time has been reduced from 74 days to 14, and 98% of approved applicants have received low-interest loans or chosen not to borrow, thanks in part to a streamlined case-management system. "We are now able to connect a loan and a document to a face and a story," Preston said.

That was disputed by Donna Colosino, co-owner with her husband, Matt, of a small power equipment company in New Orleans. Their company was swamped by more than 12 feet of water when a nearby levee failed after Hurricane Katrina. She said they have received only $10,000 of their approved $250,000 loan but must provide receipts up to the full amount and will soon be required to make payments on it.

In New Orleans, she said, such a story "wouldn't raise an eyelash." Lawmakers, however, said they would demand answers from the SBA within two weeks. Her story, said Rep. Charles Gonzalez, D-Texas, "could be very, very representative of what's going on out there."

The SBA has approved 160,000 of 422,000 applications for a total of $10.8 billion, with about 22,000 still pending. More than half the applicants were turned down, mostly because of poor credit or projected inability to repay. In most of the pending cases, homeowners or businesses haven't decided on their next move, Preston said.

Even so, local banks are getting more business from storm victims who have given up on the SBA. Their interest rates are higher than the SBA's usual 3%, but "The businesses need the cash more than they need the low cost of capital to survive," said Edward Francis, chief commercial officer of Hancock Holding of Gulfport, Miss.

Colosino could have gotten a bank loan "within weeks after the storm," Francis said.

Serving In The House And Keeping Up With A Household (WP)

By Lois Romano

In this new, kid-centric House of Pelosi, Rep. Debbie Wasserman-Schultz is not a bit self-conscious about trying to raise her young family from afar while serving in Congress.

It didn't faze the Florida Democrat, for instance, to be pulled out of a meeting with Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) in order to arrange a ride for her son to baseball practice -- in Florida. (She got her dad to do it.) Nor when she conducted Saturday business meetings at her daughter's dance studio.

Not even when she volunteered to lead her daughter's Brownie troop -- and then planned all the meetings around the congressional schedule.

Although a record 87 women serve in Congress today, there are still only a handful who are faced with balancing the pressures of politics and mothering young children. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi did not run for Congress until her children were grown, often the case with women who have served in Congress. The House floor may have been packed with kids on the day the members were sworn in, but most were the offspring of the gentlemen of the House.

Among the few female members with little ones: Freshman Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) resolved her balancing act by moving her 3-year-old son to Washington, where he attends the House child-care center. Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), a single mom, opted to leave her 4-year-old daughter back in Ohio, where extended family can care for the girl, a spokeswoman said.

Wasserman-Schultz, 40 and in her second term, may have it the roughest, trying to be hands-on mother 1,000 miles away to three children -- 7-year-old twins and a 3-year-old. She says her husband, a banker, does heroic work to hold the family together -- but an enormous amount of logistical planning falls to her.

She is running the Brownie meetings, she said, because "I don't want my kids to feel I didn't make every effort." And she says her children have indeed noticed that the House is now working a five-day week and that she's around even less.

Wasserman-Schultz was forced to defend her choices when she first ran for Congress in 2004 and her female opponent suggested that Wasserman-Schultz should not be elected because she would not have enough time to devote to Congress because of her children.

"She was trying to make me look bad," Wasserman-Schultz said.

Now Wasserman-Schultz proudly incorporates her response to the complaint in her speeches: "I may not always have a pen in my purse, but I always have crayons."Taking Up the Torch for the Late Lawmaker

The day before Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.) died of cancer this week, he reintroduced legislation commonly known as a "Patients Bill of Rights" with Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), six years after their last alliance on the issue went up in flames.

Norwood -- long a proponent of giving patients the right to sue health plans -- first introduced the measure in 1998. In 2001, he teamed up with Dingell on a different version of the bill, but it lost Democratic House support when Norwood abruptly jumped ship and agreed to a GOP compromise to avoid a presidential veto.

Dingell said yesterday that Norwood "was a friend and a decent guy, and if this is what he wants, I'm going to try and do it for him."

Last month, Norwood wrote an opinion piece published in Georgia weekly newspapers stating: "There is no reason we can't pass the original, uncompromised bill with a veto-proof majority. . . . If the Democrats can use their new majority to pull that off, they will and should score big with the public."Frankly, Never Short on Quips

Rep. Barney Frank (D), the outspoken liberal congressman from Massachusetts, last week got a little personal with North Carolina conservative Rep. Patrick McHenry (R) -- with whom he has clashed before.

In a tense exchange on the House floor about whether Pelosi should get a government plane to commute to California, McHenry demanded to know why Congress should allow "one person to use a 737 for a $300,000 transcontinental flight." As an angry Rep. Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.) stepped up to defend Pelosi, Frank unexpectedly went to a microphone and shouted out a reference to the old TV show "Fantasy Island" and its 3-foot-11 character, Tattoo.

"I just wanted to explain I hadn't really been expecting to be here," Frank bellowed to startled members. "But as I was walking by I thought I heard someone yelling, 'Da plane, boss, da plane,' " Frank said, mimicking what Tattoo would shout on the show.

The floor broke into distinct but uneasy laughter, as many realized Frank was referring to McHenry's diminutive height. A spokesman for McHenry later called Frank one of the "sharpest minds on Capitol Hill" and said he was sure Frank was just trying to lighten the moment.

Frank explained: "When I invoked one of the great moments in American cultural history . . . I did have Mr. McHenry in mind. I was inspired by his total persona and all of its aspects."Fighting Global Warming, One Office at a Time

Here's how it works: By contributing $642 to two renewable-energy projects in his home state, Welch will offset his offices' use of old-fashioned energy -- and therefore, theoretically, make no net contribution to greenhouse gases.

Welch figured energy used at his offices necessitated the emission of 56 metric tons of carbon a year (the equivalent of 10 cars on the road) and calculated the cost to offset the emissions.

Since he is forbidden to use funds from his federal office budgets, Welch will pay the $642 out of pocket. "We're prohibited from having expenditures that would clean the air," said the lawmaker who aims to fix that.

Welch has introduced legislation to authorize congressional offices and federal agencies to account for their environmental impact through such offset programs.Honoring Young Ted at 75

Hard to imagine: The youngest of the Kennedy clan, the scion who glided into Congress in 1962 at age 30 to complete the term of his brother who was elected president, will turn 75 this month. To celebrate, 750 former aides and politicos will honor (and roast) Sen. Ted Kennedy tomorrow night at the reunion of sorts in Russell Building's Caucus Room. This is only the second time the staff has gotten together -- first for his 25th anniversary in the Senate, now for his 45th.A Catering Lawyer Who Can Parse House Ethics Rules

Just when you thought there couldn't be any more exceptions to the new House ethics rules, comes the "toothpick" caveat -- and a business to capitalize on it.

While members and staff are prohibited from receiving gifts or meals from lobbyists or those who employ them, they may accept "food or refreshments of a nominal value" such as the kinds of food offered at receptions. Sean Clancy, a tax lawyer at Patton Boggs who owns a year-old catering business, quickly sent an e-mail last weekend to 1,000 prospective clients touting Just Fresh Bakery Cafe & Catering, and its "toothpick rule-compliant" menu.

"We don't stick a toothpick in a sandwich and say it's not a meal," he explains. "These are bite-size pieces. We want to stay within the letter of the law, and at the same time point out the ridiculousness of it all."

There's Much Huffing Over Puffing On Hill (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Smoking has become the hot topic on Capitol Hill.

Who is, who isn't, and where the lawmakers puff -- closeted or not -- are among the whispers in the hallways and on the presidential campaign trail.

There have been at least 35 news reports about Sen. Barack Obama's long battle with a cigarette habit, and how the Illinois Democrat has been chewing Nicorette to kick that habit as he runs for president.

And in the latest installment, staffers for Rep. Keith Ellison tattled to Capitol Police that Rep. Tom Tancredo was smoking a cigar inside his congressional office.

"We already have the biggest air-purifying unit you can get, and I would be happy to try to make sure that it's even less odiferous around here, but I'm not going to stop because we still have the right to do so," Mr. Tancredo, Colorado Republican, told The Washington Times.

An officer investigating the report informed Mr. Ellison, Minnesota Democrat, that smoking is allowed in the private offices, the Hill newspaper first reported yesterday.

Calling his office in the Longworth building "our own little castle," Mr. Tancredo said he would have preferred a personal visit from his next-door neighbor.

Mr. Ellison's office did not respond to calls for comment yesterday, but spokesman Rick Jauert told the Hill that he first called the Capitol superintendent when he noticed smoke "coming through the walls." That office referred Mr. Jauert to the police, and he informed his boss that he had made the report.

Mr. Tancredo said he has never met Mr. Ellison, who has gotten his fair share of headlines.

In November, Mr. Ellison became the first Muslim in recent times to be elected to Congress. Then, Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican, protested Mr. Ellison's use of the Koran for his swearing-in. In a letter to constituents, Mr. Goode complained that if strict immigration laws are not enacted, "more Muslims" will be elected and will demand "the use of the Koran."

The dust-up created national headlines and highlighted philosophical differences on immigration policy.

Mr. Tancredo noted that the only time he has even referenced Mr. Ellison was to defend his use of the Koran.

But the Colorado congressman has a friend in Mr. Goode, who delivered a gift to Mr. Tancredo's office after learning of the cigar incident.

Mr. Tancredo said that he knew the envelope from Mr. Goode contained a cigar, but that he hadn't yet read the letter. He opened the note and read it to a reporter for The Times.

"We have a policy in my office of allowing one to smoke from tobacco country if he or she so chooses," Mr. Tancredo read from the letter, pausing to stifle laughter. "We extend this courtesy to an outstanding presidential candidate. Hope you can use it in your office. If you can't, come on up to mine."

Others, including Minority Leader John A. Boehner, have felt like pariahs lately, especially since Speaker Nancy Pelosi banned puffing in the Speaker's Lobby off the House floor.

Mr. Boehner, a chain-smoking Ohio Republican, told reporters gathered for the Washington Press Club Foundation dinner last week that he isn't fond of Mrs. Pelosi's decision.

"We can still smoke out on the balcony. But, Nancy, it was 20 degrees out there. I think I want a seat on your global warming committee," he told the California Democrat.

Maureen Dowd of the New York Times opened her latest column thus: "Barack Obama looked as if he needed a smoke and he needed it bad."

After a long Chicago Tribune story about Mr. Obama's smoking, ABC News did a piece on its Web site about Michelle Obama demanding that her husband quit those Marlboros before embarking on a rigorous campaign for the White House. Both articles quoted numerous health advocates and pundits analyzing whether a candidate should admit to such vices.

Reporters trailing Mr. Obama to Iowa last weekend made sure to note this comment by the presidential hopeful: "I've been chewing Nicorette all day long."

An article on Slate.com last month even speculated that should Mr. Obama quit, he would lose his trademark deep voice -- identified by the Web site as "authoritative but comforting, rich and resonant and wise."

FEDERAL DIARY; Working, Or Not, With Everyone's Safety In Mind (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Washington weather has long vexed the directors of the Office of Personnel Management and yesterday's gray icy slush was no exception.

Linda M. Springer, the OPM director, was up at 4 a.m., listening to a last round of reports on the weather, road and mass-transit conditions. As with her predecessors through the years, she was trying to look out for federal employees and keep the government open for business.

"When will it be safe for federal workers to commute into their offices? That is the bottom-line question for me," Springer said yesterday.

Springer began sorting out her options at 9 p.m. Tuesday after she received her first reports on the sleet and ice storm moving into the region. That same day, the OPM had closed the government early, at 2 p.m., after weather forecasts showed it might be wise to get as many employees as possible off roads before dark.

After the Tuesday night call, Springer asked the staff at the OPM's situation room to develop information that would help her choose among three options for the next day: open the government on time, but with an unscheduled leave policy in effect; open late with unscheduled leave; or not open. (Unscheduled leave is a way for employees to take time off without prior approval from a supervisor.)

Early yesterday, she chose to open the government after a two-hour delay, after hearing predictions on the path of the storm and assurances that roads and mass transit "would be in much better shape than at the normal start time."

With a two-hour delay, many employees were more likely to have safer commutes, she decided. "We're saying you [the public] can count on normal functions and services after that two-hour delay, but individuals can recognize their own individual situations at their residence and their commute area to make a decision to take a day of leave," Springer said.

Although federal agencies did not have head counts of how many employees came to work yesterday, officials acknowledged that some offices were thinly staffed.

"It's quiet," Nicol Andrews, a spokeswoman for the Agriculture Department, said. "But there are plenty of us around to make sure the trains are still running."

The judgment on whether to open or close the government can be easily second-guessed by employees, especially when schools close. Yesterday, on Federal Diary Live at washingtonpost.com, employees posted messages saying their commuter buses had been canceled or were running only on emergency routes. Others said that downtown streets were not properly cleared for morning commutes and that slippery streets were sometimes dangerous to cross.

With about 300,000 federal employees in a region that stretches from southern Maryland to West Virginia, the OPM cannot make weather-related decisions lightly because of economic and workforce productivity concerns. The federal payroll is about $76 million a day in the Washington area, and some companies and nonprofit groups take their cues from the OPM on when to open for business.

February, in particular, seems to be a troublesome month for OPM directors.

In 2003, a huge snowstorm, measured at 16 inches to 24 inches, walloped the region over the President's Day weekend, closing federal offices for a day. In 2005, the government opened on time Feb. 24, only to close at 1:15 p.m., after road conditions took a turn for the worse as a storm dumped six inches of snow in some parts of the region.

As the then-acting OPM director, Dan G. Blair, said: "I wish it was a pure science, but it is not. It's always a best guesstimate."Whistle-Blower Bill Approved

A bill that would expand whistle-blower protection rights to federal employees in intelligence agencies and federal contractors was approved yesterday by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. The vote to send the measure to the House floor was 28 to 0.

Parts of the bill are designed to clarify congressional intent as to what type of whistle-blowing is protected. An amendment, approved on voice vote, would permit whistle-blowers to take their cases to the U.S. appeals court in their area, ending the sole jurisdiction of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, not far from the White House.

Advocates for whistle-blowers argue that the federal circuit court has interpreted the laws in a way that makes it almost impossible for federal employees to defend themselves from reprisals when speaking out on waste, fraud and abuse.

"The Government Reform Committee lived up to its name today," said Tom Devine, legal director for the Government Accountability Project, an advocacy group. "Now it is up to the House leadership to do the same thing."

Minimum Wage, Minimum Tax Cuts (NYT)

In the coming week, the House is expected to pass a bipartisan bill aimed at scaling down the unwise tax cuts that the Senate has demanded in exchange for raising the federal minimum wage. The House measure contains only modest tax cuts, worth $1.3 billion over the next 10 years, and is focused on the small businesses that are most likely to be harmed by a higher minimum wage, like mom-and-pop restaurants. We would have preferred a straightforward minimum wage increase. But the House bill is a reasonable response to the Senate's refusal to move forward without tax cuts.

Whether senators will find the moral clarity to see it that way is another matter.

In Round 1 of this year's effort to raise the minimum wage, the House passed a clean bill, raising the wage from the pitiful $5.15 an hour, where it has been stuck for 10 years, to $7.25 by 2009. In Round 2, the Senate refused to follow the House's lead. Acting as if the midterm elections had never happened, it passed a bill that pairs the wage increase with special-interest tax cuts priced at $8.3 billion over the next 10 years.

The ultimate cost would probably be much higher because most of the proposed tax cuts were designated as "temporary." If those temporary measures were renewed — and temporary tax cuts are almost always renewed— the 10-year cost of the Senate's bill would reach $47.5 billion.

And that's not the only way the Senate bill is objectionable. Many of the Senate's proposed tax cuts would do more for big business, which is largely unaffected by a rise in the minimum wage, than for the typical small business. Big chain stores and big landlords would be the hands-down winners from proposed tax breaks for building new retail stores and new restaurants, and for improving existing structures.

Moreover, the tax cuts that small businesses may be able to latch onto are overly broad, rather than narrowly targeted. As such, they conflict with many senators' recent pledges to close the tax gap, the estimated $300 billion in taxes that are owed but unpaid. It's common knowledge that much of the gap is due to unreported cash and overstated deductions from self-employed people, family businesses and family farms. It makes no sense to grant broad tax cuts to taxpayers in that group until lawmakers find ways to ensure that they are paying their fair share to begin with.

The No Child Left Behind Act of 2002 — which requires states to close the achievement gap between rich and poor students in exchange for more federal dollars — is the most far-reaching educational reform since the country embraced compulsory education in the early 20th century.

But it is unlikely to succeed unless Congress strengthens the law and puts a lot more money behind it when it moves to reauthorize No Child Left Behind later this year.

The bipartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind, financed by several private foundations to evaluate the law's effect, has come up with a list of 75 specific and much needed suggestions on how to improve teaching, learning and student performance, and on what the states need to do better to help schools meet the law's requirements.

The report calls for the development of rigorous, voluntary national standards that would more effectively prepare students for success at college and in the workplace. The report also points out glaring problems with the way states collect data on both school and student performance. Those systems appear to be in chaos, where they exist at all. The report calls on the federal government to pony up an additional $100 million to help states build such systems.

The commission also argues that the reform effort will not get anywhere until the country manages to train, hire and retain far more high-quality teachers. In a departure from the past, the report calls for teachers to be evaluated not just based on their educational credentials, but also on how effectively their students learn.

In a suggestion that's long overdue, the report recommends that colleges and universities, which rely on federal funds, be required to increase the number of graduates qualified to teach in underserved areas like math and science. At the same time, it suggests that school districts with high turnover rates be required to develop plans to train and retain their best teachers.

This report reflects the growing and welcome consensus that No Child Left Behind, and the quest to improve public schooling for all children, are here to stay. What remains is for Congress to write some of these important new provisions into law and to put enough money behind them to make them work.

Cheating On Tests (WP)

EDUCATORS who are successful in turning around troubled schools say the first step is collecting reliable data. A true measure of performance is the only way to identify problems and map improvement. Yet, five years into the No Child Left Behind Act and its mandate for accountability, too many states are still gaming the system by administering weak tests. They boast about high scores, but their claims are as phony as the performance of their students.

Ending this fraud is among the reforms being pushed by a blue-ribbon commission on No Child Left Behind. The group, led by former health and human services secretary Tommy G. Thompson (R) and former Georgia governor Roy E. Barnes (D), points out that setting intentionally low test standards allows students to post better results and lets states escape sanctions under the law. It also makes comparing the performance of students between states impossible and presents a misleading picture of how well schools and their students are doing. This hypocrisy has become an annual event in which states post the results of achievement tests that in many cases differ widely from the results of benchmark tests given by the National Assessment of Educational Progress.

Although the commission correctly diagnosed the problem, it has fallen short with its call for the federal government to require tougher tests from the states or for states to voluntarily use a national model. It's time for the United States to move in the direction taken by other countries in formulating and administering a national test. All students, no matter where they live, should have to show proficiency in certain skills and knowledge. The reason no such test exists has more to with politics than with education. Presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton both tried to get national standards introduced, but their efforts were quashed by conservatives committed to local control of schools and by liberals averse to more testing. Children's rights trumps states' rights, and geography should not matter in how well prepared students are. Shouldn't reading in the third grade be the same in Mississippi as in Maryland? Even more urgent, given the competition the United States faces in a global economy, shouldn't an eighth-grader from Georgia or Pennsylvania have the same math skills as any counterpart in Singapore or Denmark?

There are other good reasons for introducing a national test, including the economic (money would be saved in the development and use of one test) and the pragmatic (switching the debate from what to test to how to teach). The arguments for a national test are so strong that some states are looking to form partnerships with others in developing common tests. As Congress begins to debate the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind, it should ask this question: Why wouldn't the nation want, finally, to know how well all of its students perform?

Fed Chairman Optimistic About Economy (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, February 15, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke offered a mostly upbeat assessment of the economy Wednesday, citing improvements in inflation and housing in comments suggesting the Fed will leave interest rates alone for a while.

Wall Street liked the message and propelled stocks sharply higher. The Dow Jones industrials gained 87.01 points to close at a new high of 12,741.86.

Bernanke said that at present, interest rates are at a level that is "likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation."

"Overall, the U.S. economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace this year and next, with growth strengthening somewhat as the drag from housing diminishes," he said as he delivered the Fed's economic report for the first time to a Democrat-controlled Congress.

The Fed has held a key interest rate steady at 5.25 percent since August, giving borrowers a reprieve.

Before that, the central bank steadily had raised rates for two years, the longest ever stretch of increases, to fend off inflation.

Many economists said Bernanke's testimony to the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee buttressed their belief that the Fed will continue to hold rates steady for much of this year.

Still, Bernanke was not prepared to declare victory over inflation just yet. Thus, he did not close the door on the possibility of further rate increases down the road.

The Fed chief was careful to hedge his bets and pointed out risks that could upset the generally good economic outlook.

One is that inflation might flare, which is why the Fed is keeping open the option of a rate increase.

It will "be some time before we can be confident that underlying inflation is moderating as anticipated," Bernanke said. If inflation does not wane as the Fed expects, policymakers are "prepared to take action," he said.

On the other hand, there is the risk that a deeper than expected residential real-estate bust could yet unfold, which could hurt overall economic growth, Bernanke said.

A former college professor, Bernanke marked his one-year anniversary at the Fed on Feb. 1. President Bush tapped him to succeed Alan Greenspan, who rose to iconic status in his 18-plus years as chairman.

The committee chairman, Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., a 2008 presidential hopeful, and some colleagues said they thought Bernanke was doing a good job in managing the world's largest economy.

Even so, Democrats were vocal about their concerns about the middle class.

"So while some in this country might believe that our economy is chugging along quite well .... there seems to be an increasing gap between the average citizen and those at the top of our economic ladder," said Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J. "And the disparity that continues to grow in my mind is widening at an alarming rate."

Democrats, who are in control of Congress for the first time in 12 years, accuse Bush of not doing enough to narrow economic inequality. Finding ways to close that gap between low- and high-income workers is a Democratic priority.

Bernanke said bolstering education and helping workers acquire new skills should help the situation.

On trade, Bernanke said he is not happy with the United States' record-high deficits but suggested erecting protectionist barriers would do more harm than good.

China, he said, needs to do more to move to a flexible currency policy. Critics contend that Beijing is keeping its currency artificially low, hurting U.S. exports and contributing to the loss of U.S. factory jobs.

When asked about Japan, a huge competitive force for the troubled U.S. auto sector, Bernanke said the Fed has seen no evidence that Japan is manipulating the yen to keep its value low.

Bernanke refused to weigh in on tax policy, much to the dismay of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "I think you are ducking it, in all due respect," Schumer said.

When Bernanke took over last year, there was debate about whether the central bank could get the economy to slow sufficiently to thwart inflation, but not so much as to fall into recession.

"You inherited an economy that was approaching a tipping point, and so far you have managed not to push it over," said Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky. Bunning was the only senator who had voted against Bernanke's nomination as Fed chief.

In its latest economic projections, the Fed said that it expects the economy this year to grow between 2.5 percent and 3 percent — as measured from the fourth quarter of last year to the fourth quarter of this year. That would be slower than a previous Fed forecast and less than the 3.4 percent growth logged for all of 2006.

"Core" inflation, meanwhile, should ease to between 2 percent to 2.25 percent, which would be down from 2.3 percent last year. Core inflation excludes the more volatile categories of energy and food.

The unemployment rate may rise to a high of 4.75 percent, which would still be low by historical standards.

Fed Chairman Remains Optimistic About Economy (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told Congress today that the Fed is generally satisfied with the state of the economy and is more worried about inflation than sagging economic growth.

But in portraying the best of all possible economies, Bernanke suggested that the Fed would leave interest rates alone until it sees some warning signs of either inflation or a turndown in economic growth.

The stock markets, apparently reading Bernanke's testimony as a sign that the Fed's next move on rates would be down rather than up, reacted positively. The Dow Jones Industrial Average marched ahead nearly 100 points as he began his testimony.

The Fed last raised its benchmark short-term rate in June, the last of 17 consecutive policy meetings in which its Federal Open Market Committee raised rates by 0.25 percentage points. Starting in mid-2004, rates rose from 1% to their present 5.25%.

Delivering his semi-annual message on the state of the economy to the Senate Banking Committee, Bernanke acknowledged that the Fed's most closely watched measure of inflation was running higher than its informal 1% to 2% "comfort zone."

But he said the Fed predicted that this measure — the price index for personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy — would decline to a rate of 2% to 2.25% this year and to 1.75% to 2% next year.

But after its most recent meeting last month, Bernanke pointed out, the Open Market Committee "indicated that its predominant policy concern is the risk that inflation will fail to ease as expected and that it is prepared to take action to address inflation risks if developments warrant." On the whole, Bernanke painted a picture of the best of all possible economies.

Economic growth, propelled by strong consumer spending, was solid despite the collapse of the housing market, he said. As for housing, he said home sales have leveled off after months of declines, and mortgage applications have picked up.

The housing sector's decline would probably mean that consumers could no longer be able to borrow against the increasing values of their homes to spend more than they earned.

But he still predicted that "consumer expenditures appear likely to expand solidly in coming months." Analysts said Bernanke's testimony, while emphasizing the risks of inflation over those of sagging economic growth, was marginally less hawkish on inflation than some of the Fed chairman's recent statements.

"The Fed is in its usual late-cycle stance," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist for High-Frequency Economics, "fretting about inflation risks but waiting for the unemployment rate to turn up, giving the green light for lower rates. We don't think this represents a real change in stance."

Bernanke Calms Worries Over Rates (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke alleviated recent fears of higher interest rates by signaling growing confidence that inflation is headed lower as economic growth remains moderate.

But Mr. Bernanke, speaking before the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee, said yesterday that he remained concerned that tight labor markets and limited spare capacity could yet force inflation higher -- suggesting that interest-rate cuts are not yet being contemplated.

Markets had expected more-hawkish testimony -- that is, more concern about inflation -- in part because several Fed policy makers last week suggested rates could rise again. The more-balanced tone of Mr. Bernanke, whose opinion counts considerably more, sent both stock and bond prices sharply higher. The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 87.01 points to a new record close of 12,741.86 and the 10-year Treasury bond yield, which moves in the opposite direction to price, fell to 4.73%.

"There are some indications that inflation pressures are beginning to diminish," Mr. Bernanke said. "A waning of the temporary factors that boosted inflation in recent years will probably help foster a continued edging down of core inflation," which excludes food and energy.

Two factors in particular should nudge down core inflation, he said. Oil prices have dropped, and that will, indirectly, relieve some cost pressure on a range of goods and services. Second, tenant rents, which determine both renters' and homeowners' shelter costs in the main inflation measures, should rise more slowly as demand shifts to homes from apartments and the supply of rental units rises.

The forecasts of the members of the Federal Open Market Committee, which sets interest rates, also displayed greater confidence about inflation. They see core inflation, as measured by the price index of personal-consumption expenditures, falling to between 2% and 2.25% by the end of this year from 2.2% in December, and then further, to between 1.75% and 2%, by the end of 2008. That's at, or below, the 2% level that many policy makers consider stable prices, and within the 1% to 2% "comfort zone" other policy makers prefer.

In spite of this, Mr. Bernanke said the Fed "has continued to view the risk that inflation will not moderate as expected as the predominant policy concern." He didn't explicitly say that that concern could yet lead to higher interest rates. But by reiterating the bias to worry about higher inflation rather than weak growth, Mr. Bernanke also indicated that rates are unlikely to be cut anytime soon. The Fed has kept its short-term interest rate target at 5.25% since last June and markets expect it to stay there through the middle of this year. After Mr. Bernanke spoke, futures markets priced in a higher probability that the Fed would cut its rate target to 5% by December.

Despite the more-sanguine inflation forecast, Mr. Bernanke suggested that the Fed must remain vigilant on inflation because the economy is operating close to, and possibly above, its normal capacity. "Upward pressure on inflation could materialize if final demand were to exceed the underlying productive capacity of the economy for a sustained period," he said. "The high level of resource utilization remains an important upside risk to continued progress on inflation."

That said, FOMC members actually expect slower growth this year, at 2.5% to 3% in the 12 months through the fourth quarter, than they did last July, when their forecast was for 3% to 3.25%. Mr. Bernanke attributed this to a larger-than-expected decline in homebuilding. He suggested that homebuilding could remain a drag on growth through the end of 2008, telling one senator that it could take that long to bring the inventory of unsold homes down to normal levels.

Bernanke Doesn't Expect Interest Rate Change Soon (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve is unlikely to change interest rates anytime soon, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke suggested Wednesday, striking an upbeat tone about the economy, but he voiced continued concern about inflation.

Bernanke said the economy is likely to grow at a "moderate pace" in 2007 and 2008. That comes despite a dramatic slowing in housing that has so far had little dampening effect on consumers, the lifeblood of the economy, Bernanke told the Senate Banking Committee on the first two days of his twice-yearly testimony on the economy.

"There are some indications that inflation pressures are beginning to diminish," he said during the more than three-hour hearing. "The monthly data are noisy, however, and it will consequently be some time before we can be confident that underlying inflation is moderating as anticipated."

Bernanke's comments strengthened expectations that Fed policymakers are in a wait-and-see mode. The Fed's view of ebbing inflation means further interest rate rises are unneeded, while a strong economy suggests rate cuts aren't necessary at this time, either.

"The Fed is, at this point, comfortable to sit on the sidelines," Daniel Jester, an economist at Moody's Economy.com, said in a note to clients. The economic consulting firm anticipates the Fed will leave interest rates unchanged for the rest of the year.

The Fed last month left its target for short-term interest rates, which influence the cost of borrowing for everything from mortgages to credit cards, unchanged at 5.25%, the highest in six years. The Fed has left rates alone for five consecutive meetings after raising them 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006.

Bernanke said the decline in inflationary pressures was in part because of an easing in oil prices, which he noted were "notoriously difficult to predict," making them a "key source of uncertainty to the inflation outlook."

He also said tightness in the labor market suggests wage pressures could accelerate as businesses seek to attract and retain talent from a limited pool of workers. If companies respond to higher payrolls by raising prices, rather than absorbing the added costs, inflationary pressures would rise.

Regarding housing, the Fed chairman repeated that there were "tentative signs of stabilization." But even if the slide in housing demand is over, efforts by home builders to reduce inventories will "weigh on economic growth over the next few quarters," he said.

Bernanke called housing a key risk to the economy, noting it is hard to forecast the future course of the market and its effects on consumers. So far, consumers have been resilient in the face of the housing slowdown, Bernanke said.

Fed Chief Suggests Rates Will Hold Steady (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said today that inflation is improving as the economy expands at a moderate but manageable pace — the balancing point that the Fed tries to hit as it regulates interest rates.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks, delivered this morning to the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee, indicated that the central bank is likely to hold its benchmark interest rate steady for some time.

Wall Street cheered his words. Shortly after the prepared text of the speech was released at 10 a.m., traders began a rally that gained strength throughout the day. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 87 points to 12,741.86, its highest closing level ever. Bond prices also rose.

Mr. Bernanke said that recent readings on the strength of the economy suggest that the Fed's current policy "is likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation." The Fed has left short-term interest rates at 5.25 percent since August.

Still, Mr. Bernanke noted that runaway inflation remains the Fed's primary concern, and he asserted that it "is prepared to take action to address inflation risks if developments warrant."

In recent weeks, the Fed has slightly shifted its tone on inflation. The language in the regular statements the central bank issues when it votes on interest rates has become somewhat softer since the summer. While Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials still express concern about rising prices, their words have become less cautionary.

In its most recent statement, issued late last month, the Fed demonstrated a growing confidence that inflationary pressures were easing. "Readings on core inflation have improved modestly, and inflation pressures seem likely to moderate over time," the Fed's statement said.

As long as inflation continues to stabilize, the Fed has little reason to raise or lower interest rates. After the January statement, analysts speculated that the Fed would remain on hold for much of the year.

"Bernanke struck a firm and reassuring tone," said Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with Bank of America. "For the present, we believe the Fed remains comfortably on hold."

Nothing in Mr. Bernanke's testimony today hinted that the Fed would soon change its posture. He spoke of a robust and expanding economy that has so far appeared to avoid any widespread damage from a collapse.

"The U.S. economy appears to be making a transition from the rapid rate of expansion experienced over the preceding several years to a more sustainable average pace of growth," he said, according to a prepared text of his remarks. "However, the weakness in housing market activity and the slower appreciation of house prices do not seem to have spilled over to any significant extent to other sectors of the economy. Consumer spending has continued to expand at a solid rate, and the demand for labor has remained strong."

Looking ahead, Mr. Bernanke struck an optimistic tone about both inflation and the prospect for growth. "Over all, the U.S. economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace this year and next, with growth strengthening somewhat as the drag from housing diminishes," he said. "The projections of the members of the Board of Governors and the presidents of the Federal Reserve Banks are for inflation to continue to ebb over this year and next."

But in typical Fed fashion, he added numerous caveats to the forecast. "The risks to this outlook are significant," he said, referring to the Fed's projections for growth. He added: "It will consequently be some time before we can be confident that underlying inflation is moderating as anticipated."

He briefly touched on the growing trade imbalance the United States has with the rest of the world, remarking during a question-and-answer session after his prepared remarks that he believes the current level of the trade gap to be unacceptable. "I'm not happy with it," he said. Yesterday, the Commerce Department said that the trade imbalance — the difference between what Americans import and what they export — reached a record for the fifth consecutive year. The biggest chunk of the $763.3 billion deficit last year was because Americans purchased far more goods and services from China than the Chinese purchased from the United States.

When asked whether he was satisfied with Chinese trade policies, and in particular how the way that nation sets the value of its currency, Mr. Bernanke said, "They've moved in the right direction, but, no, I don't think that they've done enough."

Mr. Bernanke was one of several senior government officials who traveled to China late last year to press for less restrictive trade policies. One of the top issues the United States has pressed with China is the value of its currency, which many economists say is understated. An undervalued Chinese yuan makes foreign goods more expensive there.

Bernanke Says Fed Unlikely To Alter Rates (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke indicated yesterday that the central bank is likely to hold interest rates steady, prompting a rally on Wall Street that pushed the Dow Jones industrial average to a record high.

The Fed chief told the Senate Banking Committee that he and his colleagues believe inflation is too high and that they're concerned it might stay that way. But it's more likely, Bernanke said, that a cooling economy will dampen price pressures this year.

Therefore, Fed policymakers don't think they will have to hike rates further to bring inflation down this year and next, Bernanke said. Conversely, they don't think they need to cut rates anytime soon to spur growth.

"The current stance of policy is likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation," Bernanke said, presenting the Fed's first economic report to Congress this year.

Those words were "music to the ears of both stock and bond investors," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist for PNC Financial Services Group. "The Fed doesn't see the economy in any real trouble."

The Dow closed at 12,741.86, up 87.01 points, or 0.69 percent, on top of a 102-point gain Tuesday. Yesterday's close beat the record set Feb. 1.

Bernanke outlined expectations of a "Goldilocks" economy -- not too hot, not too cold, with moderating inflation -- said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies. "The general theme of his testimony was on the neutral side. . . . I think that's what the markets have been celebrating."

Democratic and Republican senators also welcomed Bernanke's message, and praised his performance since succeeding Alan Greenspan as Fed chairman a year ago.

"I believe that you have done a very good job in gaining the respect and confidence of the markets and your colleagues on the Federal Reserve Board," the committee chairman, Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), told Bernanke. "The Fed's monetary policy, most notably its decision to stop raising interest rates in June, has played a very important role in some recent positive economic developments."

Fed policymakers have held their benchmark short-term interest rate steady at 5.25 percent since June. Many analysts predict the rate will stay at that level through the rest of the year.

However, after the Commerce Department reported yesterday that retail sales were flat last month, some traders boosted their bets that the Fed will cut interest rates by the end of the year to boost growth. The sales figures added to other recent data showing the economy entered the new year with less momentum than previously thought.

Many analysts now estimate that the economy grew at a sluggish pace in the last three months of the year, close to a 2 percent annual rate -- well below the robust 3.5 percent pace estimated recently by the Commerce Department. The agency will update its estimate at the end of this month.

Bernanke indicated he is comfortable with the latest news, as it fits with the Fed's forecast that a period of moderate economic growth will force inflation lower.

"The U.S. economy appears to be making a transition from the rapid rate of expansion experienced over the preceding several years to a more sustainable average pace of growth," he said.

The economy has grown more than 3 percent a year for the last three years. This year, the economy will grow 2.5 to 3 percent, the Fed's top policymakers forecast in their report to Congress.

They predicted this slowdown would cause core inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, to drift gradually from 2.2 percent last year to below 2 percent by 2008. The Fed has no formal target, but Bernanke and several of his colleagues have said they prefer to hold core inflation within a "comfort zone" of 1 to 2 percent.

Fed policymakers also foresee unemployment edging up a bit but remaining low this year and next. The jobless rate was 4.5 percent at the end of last year. The Fed expects it to average 4.5 to 4.75 percent at the end of this year, and to stay about there in 2008.

Bernanke attributed most of the slowdown to the housing slump. But he said that weakness does "not seem to have spilled over to any significant extent to other sectors of the economy."

Indeed, the economy is following the Fed's script so well, Bernanke "might want to do a touchdown dance at their next meeting," said Ethan S. Harris, chief economist at Lehman Bros.

Fed Sees Soft Landing For Economy (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, February 15, 2007

Stocks and bonds jumped on Wednesday after Ben Bernanke laid out a fundamentally benign analysis of the US economy in his twice-annual testimony to Congress.

The Federal Reserve chairman painted a picture of recovering growth, moderating inflation and reduced economic risks that evoked memories of the "Goldilocks" economy of the late 1990s – so-called because it was neither too hot nor too cold.

Mr Bernanke struck a temperate tone on inflation, reiterating the Fed's view that it was still a bigger risk than growth but he made no effort to prepare the ground for another interest rate rise.

Instead, he dropped a heavy hint that rates might stay on hold at 5.25 per cent for some time, saying: "The current stance of policy is likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation".

The absence of more hawkish language on inflation and interest rates, and recognition of the continued risks to growth from housing, was greeted with relief by investors, who had been troubled by recent talk from some Fed officials.

The S&P 500 index rose 0.76 per cent to 1,455.30 on Wednesday, while Treasury bonds also moved higher, with 10-year yields falling 7.6 basis points to 4.736 per cent.

The futures market priced in a greater chance of a rate cut this year, while the dollar fell 0.7 per cent against the euro, 0.8 per cent against sterling and 0.2 per cent against the yen.

Earlier, Mr Bernanke's UK counterpart, Mervyn King, struck a tougher tone as he released the Bank of England's quarterly inflation report, which forecast that inflation would overshoot its target at the two-year forecast horizon unless it raised rates again.

"Just as 3 per cent inflation [in December] didn't mean that the end of the world was nigh, so 2.7 per cent [in January] does not mean we can ignore concerns about inflation ahead," he said.

Mr Bernanke was showered with praise by senators from both parties, who credited his decision to halt the Fed's rate-tightening cycle after the last increase in June 2006 with engineering a soft landing.

"You are getting good grades from everyone, and I concur," said Chuck Schumer, Democratic senator for New York.

The Fed chairman told senators that the tendency of forecasts prepared by Fed policymakers was for growth between 2.5 per cent and 3 per cent this year, and 2.75 per cent and 3 per cent next, with core inflation on its preferred measure of 2 per cent to 2.25 per cent this year and 1.75 per cent to 2 per cent next – a level most policymakers would probably be comfortable with.

Mr Bernanke said a "waning of the temporary factors that boosted inflation in recent years" – including pressure from higher oil prices and rising rents – would "probably help foster a continued edging down of core inflation". But he said the high level of resource utilisation remained "an upside risk to continued progress on inflation".

The Fed chairman said he was following closely signs of distress in the high-risk mortgage market but said: "I do not think at this point it has implications for the aggregate economy."

Probed on the US trade deficit, he said: "I am not happy with it."

Economists Differ Over Consumers (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — Despite tight labor markets and rising wages, some economists caution that consumers are likely to pare their spending ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0132492

The debate was highlighted by Wednesday's report that U.S. retail sales were flat in January, though December figures were revised somewhat higher. Auto sales fell last month, while department store sales were bolstered by redemption of holiday gift cards.

"The 2006 holiday selling season was a good one. But by virtue of all that selling, consumers have set a high hurdle," Ken Mayland, of Clearview Economics, told clients. "The consumer sector of the economy faces some 'challenges.' "

Consumer spending, which accounts for about two-thirds of the economy, has proved remarkably resilient in the past several years, despite terrorist attacks and high energy prices. One big aid was a five-year boom in the housing market, letting Americans tap into home equity for extra cash.

More recently, consumers have been buoyed by a low 4.6% unemployment rate, which helped push wages up, and a dip in energy prices. Prices have been edging back up, however, with crude oil rising from about $50 a barrel on Jan. 18 to $58 a barrel Wednesday.

Still, in testimony to Congress Wednesday, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke gave an upbeat outlook for consumer spending, noting it expanded at a brisk 3.5% rate in the second half of 2006, a figure he called even more striking given the fall in the housing market.

Bernanke said consumer spending should expand solidly, though a little less rapidly than income, if consumers "respond to the slow pace of home-equity appreciation by saving more."

Bill Hampel, chief economist at the Credit Union National Association, notes that savings growth at credit unions grew unexpectedly. "For much of the year we'd been telling credit unions, 'It looks like we're on track for the slowest growth year at credit unions since World War II.' The last quarter of the year, it picked up," he says.

Scott Hoyt of Moody's Economy.com expects a decline in consumer spending growth and a "small and gradual increase in the savings rate" as consumers are less able to rely on home price appreciation to meet their immediate needs or long-term wealth goals.

While spending could slow, economists aren't predicting the demise of the consumer.

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, says consumer spending gains will probably decelerate. But with the tight job market "and if gasoline prices stay where they are today, consumers should muddle through the next few quarters."

Bernanke Frowns On Tax Cuts (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke urged action yesterday to balance the budget and curb income inequality through better education, saying such goals should take priority over tax cuts.

"I can't speak to the overall combination of taxes and spending, other than to say that they should be in balance. But I will go so far as to say that I think that there's a significant return to investing in young kids," the Fed chairman told Sen. Bob Casey, Pennsylvania Democrat, in response to a question about whether Congress should vote to extend tax cuts or increase funding for the Head Start program for poor children.

Mr. Bernanke said taxes have an "important" role to play in narrowing the widening income gap between rich and poor through income-transfer programs, and Congress needs to balance that goal against the desirability of tax incentives that spur innovation.

"The tax code has an important role to play in generating more equality," he said, although "entrepreneurs and the people who take risks -- we have to give them incentives to take risks" as well.

He said the benefits from raising revenues by letting President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010 must be weighed against the growth impact from higher taxes. He strongly urged Congress to strive to improve the government's balance sheet and said his biggest worry is the government is not prepared to finance baby boomers' retirement starting in 2011.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks before the Senate banking committee were received warmly by Democrats and were his most forceful testimony on political matters since he took office a year ago.

He was praised by committee members for adroitly steering the economy to a "soft landing" that has maintained robust growth with lower inflation. His willingness to go further in recommending action against income inequality and other economic problems appeared to reflect increased confidence after a successful year in office.

At the urging of nearly every Democrat on the committee, Mr. Bernanke elaborated on a speech he gave last week outlining the reasons for the increasing income gap between wealthy Americans and most wage earners.

Like his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, Mr. Bernanke blamed the gap primarily on differences in education and skill, with the most-successful workers those who can employ advanced technology and education to compete in the global marketplace.

"The very important drivers of economic growth and prosperity in this country include free and open trade and technological progress. It's very important to allow those forces to continue to operate in our economy," he said. "However, we do have to recognize ... they may create greater income possibilities for some than others.

"To retain support for policies of free trade, open borders, technological change, flexible labor markets, we need to make sure that the gains and benefits from these powerful growth-producing forces are broadly shared and that people understand that these things are good for the American economy and good for people generally in the economy."

Mr. Bernanke endorsed setting minimum international labor standards in trade agreements, such as banning child or slave labor. But he questioned whether increased unionization would reduce the income gap and said Congress should focus most of its efforts on ensuring equal access to good quality education and job skills.

"My wife is a teacher. I've been in education for a long time. I was on the school board for many years," he said. "We've been worrying about educational quality for a long time, and it's a difficult thing to achieve."

While the U.S. maintains a "substantial leadership" position in college-level education and research and development, he said, it is falling short at providing adequate education at lower levels, especially in math and science.

In discussing risks to the economy, Mr. Bernanke said the substantial drop in housing last year had less of an impact than expected. "We've not seen substantial spillovers from the housing slowdown to consumer spending or to other parts of the economy," but "it's early to say that this problem is over."

A "significant concern" is recent "distress in the subprime area" of the mortgage market, where default levels have surged to recession levels, he said.

"I'm obviously following it very carefully, both in terms of the impact it has on the borrowers and also, you know, see what effects it has on lenders as well. I don't think that it has at this point implications for the aggregate economy in terms of the ongoing expansion, but as I said, it is an important issue for those sectors."

Referring to recent announcements of losses in mortgage trading and lending at HSBC Bank and the New Century Corp., a major subprime lender, Mr. Bernanke said: "Evidently, there are some loans that have been made that are not turning out well and to the detriment of both the lenders and the borrowers. We will certainly be watching that carefully and trying to provide guidance and oversight to minimize that risk going forward."

Dow Trifecta Spins A Rare Day Of Stock Records (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

Soothed by Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin Bernanke's suggestion that interest-rate increases aren't in the offing soon, investors bid up the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record.

The Dow Jones Transportation Average and the Dow Jones Utility Average also hit records, the first time since 1998 they have done so on the same day as a record close for the industrial average. Before yesterday, such a Dow-averages trifecta had happened only 19 times since 1929.

The Dow industrials rallied 87.01 points, or 0.7%, to 12741.86, for a 190-point jump in two days. The industrials are up 2.2% this year. It was 28th record close for the blue chips since the start of October and the second record this month.

The trifecta of records reflects the breadth of the recent stock rally. Most analysts see that as a sign that the gains can continue, with the economy just strong enough to buoy corporate profits at an array of companies, but not in danger of overheating.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rallied 11.04 points, or 0.8%, to 1455.30, up 2.6% this year. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index gained 28.50 points, or 1.2%, to 2488.38, up 3% on the year.

The market has faced a conundrum lately, with disagreement on Wall Street about whether the Fed's next move would be a rate cut to spur economic expansion or a rate increase in response to data showing some areas of surprising strength, such as job growth and rising wages, which could lead to inflation.

In testimony to the Senate Banking Committee yesterday, Mr. Bernanke said the Fed's current rate policy likely will foster "a gradual ebbing of core inflation" in the months ahead. For many investors, his comments marked the clearest sign yet that the Fed won't raise borrowing costs to rein in spending by consumers, businesses and investors, which would hurt stocks.

"I think the direction of the Fed's next move should be settled by now," said Merrill Lynch economist David Rosenberg, who says the central bank is likely to cut rates in the second half. "It's just a matter of the timing and magnitude of the next move, not the direction."

As the Dow industrials rose, the transportation average rallied 105.40 points, or 2.1%, to 5117.27, while the utility average gained 1.97 points, or 0.4%, to 477.07.

Bond prices also rallied, pushing down yields, as is often the case when investors become less afraid of inflation, which erodes the value of the interest payments they receive.

A drop in oil prices also aided the stock market's rally. Oil futures for March delivery dropped $1.06, or 1.8%, to $58 a barrel, off 5% this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange, after the federal Energy Information Administration released weekly data showing unexpectedly robust stockpiles.

Strategist Bob Hoye of the Vancouver research firm Institutional Advisors said the stock market will face a big challenge beginning in the spring as weather warms and families begin to take more car trips. That will increase fuel demand and, potentially, commodity prices as well, which could renew inflation fears.

Yesterday's stock rally "may be a news item for the day, but it's only part of a longer cyclical rally in bonds and stocks, Mr. Hoye said. "We're going to see that rally tested."

Bond prices rose2. The 10-year note gained 21/32 point, or $6.5625 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.731%. The 30-year bond rose 1 5/32 to yield 4.827%.

The dollar weakened3. The dollar fell to 120.74 yen from 121.17 yen. The euro rose to $1.3129 from $1.3037.

Gangbuster Market Made $8.8 Trillion Recovery (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 15, 2007

The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 index, the broadest measure of the U.S. stock market, has recouped all of its dollar losses suffered in the 2000-02 bear market. As of Wednesday, it had rebounded 100% and regained $8.8 trillion in market value — more than the combined annual GDP of Japan, Germany and the United Kingdom — since its Oct. 9, 2002, low.

Confirming the strength of this so-called U.S. "wealth" measure were the record highs set Wednesday by a swath of other domestic stock market indexes. For the first time since March 17, 1998, the Dow Jones industrial, transportation and utilities averages all set records on the same day, suggesting that the economy is in good shape.

And further confirmation of the market's broad, inclusive participation came in the form of a record close for the NYSE composite index, which measures the performance of all U.S. common stocks, foreign shares and real estate investment trusts listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

"Each time you see another index hit a new high, it validates what is going on and confirms that the rally is, indeed, broad-based," says Steven Foresti, managing director and head of investment research at Wilshire Consulting.

The broad U.S. stock market has risen four consecutive years after losing nearly half of its value from 2000 to 2002. The continued gains on Wall Street, however, are worrisome to some because the market is now enjoying its second-longest streak ever without either a 2% or 10% correction from a prior high. There is also growing concern that investors may be getting overly optimistic about the market's moneymaking abilities.

But even Stack admits that the market continues to defy skeptics and move higher because all the ingredients of a bull market remain in place. The big drivers — stable interest rates and a not-too-hot, not-too-cold economy — were reinforced Wednesday by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke in testimony on Capitol Hill.

"Investors have deciphered all the economic data and have given a thumbs up across the board," says Timothy Vick, senior portfolio manager at Sanibel Captiva Trust. He says investors are now more confident that the Fed will not raise short-term interest rates this year, which makes stocks far more attractive.

McCain Leads Chase For Senate Support (POL)

By Jonathan Martin And Daniel W. Reilly

The Politico, February 15, 2007

In 2000, it was easier to troll for favorable quotes about John McCain among his Democratic colleagues than to find Republican senators ready to say nice things about a man they had served with for years. In the end, McCain snared a grand total of four endorsements from GOP senators for his presidential campaign.

Almost a year until the first primary, McCain has already outpaced his 2000 total. He has six endorsements, and his campaign promises more soon.

That McCain is already on the way to doubling his 2000 take is a vivid illustration of the onetime maverick's ability to make amends with colleagues and the conservative establishment that many of them represent.

A Politico survey among the 49 Republican senators also found three senators backing former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney for president.

Meanwhile, Sen. Sam Brownback enjoys the support of his fellow Kansan, Sen. Pat Roberts. Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has been late in starting the courting process, but an aide said to "stay tuned for some upcoming announcements" of support from the Senate.

Thirty-two Republican senators said they were still undecided on whom to support, and four said they expected to sit out the primary process.

While McCain is winning more support than before, interviews with senators and key aides showed he continues to confront deep ambivalence among many colleagues. Some remain resentful over personal clashes through the years; then there are McCain's views in favor of campaign finance reform and against spending on local projects backed by home-state senators.

"I know … I am not the most popular guy with many on the Appropriations Committee because of our different views on earmarks and that whole process," McCain acknowledged in an interview.

His political strategist, John Weaver, agreed that McCain remains a tough sell for some Senate colleagues. "That's just the way life is," Weaver noted, saying McCain was running "a reality-based campaign" for the backing of fellow Republicans. Attempting to turn the tables on Romney's camp, however, Weaver added that there are "a number of governors who won't support one candidate or the other."

When it comes to endorsements, the inevitable question in modern presidential politics is: Who cares? In earlier generations, endorsements from high-profile politicians often meant delegates and organizational support, something that is no longer the case. Still, McCain may have more of a stake than most in this year's endorsement derby. As someone eyed warily by many conservative activists at the state and local level, he can benefit from the blessing of more-trusted figures.

Among the more notable people pulling an about-face on McCain is Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss. In 2000, Lott was a sometimes caustic opponent. This year, he was an early arrival in McCain's camp and is part of a small inner circle of pro-McCain senators who meet to plot strategy.

"Times change, things change and experiences change people," explained the man who lost his hold on the majority leader post after some key senators and the White House defected in the wake of Lott's racial comments at the 100th birthday party of former Sen. Strom Thurmond in 2002.

"When you've come back up out of the valley you're different," Lott said in an interview. "I believe in resurrection."

Lott also believes in his ability to count votes, as demonstrated by his audacious bid to regain a Senate leadership post after last year's elections. As with that campaign, Lott said his task whipping up support for McCain is challenging but bears promise. Like Weaver, he admitted that some in the body can't bring themselves to support their sometimes-prickly colleague, but adds that "you'd be surprised at some of those who may be rising above."

Lott wouldn't reveal names but said with a smile that "some of them may even be appropriators."

There's a couple of those whom McCain definitely won't be getting.

On Thursday, Romney's campaign announced that Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, and Sen. Bob Bennett, R-Utah, will serve as the former governor's chief liaisons to the Senate. Both Craig and Bennett serve on the Appropriations Committee.

The powerful spending panel also includes many of the GOP's most politically important senators, including Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, New Hampshire's Judd Gregg, Alabama's Richard Shelby and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas.

Another conservative not helping the McCain cause will be Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina. Though just a freshman, DeMint has already carved out a name for himself in the body for his outspokenness, particularly on fiscal issues. He came out for Romney last month and has been lobbying his fellow conservatives, including other junior senators like Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and John Cornyn of Texas, on the former governor's behalf.

A Senate Republican aide with knowledge of the endorsement derby said Romney's wooing has been based more on his ideas and policy vision while McCain's team has focused on "the inevitability factor" and it being McCain's "turn."

"We are making headway," Craig said of his efforts to woo his Senate colleagues. "I am not going to talk numbers, but I am very pleased with the reception I am getting."

Craig said that he already has a good number of commitments from fellow senators and that he thinks "we will have a good number (of Romney supporters) here in the final analysis."

One Romney adviser off the Hill went so far as to predict that the Romney camp would have "as many or more endorsements from the Senate as McCain."

One senator who Romney would love to have in hand by then is Gregg. Though endorsements haven't traditionally counted for much among the proudly independent Granite State electorate (Gregg's support for Bush in 2000 did nothing to stem his 18-point loss), the backing of New Hampshire's senior senator would serve as another indicator that Romney is consolidating the Anybody But McCain vote.

Despite buzz around Capitol Hill that it's only a matter of time before his boss gets behind Romney, Gregg's chief of staff and top political adviser Joel Maiola said the rumors "continue not to be true."

Gregg, Maiola said, has had discussions with a number of candidates, including McCain and Romney, and many of these people are "still in play."

"He's another month away," from an endorsement, Maiola said.

DOJ_NMG_0132497

With DeMint out for Romney and Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina again behind McCain, Sen. Chuck Grassley of Iowa is the only other Republican senator from an early primary state who is still uncommitted. He told Iowa reporters last week that he would likely not make an endorsement anytime soon.

"I think the dust needs to settle on the issues," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabaman who previously has tangled with McCain. "We need to find out what these (guys) are going to fight for and die for."

Other senators said the role of endorsements in the Senate is overinflated.

"My biggest role in all of this is that I will have one vote in the Louisiana Republican primary," said Louisiana Sen. David Vitter, who has yet to make a decision on whom to support.

Still, Vitter didn't mind handicapping the race. "I think the nomination race is going to be focused on McCain and someone who will be the alternative to McCain," Vitter said. "And Romney has made a lot of headway towards becoming that alternative."

Still, it recognizes the inherent strengths in the upper chamber, even for a senator whose had as many run-ins with colleagues as McCain.

"This is very much like 1988 where (former Sen.) Bob Dole was very much the Senate insider and any other candidate will have a hard time (picking up) endorsements," said a Republican strategist supporting Romney. The former governor, this source said, "is taking the George H.W. Bush role, trying to line up lots of House support," recognizing that those in the upper chamber are "either on McCain's side or frozen into neutrality."

Weaver, McCain's strategist, responded that they were also "well on track in the House" and "working it very, very hard." He also hinted that Romney's early cultivation of support from House members was more about perception than anything else.

"We're more concerned not so much as to influence the chattering class in Washington, but to influence voters."

Still, Weaver couldn't resist one dig at the former chief executive and chair of the Republican Governors Association. "How well are they doing among governors?" he asked of Romney's campaign.

To date, Romney has the support of only one of the nation's 22 GOP governors.

Senate endorsement don't mean very much to anyone but those inside the beltway. Most republicans have lost confidence in Senate republicans, and aren't going to look to any Senator for leadership on who to back for President.

by tashi on 02.14.2007 at 10:42 PM

He's done. Wishy washy guy who allowed himself to be swiftboated when the Bushies said his wife was a drug addict and adopted Bengladeshi daughter was really a black love child in 2000. Right, Mr. Integrity and straight talk? Mr. Wimp. Now he's just a lowbrow arsecreecher (German for brown noser, but more active. He actually wiggles around in there). And then ther eis his temper. Why didn't he express it when he had a right to be angry?

by Kasey on 02.14.2007 at 09:40 PM

McCain is getting to cozy with the far right. He had amazing lefty support in 2000 that has disappeared.

by polarbear on 02.14.2007 at 07:52 PM

Senate endorsements are more important during the primary season, and perhaps more important for Republicans. Still, thinking about the order in which things have to occur, McCain cannot win the Republican primary without securing the support of the Republican base. But then, McCain cannot win the general election without attracting substantial crossover votes from Democrats. Especially in this election cycle, the more successful he is at one, the less successful he will be at the other. McCain's support for the surge would have to be rewarded by events for McCain to attact many crossover votes.

Reagan Library To Host GOP Debate In May (AP)

By Brooke Donald

AP, February 15, 2007

(AP) Always fond of invoking Ronald Reagan, the 2008 crop of Republican candidates will get a prime chance to associate themselves with the Gipper's legacy. Former first lady Nancy Reagan said Wednesday she was inviting the leading GOP candidates to the first-ever debate at her husband's library in Simi Valley.

The Ronald Reagan Presidential Library plans to host the debate on May 3. It will feature questions submitted through a Web site.

"Ronnie always hoped the library would be a place where policymakers will debate the future," Nancy Reagan said in a statement. "This presidential debate provides the opportunity to fulfill his wishes."

Debate participants were not immediately announced. Nearly a dozen Republicans have announced their candidacies or have indicated they are considering a bid for the nation's top job. The early front-runners include Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

The debate will be moderated by MSNBC and aired on the cable news channel, as well as simulcast online through the Web site of The Politico newspaper, Politico.com.

People watching online will be able to submit questions to the candidates via the site, according to a release on Politico.com.

"I'm staying out of it," Clyburn told The Associated Press this week as several Democratic White House hopefuls prepared to visit his home state.

Clyburn did much of the arm twisting that landed South Carolina's January 2008 primary ahead of every other state except Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada.

"I used a lot of political capital keeping that primary in South Carolina when two other states went after that," Clyburn said. "I promised people at that time that if they were to come to South Carolina and participate in that primary I would not participate in any effort." He said he wanted to ensure all candidates "have a fair shot at winning the state."

An endorsement from the former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and the state's senior member of Congress could carry a lot of weight in South Carolina, where 49 percent of primary voters are black. In 2004, Clyburn endorsed Dick Gephardt before his longtime colleague quit the race; he then backed John Kerry. Former Sen. John Edwards, a South Carolina native, won the state primary.

WASHINGTON (AP) _ Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards said Wednesday that he would immediately pull about a third of U.S. combat troops out of Iraq if he were president.

Congress should also cut military funding to force President Bush to do so, Edwards said.

Edwards is going a step farther than rivals Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, who want to cap the number of troops in Iraq to prevent Bush's increase, but are reluctant to cut funding while soldiers are on the ground.

"At this point, the escalation is under way, so blocking it is not enough," Edwards told reporters in a conference call. "So what I'm doing today is calling on Congress to take the next step, which is to cap funding."

Edwards spoke as the Democratic-controlled House of Representatives debated a measure opposing Bush's decision to send 21,500 troops to Iraq to help the 130,000 that were already there at the beginning of the year. Edwards said the non-binding resolution being debated is not enough.

Edwards proposed capping troops at 100,000 and says all combat forces should be out of Iraq within 12-18 months.

However, Edwards said he would not go as far as another Democratic primary rival, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who wants Congress to cut off funds to end the war. Edwards said the war needs to end in a "smart, orderly way."

WASHINGTON (AP) _ Illinois Sen. Barack Obama has a staunch defender for his presidential bid in his wife, Michelle, who won't stand for any criticism of her husband.

Michelle Obama says it's his time to run, even though others have questioned whether a first-term senator is ready to be president.

"We've heard this spewed from the lips of rivals," the candidate's wife told about 1,000 donors at a Chicago fundraiser Sunday night. "Every phase of our journey, he is not experienced enough, he should wait his turn. He is too young, he is not black enough, he is not white enough ... he is too articulate.

"Don't be fooled by these claims because they are mere distractions," she continued. "Distractions to keep us focused once again on what is not possible. Distractions that keep us mired in fear so that we are unable to focus on the real issues that are dragging us down as a nation. What we need right now is a leader. And a leader is more than a set of finite experiences."

She said that only in politics would insiders look at her husband's resume _ a Harvard-trained lawyer, best-selling author and former state senator _ "and dare to have the audacity to say he is not ready."

Mrs. Obama said she is excited about the campaign and aware that "politics is a full contact sport."

"Senator John McCain is a principled leader whose unwavering determination to improve the lives of Americans is admirable," Swift said of the Arizona Republican in a statement issued by his presidential exploratory committee.

Swift, then lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, became acting governor in 2001 after Paul Cellucci resigned to become U.S. ambassador to Canada. She had been planning her own gubernatorial campaign in 2002 when Romney returned to Massachusetts from the Olympic Winter Games in Utah and made clear he planned to seek the GOP nomination.

A year earlier, he had said he would not challenge Swift, labeling her the party's "standard-bearer."

Down in the polls, Swift ended up stepping aside after political missteps that included using aides to baby-sit and a high-profile clash over a proposed highway toll increase.

Romney was the fourth in a series of Republican governors who led Massachusetts from 1991 through 2006. The first, former Gov. William F. Weld, has endorsed Romney. Cellucci has endorsed former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Romney will address the graduates on May 5.

Robertson has not endorsed Romney, and Regent University does not endorse political candidates, Regent spokeswoman Sherri Stocks said.

"At Regent, we often invite a variety of leaders to speak to our campus," Stocks said.

Founded in 1978, Regent has some 5,000 students studying on campuses in Virginia Beach and Washington, D.C., and also via online distance education.

Giuliani, Saying He Is Running For President, Offers His Views On The War In Iraq (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

Rudolph W. Giuliani yesterday removed any lingering doubts that he was running for president, and, without mentioning President Bush by name, offered pointed criticism on how the Iraq war has been handled.

He said that the United States went to war with far too few forces and was wrong to dismantle Saddam Hussein's military and government, and he conceded that if more information had been available about Iraq's weapons, Congress never would have approved the war.

Mr. Giuliani has behaved like a presidential candidate for months, forming an exploratory committee, raising money, building a campaign staff and making appearances around the country. But until now, he has repeatedly stopped short of a definitive statement of his intentions — even joking about his nondeclarations in recent days.

Republican activists and consultants, citing his early withdrawal from the 2000 Senate race, said he needed to put to rest fears that he might not follow through. But in characteristic fashion, Mr. Giuliani said he would do things on his own timetable.

But on "Larry King Live" on CNN yesterday, Mr. Giuliani twice said, "Yes, I'm running," according to a transcript provided by CNN before the interview was broadcast. Asked if he would make a formal announcement of the kind favored by other candidates, he said, "I guess you do."

On the issue that looms largest over the campaign, Iraq, Mr. Giuliani used the interview to offer a harsh assessment of the Bush administration's decision-making. His comments more closely aligned him with his chief rival in Republican primary polls, Senator John McCain of Arizona, who has supported the war, as Mr. Giuliani does, but has criticized its conduct.

"I would remove Saddam Hussein again," Mr. Giuliani said. "I just hope we'd do it better and we'd do it in a different way."

Most important, he added, the United States, which has had 120,000 to 160,000 troops at a time in Iraq, should have gone in with "maybe 100,000 to 130,000 more."

In addition, "I would have us not disband" the Iraqi military or purge the government of Baath Party members, because "that meant getting rid of the entire civil service," he said, adding: "The country had no infrastructure."

"There was a real doubt as to whether we could do this nation building," he said, and as it has turned out, "we're not going to do it."

Mr. Giuliani has often stood closely by the president on national security issues since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and yesterday declined to blame the administration or any official by name. "Of course there were mistakes," he said. "Lincoln made mistakes. Roosevelt made mistakes. Eisenhower made mistakes."

Mr. King asked if Mr. Giuliani would agree that the Senate would have voted unanimously against the war if it were known that Mr. Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction.

"Yes, I guess," he said, but he added that such a vote would say nothing about whether the war was right.

Leaving Iraq now would give neighboring Iran "a major, major ability to expand their activities," he said.

He added, "Two Shiite countries right next to each other, slaughtering, you know, where one group at least is slaughtering Sunnis."

Western intelligence services have attributed most of the violence in Iraq — against both Americans and other Iraqis — to Sunnis, although the role of Shiite militias has grown.

Campaigning for other Republicans last year, Mr. Giuliani offered a full-throated defense of the war and said that Democrats simply did not understand the threat posed by terrorists. As recently as last weekend, speaking to the California Republican Party, he said that the nation was fortunate to have a leader as decisive as Mr. Bush, who Mr. Giuliani said understood what was at stake.

But in the last month, Mr. Giuliani has tempered that support by saying that Americans must be prepared for the idea that the war will not go well, even with the president's recent addition of 21,500 more troops.

"I'm not confident it's all going to turn around," he said yesterday. "Who knows that? I mean, you never know that in the middle of the war. I'm confident that we have to try to make a turnaround and we just can't walk out."

Most Republicans still support the war, polls show — as do their party's three leading presidential candidates, Mr. McCain, Mr. Giuliani and Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor — but most independent voters and Democrats oppose it.

Mr. Giuliani's warnings of setbacks and criticism of war planning could serve him well politically if things continue to go badly in Iraq.

On abortion, an issue that sets him apart from much of his party, he declined to say whether it would bother him if the Supreme Court were to overturn the landmark decision Roe v. Wade.

"I don't think it would hurt me or help me," said Mr. Giuliani, who has long said he favored keeping abortion legal. "It would be a matter of states making decisions."

He has said lately that he would appoint “strict constructionists” to the bench, a phrase taken by many conservatives — and, yesterday, by Mr. King — to mean judges who would not support the Roe decision.

“I don’t know that,” he said. “You don’t know that.”

When Mr. King asked him to define what a strict constructionist is, Mr. Giuliani said, “There are a lot of ways to explain that,” and did not elaborate.

Rudy Confirms: 'I'm Running' (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon

Long Island Newsday, February 15, 2007

Rudolph Giuliani Wednesday night finally gave the two-word confirmation he had resisted for a week -- "I'm running" -- for president, that is.

Even veteran broadcaster Larry King wasn't exactly sure what he heard, since Giuliani had come up with several different formulations in the last week that came oh-so-close to saying the same thing.

"So, you're running?" King asked for a third time.

"Yes, I'm running," Giuliani said.

So the only suspense now is about the where and when of a full-fledged announcement.

Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton used a Web video. Barack Obama traveled to the land of Abraham Lincoln on Saturday and addressed supporters in freezing temperatures. Republican Mitt Romney went to Michigan -- plenty far from Washington (he's running as an outsider). John McCain hasn't declared.

At least one politico has suggested Ground Zero, certainly a central part of Giuliani's campaign but also politically risky, looking too much like politicizing the nation's worst tragedy.

Giuliani To Seek Advice From FEC About Speaking Fees (WP)

By John Solomon And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani has continued to make paid speeches at a standard fee of $100,000 since forming his presidential exploratory committee last November, mixing personal business with campaigning in a way many of his rivals in the race cannot.

Presidential candidates who are not federal officeholders are allowed to take money for speeches, as long as they are not raising campaign money at the event, distributing campaign material or delivering an overtly political speech.

But campaign aides said yesterday he will wait to collect his fee for a speech he gave last night until his campaign has discussed the arrangement with the Federal Election Commission and determined how best to handle a handful of speaking engagements already scheduled through the spring.

Giuliani, who has filed an official statement of candidacy with the FEC but has not formally entered the race, spoke in San Diego at a seminar also headlined by famed motivational speaker Zig Ziglar and football coach Marty Schottenheimer. His talk was titled "Courage Without Compromise." Giuliani's aides said he will not accept any more requests for paid speeches.

"Mayor Giuliani is committed to traveling across the country to talk to voters about his vision for the future of the country," campaign spokeswoman Katie Levinson said. "All decisions about his schedule will be made based on what makes sense as he moves toward making an official announcement about a run for the presidency."

Past speechmaking by presidential candidates has attracted the attention of election regulators. In 2003, Democrat Wesley K. Clark returned money for motivational speeches after published reports questioned whether the payments amounted to improper campaign contributions.

Clark said yesterday that he believed his speech fees were legal but ultimately gave them back to avoid giving opponents an issue, and that he worries that putting such fees off limits only hurts candidates who are not wealthy or members of Congress.

"I don't have any problem with Rudy Giuliani giving paid speeches, and I think it is important for America to have a way for people to run for national office without being independently wealthy or taking time out from their constituents. And earning a living with paid speeches is one way to do it," he said. "I just lived off savings, and every month the bank balance went down."

Senators in the presidential field, such as Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), are prohibited by Senate ethics rules from accepting speaking fees.

"Federal officeholders have the ethics rules and honoraria restrictions that apply to them. And state officeholders often face strict limits on accepting fees. So it is true that those people who are in private sector have more latitude to speak in private settings," Michael Toner, an FEC commissioner, said yesterday.

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R) and former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.), who like Giuliani are private citizens, have not accepted speaking fees since joining the presidential race, their campaigns said.

Edwards, "actually canceled a paid appearance that had been scheduled long before he became a candidate," spokeswoman Kate Bedingfield said.

Yesterday's San Diego speech came at the end of a five-day campaign swing though California. The event was closed to the news media, though the public could attend for as little as $4.90 a ticket, according to the promotional materials.

Two weeks ago, Giuliani gave a similar speech in Atlanta at a seminar that also featured former secretary of state Colin L. Powell. In coming weeks, Giuliani is scheduled to speak in Delaware, Houston and several other venues, according to Internet advertisements released by his promoter, Get Motivated Seminars.

The former New York mayor has made a profitable career of speaking at seminars around the world. Eric Money, a recent Oklahoma State University graduate, arranged to bring Giuliani to the school last March for $100,000 and, as is customary, agreed to fly the mayor to town on a corporate jet, for an additional $47,000.

"He cost a lot of money, obviously, and some people were surprised at that, and a little taken aback," Money said yesterday. "But he's a big name and was a possible presidential contender, and in the end, I thought his whole leadership message was very appealing."

Money said his only regret about the speech was that Giuliani did not shed any light on his presidential ambitions, or about his views of the 2008 campaign.

No Apology Needed (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

Far be it from me to get in the middle of a liberal purge, but would anybody mind if I pointed out that the calls for Hillary Clinton to apologize for her support of the Iraq war are almost entirely bogus?

I mean, have the people calling for her apology actually read the speeches she delivered before the war? Have they read her remarks during the war resolution debate, when she specifically rejected a pre-emptive, unilateral attack on Saddam? Did they read the passages in which she called for a longer U.N. inspections regime and declared, “I believe international support and legitimacy are crucial”?

If they went back and read what Senator Clinton was saying before the war, they’d be surprised, as I was, by her approach. And they’d learn something, as I did, about what kind of president she would make.

The Iraq war debate began in earnest in September 2002. At that point Clinton was saying in public what Colin Powell was saying in private: emphasizing the need to work through the U.N. and build a broad coalition to enforce inspections.

She delivered her Senate resolution speech on Oct. 10. It was Clintonian in character. On the one hand, she rejected the Bush policy of pre-emptive war. On the other hand, she also rejected the view that the international community “should only resort to force if and when the United Nations Security Council approves it.” Drawing on the lessons of Bosnia, she said sometimes the world had to act, even if the big powers couldn’t agree.

She sought a third way: more U.N. resolutions, more inspections, more diplomacy, with the threat of force reserved as a last resort. She was triangulating, but the Senate resolution offered her a binary choice. She voted yes in order to give Powell bipartisan leverage at the U.N.

This is how she's always explained that vote, and I confess that until now, I've regarded her explanation as a transparent political dodge. Didn't everyone know this was a war resolution? But now, having investigated her public comments, I think diplomatic leverage really was on her mind. I also know, from a third person, that she was spending a lot of time with Powell and wanted to help.

On Nov. 8, 2002, the Security Council passed a unanimous resolution threatening Saddam with "serious consequences" if he didn't disarm.

The next crucial period came in March 2003, as the U.S. battled France over the second Security Council resolution. Clinton's argument at this point was that inspections were working and should be given more time. "It is preferable that we do this in a peaceful manner through coercive inspection," she said on March 3, but went on, "At some point we have to be willing to uphold the United Nations resolutions." Then she added, "This is a very delicate balancing act."

On March 17, Bush gave Saddam 48 hours to disarm or face attack. Clinton tried to be critical of the Bush policy while being deferential to the office of the presidency. She clearly had doubts about Bush's timing, but she kept emphasizing that from her time in the White House, she knew how unhelpful it was for senators to be popping off in public on foreign policy.

At one press event in New York, she nodded when Charles Rangel said Bush had failed at the U.N. But when reporters asked Clinton to repeat what Rangel had just said, she bit her tongue. On March 17, as U.S. troops mobilized, she issued her strongest statement in support of the effort.

Clinton's biggest breach with the liberal wing actually opened up later, in the fall of 2003. Most liberals went into full opposition, wanting to see Bush disgraced. Clinton — while an early critic of the troop levels, the postwar plans and all the rest — tried to stay constructive. She wanted to see America and Iraq succeed, even if Bush was not disgraced.

When you look back at Clinton's thinking, you don't see a classic war supporter. You see a person who was trying to seek balance between opposing arguments. You also see a person who deferred to the office of the presidency. You see a person who, as president, would be fox to Bush's hedgehog: who would see problems in their complexities rather than in their essentials; who would elevate procedural concerns over philosophical ones; who would postpone decision points for as long as possible; and who would make distinctions few heed.

Today, the liberal wing of the Democratic Party believes that the world, and Hillary Clinton in particular, owes it an apology. If she apologizes, she'll forfeit her integrity. She will be apologizing for being herself.

GOP Hopes To Catch A Wave In California (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 15, 2007

During a swing through Northern California this week that included a close encounter with a mechanical milker, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani snitched a bite of blackened chicken quesadilla off a woman's plate at Mimi's Diner in Fresno.

In Southern California next week, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., will appear in the Los Angeles area with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to promote his climate-change policies and talk about how they can be taken national.

Both stops are precursors of a seismic shift taking shape in presidential politics -- California as a top priority for Republicans.

The nation's largest state has always been a sunny ATM for presidential candidates of both parties. In 2004, President Bush got 10 percent of his campaign funds there and Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., got 20 percent, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

But at the polls, the Golden State has been resoundingly Democratic. In the four general elections since 1992, the Republican presidential nominee has lost California every time, by 11 to 13 percentage points. Bush campaigned there vigorously in 2000 and 2004, with his strategist Karl Rove telling reporters, "If you play in the state, all kind of things are possible."

Still, no one would call California a swing state.

This year though, the state suddenly looks alluring to Republicans -- and not just for the cash or dreams. The Republican presidential campaigns are suddenly giving the state intense attention for two reasons:

* California is poised to move its presidential primary from June, when it was irrelevant, up to Feb. 5, creating a potential jackpot near the start of the nominating contests.

* Giuliani and McCain are pro-business candidates with moderate images in the mold of Schwarzenegger, a Republican who easily won re-election in November. Golden State experts say that if either one heads the GOP ticket, he could put the state in play for the general election -- a seismic change in an electoral map where the same states get disproportionate attention in election after election.

McCain's chief strategist, John Weaver, sees California as "a golden opportunity for the GOP to reclaim the national mantle," and asserts that Arizona senator "is the one guy who can do this while holding the base together."

McCain has been lobbying state legislators to move up the primary and has hired top members of his strategy, field, advertising and communications teams from Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign last fall.

McCain's backers believe his Western philosophy, appeal to Hispanics and rapport with military families and retirees will pay off as well.

"Even if the Democrats just had to battle it out and spend dramatic resources and time out there, that would be a psychological victory," said a Republican strategist familiar with McCain's plans. "But that's not why we would do that. We want to win it."

He'll have to become the nominee first, though, and California could be decisive in the primaries.

Giuliani just finished a four-day swing through the state, drawing a giddy reception from 850 Republicans at the state party's convention and making Iowa-like retail stops, including a stroll through a farm equipment show with the reigning Dairy Princess.

California is already a milestone in his campaign, because it was there that he told reporters offhandedly last weekend that he was "committed" to the race, his most definitive comment yet about his presidential intentions.

The man known as "America's mayor" will have field directors and a political director just for California and is already announcing endorsements, including Rep. David Dreier, R-Calf., who until January was chairman of the House Rules Committee and has tentacles throughout the state.

"The response to the mayor's message has been nothing short of exciting," said Katie Levinson, communications director for Giuliani's exploratory committee. "There is a sense of enthusiasm about him as a candidate that has really been fantastic."

Both McCain and Giuliani are working hard in high-tech Silicon Valley and the agricultural Central Valley. "The key is that California is fundamentally a Western state, except for Los Angeles and Hollywood," said a Republican strategist following the race closely.

A notable exception, however, is California voters' overwhelmingly support for abortion rights. If Schwarzenegger had been anti-abortion, analysts agree, he probably would not have been elected.

Polls in California, like everywhere this early, are mostly a reflection of name recognition. A poll of 600 likely California Republican primary voters, conducted by American Research Group from Jan. 11 to 17, placed Giuliani at 33 percent, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia at 19 percent and McCain at 18 percent. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney was at just 3 percent. The margin of error was plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Undaunted by the poll, Romney's press secretary, Kevin Madden, vowed that the former governor will "have the organization established and the financial resources required to compete successfully in every district across California."

The state moved closer to center stage Tuesday when its Senate passed a bill moving the primaries for both parties to Feb. 5, very shortly after the Iowa caucuses on Jan. 14 and the New Hampshire primary on Jan. 22. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez said he expects to get the measure to the governor's desk within 10 days. And Schwarzenegger, a strong backer of the earlier primary, has vowed to provide local election officials with the additional resources they'll need.

"We hope all the candidates will come to California and do more than just take our money," said Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. And looking toward the general election, the professor added: "A socially moderate Republican, under the right conditions, could be very competitive in California."

New York legislative leaders are also talking about moving their primary up a month to Feb. 5, and New Jersey officials are talking about doing the same, meaning that a Mongo Tuesday could be in the works.

In California, Cain said the biggest challenge for the GOP in the general election would be Iraq, and McCain's outreach to Christian conservatives could hurt him in a state never particularly beholden to the religious right. But the professor said Giuliani would have a strong shot if he follows the Schwarzenegger playbook.

"California is a blue state, but it's light blue," Cain said. "We know where the middle of the spectrum is in California."

He warned, though, that California has so many expensive television markets that the winnowing process may be faster and more brutal than in the traditional opening-round states. "Candidates will assess whether they have any chance whatsoever in California and not invest money if they don't," Cain said.

And Mark DiCamillo, director of the California-based Field Poll, provides a reality check by noting that Republican candidates have typically done 10 to 12 percentage points worse in California than nationally.

"If there's momentum for the Republican and weakness for the Democrat in California, it would be exhibited even more across the country," DiCamillo said. "California would be the least of the Democrats' concerns."

If Rudy wins the GOP nomination (don't hold your breath), Hillary will beat him in Sunny C, my home state.

Why? Because to become the Republican candidate, Rudy will have to move too far right for most Californians, a lesson learned by Arnold after he became governor.

On the other hand, no matter what position John McCain takes on the issues, he will crush Slick Willie's slick understudy. It's all about INTEGRITY -- not exactly her long suit (or Rudy's, for that matter).

If Mr. Giuliani fails to win the GOP nomination, I think George Bush would do well to consider sending him as a special envoy to Baghdad.

Rudy obviously relishes -- and seems to cultivate -- his reputation as an urban tough guy. What better way to see if this reputation is deserved?

Edwards Stakes Out His Turf On Iraq Policy (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 15, 2007

Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) yesterday jumped back into the Iraq debate with more specifics on how the U.S. should extricate itself from the region, casting himself as the 2008 presidential contender most opposed to the war.

Edwards called on his former colleagues to go further than their non-binding criticism of President Bush's "surge" plan, recommended a lower troop ceiling than other Democrats have and charged that the original congressional authorization no longer applies to the war.

In an Iraq debate increasingly directed by sitting members and 2008 contenders such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), the 2004 vice presidential candidate, who supports a funding cutoff for the Iraq "surge," also said he would not support such a cut-off for existing operations.

"I believe we need to end the war in Iraq, but I believe it should be done in an orderly way, a smart way, so that we increase the chances of stability as we're leaving," Edwards told reporters. "So I'm not for immediate and total withdrawal."

Edwards's latest plan for Iraq includes a readiness standard similar to one House Democrats and anti-war groups are drafting as a follow-up to this week's non-binding resolution. Under the Edwards proposal, Congress would block troops from leaving for Iraq without adequate training and equipment.

The Carolinian has "done a good job articulating his critique," according to Tom Matzzie of MoveOn.org Washington, a leader of the anti-war coalition marshaling support for the readiness standard. Yet Matzzie said Edwards faces significant challenges in aiming to influence policy on which he cannot vote: "Most people are focused like a laser on the fight in Congress. … Democrats have this narrow hold on power that we want to leverage."

Edwards's strategy earned a rapid rejoinder from ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's (D) campaign, which interpreted the opposition to ending the war through immediate de-funding — Vilsack's preference — as a compliment.

"Sen. Edwards bluntly acknowledged today that Tom Vilsack has the strongest plan to end the war in Iraq," Vilsack spokesman Josh Earnest said in a statement. "Capping troop levels in Iraq is nothing more than staying the course with a Bush-led military strategy that has failed our troops and failed our country."

Clinton, Obama, Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) and other Democratic White House aspirants have proposed a pre-surge-level troop cap of about 130,000 soldiers to prevent Bush from deploying more combat forces. Edwards yesterday said added forces already have begun work in Iraq, diminishing the impact of such caps. He suggested a troop ceiling of 100,000.

That number is consistent with a previous vow Edwards made to withdraw immediately about 40,000 troops should he win the presidency. He also contended that the 2002 war authorization, for which he voted but has since apologized for approving, no longer covers Bush's continued presence in Iraq.

Democrats should force Bush "to come back to Congress to seek additional authority, which I don't think he'll get," Edwards said. He said that removing Saddam Hussein from power and disarming weapons of mass destruction — which Iraq did not possess — were the missions that lawmakers authorized in 2002.

By contrast, Clinton last week characterized her own vote to authorize as a granting of leverage for weapons inspectors to enter Iraq, but not an approval of preemptive conflict. In a speech last month, she proposed requiring a new congressional authorization if the Bush administration does not meet a broad set of benchmarks for stability in Iraq.

Dodd and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), whom Edwards name-checked yesterday, previously had asserted that the 2002 authorization does not apply to the current mission in Iraq, as had Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine), who is considering a challenge to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine).

Kaine To Back Obama's Bid For Democratic Nomination (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

RICHMOND, Feb. 14 -- Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) plans to endorse Sen. Barack Obama for president Saturday, pledging early support from a Southern Democrat as the Illinois senator begins his campaign for the White House.

Kaine will sign onto Obama's presidential team ahead of the senator's appearance at the Virginia Democratic Party's annual fundraiser Saturday night, according to sources familiar with Kaine's decision. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they do not want to preempt the formal announcement.

Kaine's press secretary, Kevin Hall, declined to confirm the governor's intentions. A spokesman for Obama was not immediately available for comment Wednesday. Asked about Obama, Kaine grinned and said, "It's going to be a great day Saturday."

Kaine, who like Obama is a Harvard-educated civil rights lawyer, has made no secret of his admiration for the senator. Obama campaigned for Kaine in 2005 and joined him on the stump last year on behalf of U.S. Sen. James Webb (D). Obama's mother was from Kansas, where Kaine grew up.

In an interview with Washington Post editors and reporters last month, Kaine praised the other Democrats running for the 2008 presidential nomination as being part of "a deep field." He spoke effusively about Obama's personal charisma and abilities.

"Sen. Obama is just in a completely different category than anybody I've ever stood on a stage with," Kaine said in the Jan. 31 interview. "There is just a feeling of, you know, kind of a projection of hope on him from an audience that is just unreal. It's unreal."

Kaine said his time on the campaign trail with Obama has convinced him the first-term senator "is a person who has been through experiences that have given him sound judgment."

Shaun Kenney, a spokesman for the Republican Party of Virginia, said Kaine's endorsement of Obama would be in keeping with the political principles of both men.

"I don't think it's surprising that a governor who has proposed billion-dollar tax increases will endorse one of the most liberal members of the United States Senate," Kenney said Wednesday.

For Obama, an endorsement by Kaine on Saturday is an early victory in the competition for critical support among the nation's governors and in the South.

Virginia has for years been a Republican bastion for presidential candidates. But the victories of Kaine, Webb and former governor Mark R. Warner (D) have convinced many in the party that the state could be up for grabs in the 2008 election.

"Pundits might not say it's a complete tossup," Kaine said. "I just don't think it's a state to be taken for granted. And I don't think any smart presidential candidate will take it for granted."

Kaine had declared his intention to support Warner's presidential bid before his predecessor bowed out of the race late last year. In the recent Post interview, Kaine joked that Warner's decision opened the floodgates of interest from Democratic candidates.

"I had a complete pass and nobody was bugging me as long as Mark was running," Kaine said. "Since Mark got out, yeah, people have called me."

Kaine's decision to declare his intentions about Obama's candidacy almost a year before the first presidential primaries departs from recent tradition in Virginia. Warner endorsed Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) just a few days before the Virginia presidential primary, which Kerry won.

Also, it sets him at odds with some of his former political advisers. Kaine's 2005 campaign manager, Mike Henry, is the deputy campaign manager for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid. Mo Elleithee, who was communications director for Kaine's campaign, is also working for Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Making the announcement Saturday allows Kaine to tap into Obama's popularity among Virginia's Democratic activists.

Obama's speech at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner is expected to attract more than 3,000 Democrats to the Greater Richmond Convention Center, more than double the record for the event's history, according to state party officials.

Barack Obama's On-Point Message Man (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

On Saturday in the Lincolnesque setting of Springfield, Ill., when Barack Obama delivered his full-throated appeal to the ideals of a new generation, a lot of sharp players of the political game thought they detected something Axelrodesque.

All those "Let us" sentences in the middle, as in, "Let us be the generation . . . " -- "That's Axelrod," thought political strategist Donna Brazile.

The clever rhetorical judo of Obama's oft-quoted line, "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change!" -- "That seemed very classic Axelrod," said David Wilhelm, former chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Nineteen months to the presidential election, and already the campaign has an A-Rod!

He is David Axelrod, a former newspaper reporter who has worked on past campaigns for no fewer than five of the Democrats racing to the White House, a form of political ubiquity that only enhances his reputation. This time, he's with Obama.

A measure of his status in the top tier of Democratic spinners, scripters and fixers is that when his peers detect something subtle and good, they presume Axelrod must have had a hand in it.

Of course Axelrod won't take credit for specific lines. Consultants are supposed to stay in the background. "One thing I came to realize early in the process of working with Barack was, he was always going to be the best writer in the room," Axelrod says. "If you appreciate words and the power of them, he's a wonderful person to work with. . . . I'd say 80 percent of what he did on that platform on Saturday was in that initial draft," which Obama had e-mailed to Axelrod at about 4 a.m. Thursday.

"It's more a matter of riffing back and forth than it is of my delivering any particular piece of this," Axelrod says.

Spoken like a true consultant: Indispensable, invisible.

A candidate's media consultant is the resident storyteller, the finicky language guy, the message masseur. His job is to convey the candidate to the world. Television advertising is still king, but nowadays there are so many channels of presentation, from choreographed speeches and less formal jousting with reporters -- "You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit," scolded Obama -- to Internet pitches designed to make each voter at home in his pajamas feel special.

Campaigns are narratives annotated with policy discursions. Every candidate tells a story about who he is and why he runs. The consultant's job is to take that story and make it so engrossing that the voters won't be able to put it down.

"I wanted to win or lose based on who I am and not some concoction that somebody told me the public wanted," says Deval Patrick, whom Axelrod served in his successful race to become the first African American governor of Massachusetts last year, Patrick's first campaign. "I talked to a lot of different media consultants and so forth who were brought to me by some one who knew there was such a thing as a media consultant. Of all of them, David seemed to me to be the one most determined to respect my commitment to be myself."

"What he brings to the table," says Brazile, who watched Axelrod in action on Eleanor Holmes Norton's 1990 campaign for the District's delegate to Congress, "is the ability to help a candidate not only find their voice but also their roots. Their soul. David understands how to push through all the paper to get to the person."

Axelrod, 51, says he found a story he believed and thought voters would, too, when he and Obama, 45, became friends years ago, when the recent Harvard Law School graduate was in Chicago for a voter registration drive. He worked on Obama's 2004 Senate race.

Meanwhile, over the years Axelrod also made issue ads during Hillary Clinton's 2000 New York Senate race; served Tom Vilsack's 1998 and 2002 races for governor of Iowa; worked on Sen. Christopher Dodd's (D-Conn.) 2004 reelection; and worked on John Edwards's 2004 presidential race.

"I like each one of them," Axelrod says. The Edwards experience was a little awkward when Axelrod lost responsibility for making ads but continued as a campaign spokesman. Axelrod says there were tensions not with Edwards but with others inside the campaign whom he declined to identify. A spokesman for Edwards said he had nothing further to add to Axelrod's account.

After the heady blur of Obama's three-day "announcement tour" in Illinois, Iowa and New Hampshire, with those made-for-TV images of the candidate in all his fired-up handsomeness addressing adoring crowds -- Can any campaign ever match the horizonless possibilities of Announcement Day? -- a more difficult phase has begun.

The media are already getting cranky, clamoring for programmatic specifics, seizing on the gaffe about "wasted" lives of soldiers killed in Iraq.

Axelrod skipped the New Hampshire leg of the tour and returned to his Chicago office to edit videos from the tour for uploading to the candidate's Web site.

The former Chicago Tribune newsman says he still appreciates the role of the media. But he is also helping to guide a campaign that is finding ways to sidestep the media in ways that Richard Nixon and Bill Clinton could only fantasize about. Like his rivals, Obama is using the Internet ever more elaborately, inviting supporters to blog, interact and create their own "my.barackobama.com."

"There's an awareness that we have this channel, and we can talk in a direct and unfiltered way to our supporters," Axelrod says. "We're just in many ways introducing Barack to the American people." And then, purposely or unconsciously, he reveals that the storytelling is a battle: "We will be deploying all the possible avenues for doing that."

DOJ_NMG_0132509

He grew up middle class in New York City, where he remembers being 5 years old and hoisted onto a mailbox to watch John F. Kennedy at a campaign rally for president. At 9 he handed out leaflets for Bobby Kennedy's New York Senate run. He remembers the thump of the newspaper landing outside his apartment door.

He attended the University of Chicago because he could think of no better political town.

While he was in college, his father, Joseph, a psychologist who at the age of 9 had helped other children escape the pogroms of Eastern Europe, committed suicide.

Two days after graduation, he started at the Chicago Tribune. He became a political writer, columnist and city hall bureau chief, feasting on the brash shenanigans of his adopted home town. In one column he observed, "Insults have always been a staple of Chicago politics. The town has a rich history of name-calling. Charges of thievery, homosexuality and dementia all have been part of the high-level political debate in recent years."

But he felt the "sense of mission" draining out of journalism in the 1980s, and a business mentality beginning to take hold. Also, "I thought I might tire of chasing people down the hall to get them to tell me what I already knew." He watched the bow-tied idealist Paul Simon emerging as a Senate candidate in 1984, and thought, "This is the kind of guy who inspired me."

After that first campaign, which he co-managed with Wilhelm, he worked on Harold Washington's reelection campaign for Chicago mayor. One of his steady clients is current mayor Richard M. Daley, expected to win easy reelection to a sixth term later this month despite a City Hall corruption scandal in which Daley has not been implicated.

"He has fairly strong feelings about why he's in politics and an idealistic streak that we consultants like to think we can keep," says Anita Dunn, a Democratic political strategist. "I think he has kept it."

Not that Axelrod is a softy. "He goes negative when negative is required," says Wilhelm.

In his 1996 memoir "Bare Knuckles and Back Rooms," Ed Rollins, the Republican strategist, put Axelrod at the head of a list of "Guys I Never Want to See Lobbing Grenades at Me Again."

In the tough 1999 race for mayor of Philadelphia, when Axelrod represented John Street against Sam Katz, an attack ad Axelrod oversaw was criticized in a Philadelphia Inquirer analysis for being "filled with unsubstantiated assumptions" that were "probably misleading." Axelrod says he remains "really comfortable with the attack we made." Street won the election.

Axelrod is conflicted about the profession he left journalism to enter. "I believe there is nobility in politics," he says. "I believe there is great good that can be done."

But in the next breath he adds: "I know my business and the technology of politics and polling and focus groups, all of what we do, in some ways contributes to an atmosphere of cynicism. I try to fight that. I can't say I'm totally blameless. I think everyone in this business has a hand on that bloody dagger."

Over the years he developed a sub-specialty in urban politics, particularly representing African American mayoral candidates, including Street, Anthony Williams in Washington, Dennis Archer in Detroit, Michael White of Cleveland and Lee Brown of Houston.

Through all the national political work, Axelrod says he was never tempted to leave Chicago, where he and his wife, Susan, raised their three children, now adults. He likes to quote Wilhelm saying upon leaving Washington, "I'm going back to Chicago where at least they stab you in the front."

Now he is charged, along with one of his partners, David Plouffe, Obama's campaign manager, with helping to convey another African American candidate to a wider public. Brazile says Axelrod has a gift for that sometimes delicate task.

"He understands the African American community must see themselves in the candidate, not just their successes, but also their struggle," Brazile says. "And David gets that. I think he spends a lot of time on the basketball court with brothers, because he understands the language and how to connect."

Indeed, Axelrod is a devoted pickup hoops player, with an excellent outside shot, but "don't pass to him if you ever expect to see the ball again," Wilhelm says.

The night Obama won his 2004 Senate primary, Axelrod checked the returns. Obama won the very same precinct where in 1983, a hostile mob of whites protested a visit to a Catholic church by Washington and presidential candidate Walter Mondale.

DOJ_NMG_0132510

"I said to [Obama] that Harold Washington is smiling down on us for the progress we've made," Axelrod recalled. "I'm not naive, I'm not Pollyanna-ish, I understand we still have racial tensions and divisions in our country. . . . One of the qualities that he brings is the ability to transcend some of these divisions, and I think America is ready for that."

Listen for that line as the story continues.

Abortion Foes Target Obama Because Of His Vote Record On Illinois Legislation (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 15, 2007

Of the thousands of people who gathered in the plaza of the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., for Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign announcement last Saturday, only a handful were protesters rather than supporters.

But there were 50 or so waving signs and chanting, "No abortion, no Obama." Their voices might become a consistent presence as the senator makes his way around the country in his bid to win the White House.

Abortion foes in Illinois, following the lead of registered nurse Jill Stanek, are targeting Obama (D-Ill.) for a number of "present" and "no" votes he cast on anti-abortion legislation during his time in the Illinois state Senate.

It is hardly unusual that a Democratic candidate would receive unfavorable attention from anti-abortion groups. But Stanek and other anti-abortion crusaders in Illinois are targeting Obama because he voted on a package of legislation collectively known as the Illinois Born Alive Infants Protection Act.

The legislation came about after Stanek, then a nurse at Christ Hospital in the Chicago suburb of Oak Lawn, witnessed late-term abortions "where babies were being aborted alive and shelved to die in the soiled utility room" of the hospital, in her words.

Stanek, who said she held one of those infants until it died after about 45 minutes, began reaching out to public officials, testifying before both state and national lawmakers.

From 2001 to 2002, Obama voted either "present" or "no" on the legislation. In his floor speeches at the time, he cited in particular his concerns about the constitutionality of the definition of a "born alive infant" and the inclusion of potential civil and criminal penalties for doctors in these situations. He also warned that the bill might compromise the relationship between a woman and her doctor.

The measure failed in the Illinois statehouse in both 2001 and 2002.

In one speech in the spring of 2001, Obama said he agreed in principle with the need to protect infants, but argued that the measure went too far in its definitions of fetal viability.

"This is an area where potentially we might have compromised and … arrived at a bill that dealt with the narrow concerns about how … a pre-viable fetus or child was treated by a hospital," Obama said at the time.

At the same time, similar legislation made its way through the federal process and was eventually signed into law by President Bush in August 2002 in Pittsburgh. Stanek, now a columnist for WorldNetDaily.com, attended the signing and was mentioned by Bush.

Separately, a Senate amendment to protect infants born alive during abortion was offered by then-Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) in 2001. It passed the Senate 98-0 with all current Democratic presidential hopefuls who were in the Senate at the time voting in favor, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Joseph Biden (Del.) and then-Sen. John Edwards (N.C.).

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) spoke on the measure on the Senate floor, saying, "I, as being a pro-choice senator on this side, representing my colleagues here, have no problem whatsoever with this amendment.

"I feel good about that," Boxer said. "I feel good that we can, in fact, vote for this together. It is very rare that we can."

Obama's campaign did not return calls for comment, but Pam Sutherland, president of the Illinois Planned Parenthood Council, said the Illinois legislation was misleading and a far cry from the Senate's legislation. Obama was aware of this difference, she added.

Sutherland noted that every medical group in the state was opposed to the state legislation, which would have opened the door to "civil suits and criminal charges" for doctors and led directly to an overall ban on abortions.

"The legislation was written to ban abortion, plain and simple," she said. "Sen. Obama saw the legislation, when he was there, for what it was."

On the narrower issue of "born alive" infants, Sutherland said, Planned Parenthood of Illinois worked last year with the anti-abortion group, the Illinois Federation of Right to Life, to pass legislation that protects infants that survive abortion procedures.

But Stanek said Obama was the only state senator to speak out on the legislation, and his actions there are "just one demonstration of how liberal he is."

"Everybody in the pro-life movement is completely aware of what Obama stands for — how bad he is," she said.

Stanek, who was one of the protesters present at Obama's announcement, said she thinks anti-abortionists "may be more up in arms" over Obama's positions "than even Hillary Clinton's" because of "his extreme position" on this specific issue. But she said she knows of no concerted effort to single Obama out for his support of abortion rights.

Joseph Scheidler, the founder of the Chicago-based Pro-Life Action League who helped lead the protests in Springfield last Saturday, took a similar line. He said that while his group "won't concentrate on Obama," he wanted to cut through a "ga-ga" media following to ensure that voters know the senator's position on the issue.

"The others are all very clear about being pro-abortion," he said. "Obama has been clever enough … to keep voters confused."

Scheidler said anti-abortion groups around the country would make their presence known at campaign events for the Democratic candidates, and they might not reserve their criticisms for Democrats alone this year.

Scheidler said among the Republican candidates, only Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) is "the one we find to be pretty pure."

He questioned former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's "complete turnaround" on the abortion debate and Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) leadership on the issue. He also described former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani as "a nice guy" who is solidly in support of abortion rights, making him unqualified to lead the country, in his eyes.

Niche Marketing (WP)

By George F. Will

When Bob Hunter, a Riverside, Calif., businessman, would hear of a conservative's campaign that needed volunteers, he would pile his family into the station wagon and drive off to ring doorbells. Hunter's son Duncan grew up believing in retail politics.

When Hunter returned home after serving as an alternate Goldwater delegate at the 1964 Republican convention in San Francisco, he told Duncan about chatting with another alternate, an amiable fellow, some actor, named Reagan. Who two years later was elected governor. Duncan learned early on about rapid upward mobility in politics.

In 1969, he dropped out of college, joined the Army and was sent to Vietnam. From there he mailed his pay to a friend who purchased for him an island in Idaho's Snake River, where Duncan farmed after his discharge. Then another friend said a San Diego law school would admit him without a college degree. In 1980, he was a lawyer with a storefront office in San Diego's Hispanic community when his father walked in and told him he could be a congressman. Never mind, his father said, that this district was only 29 percent Republican. Reagan was at the top of the ticket.

Duncan says his Baptist minister, respecting the separation of church and state, told parishioners they should vote for the Reagan of their choice. They distributed 400,000 Duncan brochures. Today, Duncan Hunter is in his 14th term representing eastern San Diego County. Three weeks ago he formally launched his presidential candidacy.

Why does he think he can become the first House member elected president since James Garfield in 1880? Why does he think he can do better than the two strongest House candidates in recent elections? In 1976, Arizona Rep. Mo Udall finished second to Jimmy Carter in the New Hampshire primary (28.4 percent to 22.7 percent), then narrowly lost Wisconsin (Carter 36.6, Udall 35.6). In 1988, Missouri Rep. Dick Gephardt won Iowa, finished second to Michael Dukakis in New Hampshire, then ran out of money.

"For some candidates," Hunter says, "the conservative constituency is an inconvenience. For me, it is my hope." He hopes to be seen as the most conservative Republican candidate, as he understands conservatism. He is pro-life, an expert on defense issues, a hawk on border security (he authored the legislation that mandates 854 miles of fences across the major southern border routes used by smugglers of narcotics and people) and a skeptic about free trade.

He chaired the Armed Services Committee in the previous two Congresses and believes that the principal issue for the foreseeable future will be national security -- not just Iraq and terrorism but also the rise of China's military (perhaps nine submarines under construction, with five more to come; the purchase of Russian-built destroyers designed to attack U.S. aircraft carriers with very fast and sophisticated missiles; upward of 800 medium-range ballistic missiles deployed). He believes U.S. forces can pacify Iraq, where his son served two tours as a Marine.

Asked what his wife said when he told her he was running for president, he pauses, then says, smiling: "She's happy now." She seems remarkably resilient. Not long after a wildfire consumed his house, he asked her, "Honey, can you do a fundraiser in two weeks?" She said, "Sure. My son is in Fallujah, my house has burned down, how many people do you want to invite?"

"God bless New Hampshire," Hunter says, noting that its population (1.3 million) is less than half that of San Diego County. But he almost certainly overestimates the power of retail politics in a nominating process that is becoming increasingly compressed. California, Illinois, New Jersey and Florida might move their primaries to Feb. 5. If they do, both parties' nominees might be known a year from now. Hunter won what might have been the first contest of this presidential cycle -- the Maricopa County (Phoenix) straw poll. It's a start. He says he has $300,000 "in pledges," a sum that could be a rounding error in the McCain campaign's accounts. But he says, "I kind of know what I stand for" so "I don't need consultants, and that saves a lot of money." He has produced some commercials -- just talking to the camera -- for $200.

One-third of new businesses fail within two years; 50 to 70 percent of new products that make it to market fail. Hunter, a burly, rumpled political product seeking a market niche, probably will fail. But as Goldwater said when he entered politics in Phoenix in 1949, "It ain't for life, and it may be fun."

Al Franken Enters Minnesota Senate Race (AP)

By Patrick Condon

AP, February 15, 2007

Al Franken announced Wednesday that he will run for the Senate in 2008, making it clear that the comedian and author of "Rush Limbaugh Is A Big Fat Idiot" wants to be taken seriously as a political figure.

Franken said he would seek the Democratic nomination to challenge Republican incumbent Norm Coleman and immediately acknowledged the doubts voters may have about electing a former "Saturday Night Live" performer.

"Minnesotans have a right to be skeptical about whether I'm ready for this challenge, and to wonder how seriously I would take the responsibility that I'm asking you to give me," Franken said in a video on his Web site.

"I want you to know: Nothing means more to me than making government work better for the working families of this state, and over the next 20 months, I look forward to proving to you that I take these issues seriously," he said.

Franken's announcement came on the final day of his show on the liberal radio network Air America. His decision instantly makes him a serious contender and brings national attention to the race. He said he supports universal health care, greater efforts to find alternative energy sources and stronger congressional oversight of the executive branch.

Franken had been considering a run since 2003. He said several weeks ago that he would leave Air America and privately told prominent Democrats about his plans to seek office.

His name is well-known, and Franken is likely to be well-funded, but he's expected to be challenged by several other Democrats, including wealthy trial attorney Mike Ciresi. Franken said he would abandon his campaign if Democratic activists decide to support another candidate in the primary.

The race will be important to Democratic efforts to retain the slim Senate majority they secured last year.

His candidacy will also test whether Minnesotans are in the mood for another celebrity-turned-politician, after the 1999-2003 governorship of former pro wrestler Jesse Ventura. Ventura's fame and occasionally outrageous behavior regularly brought national attention to the state but wore on the patience of many Minnesotans.

Stephen Hess, a professor of political science at George Washington University, said Franken's bid is serious. "He's not doing this as some folks have done it to give them better gigs on the Borscht circuit."

Coleman is viewed as vulnerable because of a Democratic resurgence in Minnesota and President Bush's unpopularity. But his proven skills as a campaigner and fundraiser make him a formidable opponent.

State GOP Chairman Ron Carey suggested Franken moved back to Minnesota when he smelled opportunity and will have a tough time connecting with voters.

Franken is "going to have to explain to Minnesota how he represents his values when he spent pretty much all of his adult life in New York and Hollywood," Carey said.

Franken, 55, was born in New York City but grew up in the Minneapolis suburb of St. Louis Park. He graduated from Harvard University in 1973, and in 1975 joined the writing staff of "Saturday Night Live" during its first season. He soon began appearing in sketches and remained a fixture on the show well into the 1990s.

In 1996, Franken took his career in a political direction when he wrote "Rush Limbaugh Is A Big Fat Idiot and Other Observations," a broadside against the conservative radio host and other figures on the right. He's since published several other books critical of Republicans.

In his latest book, "The Truth (with jokes)," Franken criticized Coleman for his leadership of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, saying Coleman had not held a single hearing on Iraq war corruption.

Franken planned to make his first public appearance as a candidate Thursday at a Minneapolis clinic.

No Joke, Al Franken Is Running For Senate (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

Comedian Al Franken said yesterday that he will run for the Senate in Minnesota, giving Democrats the possibility of a celebrity candidate to face Sen. Norm Coleman, considered one of the most vulnerable Republicans in 2008.

"Minnesotans have a right to be skeptical about whether I'm ready for this challenge, and to wonder how seriously I would take the responsibility that I'm asking you to give me," Franken said in a video on his Web site. "I want you to know: Nothing means more to me than making government work better for the working families of this state, and over the next 20 months, I look forward to proving to you that I take these issues seriously," he said.

In the 2006 midterm elections, Franken's Midwest Values political action committee raised more than $1 million to benefit Democratic candidates. Cementing relationships for a future Senate run, Franken traveled the state to entertain at candidate rallies.

Franken, 55, is also likely to have access to wealthy fundraisers in Hollywood to fund his campaign.

Coleman, a first-term senator, has faced backlash in Minnesota over his party's support for the Iraq war.

Last year, he told The Washington Post that Franken's "liberal base and Hollywood supporters have supplied him with tens of thousands of dollars to promote his extreme view."

First, Franken will probably have to square off against other Democratic contenders, including Mike Ciresi, a well-known trial lawyer who spent millions on a 2000 primary campaign for Senate but lost by a small margin.Romney's Predecessor Backs McCain

Republican Jane Swift said she was backing Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), according to his exploratory committee. "McCain is a principled leader whose unwavering determination to improve the lives of Americans is admirable," she said in a statement.

Swift was the Massachusetts lieutenant governor and in 2001 succeeded Paul Cellucci as governor when Cellucci resigned to become U.S. ambassador to Canada. The next year, Romney challenged her for the gubernatorial nomination and won.

For Davis, It May Be Up Or Out (RC)

By Susan Davis And Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132514

Most politicians tend to be wary of discussing their own futures. But Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) is remarkably candid about the crossroads he is approaching in Congress.

In a Tuesday interview, Davis said unambiguously that he will run for the Senate in 2008 if five-term Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) decides to retire.

"It is safe to say that I would run," Davis said. "But if he does run, I would stand out front and take a bullet for him. I think the world of John. I would not do anything to undermine that."

Davis also acknowledged that this could be his last term in Congress. He views 2008 as his best opportunity for a Senate run, and regardless of Warner's decision he has doubts about seeking an eighth term in the House.

"I've talked to most of [the Virginia GOP delegation] and they all understand what I want to do at this point if [the Senate seat] opens. If it doesn't open then that would probably be my last shot at doing anything state-wide," he conceded, adding that he has little to no interest in other statewide offices such as the governorship.

Speculation abounded in the 109th Congress that Davis was mulling retirement, particularly as word surfaced in late 2005 that his name was floated to head up the powerful National Federation of Independent Business.

He is one Republican whose minority status would be unlikely to hurt his chances to land a lucrative job on K Street or elsewhere in the private sector, as he has built a reputation around his ability to work with Democrats.

Davis admitted that he considered retiring last year, but opted to run again in part because he believed the poor political climate would have led to Democrats picking up his Northern Virginia-based seat.

Davis, a former two-term chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, is known as a cerebral tactician, and he often appears more comfortable talking about district demographics and historic electoral trends than the issues of the day.

"I think had I left last year, which we contemplated doing, [the seat] would have gone. I don't think there's any way you would have held the seat last year, but I don't know that in 2008 we couldn't hold the seat with the right candidate," he said, adding that his leaving would depend greatly on his confidence that a Republican will take the seat.

"I haven't made any decisions on anything at this point, but if I were to leave I'll make sure we had a strong candidate lined up," he said. "I've spent too much time building majorities as campaign chairman to just desert this seat."

Had Republicans not lost the majority in November, Davis currently would be in his third, and last, term as chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee. If Republicans were to win a majority in 2008, Davis would lay claim to the gavel for one more term, which he noted is "not an irrelevant consideration" in weighing the pros of staying in the House.

Yet Davis' tenure as chairman, coupled with his willingness to buck the party on certain issues, has sometimes made him the target of ire from his GOP colleagues. Heading into the 2006 election cycle, Davis was one of the more prominent Republicans publicly conceding that the majority was lost and the GOP was headed to a 30-seat loss, at a minimum — a pronouncement that did not engender good will from the rank-and-file or his own leadership.

He sent warning signals to the NRCC and then-Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) in private memos last year advising the leadership to take certain legislative steps to head off losses, including enacting stronger lobbying and ethics reforms, that largely went unheeded.

An Independent Chairman

More than most GOP chairmen, Davis demonstrated a willingness to scrutinize the Bush administration, and his solid working relationship with his Democratic counterpart, Rep. Henry Waxman (Calif.), on the committee sometimes aggravated more partisan GOP lawmakers.

"Being a committee chairman does not mean being negative all the time, that's just not my style. When we think the Democratic majority is doing the wrong thing we're going to be the first to blow the whistle on that," he said. Democrats "are not wrong in everything they do, and we still have to move bills and shape bills and the like."

Davis noted that he already has opposed the new Democratic majority on a number of policy issues, including a recent energy bill and legislation to raise the minimum wage. "I'm hardly a shill for them, but they are not wrong on everything."

Now Waxman wields the gavel and Davis says the two continue to share a solid working relationship and regularly communicate on committee business. He said their shared stewardship over the committee's controversial hearings in the 109th Congress over steroid use in professional baseball forged a strong bond.

"Everybody was against us when we did that, but we stayed together on that and it was good team-building for the committee. Nobody wanted to touch us when we started this thing. The president didn't like it, [Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.)] didn't like it, but they all came around," he said. "You don't go through a team-building experience like that without building some rapport."

He also inflamed his colleagues, GOP leaders, and the White House when he and Waxman released a committee report only weeks before the midterm election already tainted by GOP scandals that detailed disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's contacts with the administration and ultimately led to the resignation of Susan Ralston, a top aide to White House adviser Karl Rove.

Davis acknowledged Wednesday that there was blow-back from the decision to release the report so close to Election Day, but was he unapologetic about the move.

"There's never good timing for an Abramoff investigation," Davis said. "Look, this was the largest scandal to invoke Congress in 20 years and you didn't want to say 'Republicans aren't doing anything.' In fact, I feel a little bit vindicated because after [Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.)] and stuff, all this became blown up and lack of oversight became a major charge."

As for the House's current debate, Davis plans to join several of his moderate GOP colleagues this week by voting in favor of the Democratic resolution disapproving of President Bush's Iraq strategy.

The Political Junkie

Despite Davis' independent streak, his colleagues continue to rely on his prowess as a political tactician. NRCC Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) asked Davis to serve as his No. 2 for the upcoming 2008 election cycle as chairman of the executive committee.

Despite rumors last year, Davis denied that he ever considered another bid for the chairmanship. "If I really wanted to take a leadership role I would have run again for the chairmanship," he said. "Tom Cole is a very good guy, a very smart guy, and I'm only doing it because he asked me. It's nothing I would have volunteered for."

Davis said there is no guarantee Republicans can regain a majority in one election cycle. "Nobody can answer that at this point because we don't have any idea what the issue matrix will be, where the war will be, who the presidential candidates will be, but those are the major variables," he said. "Having said that, looking at broad outlines, we have a number of Democrats who were carried in last time who were not first-tier candidates who will probably be vulnerable to a strong Republican challenge."

Davis said there were "six to eight" seats that Republicans have a very strong chance to reclaim in 2008, including the seats formerly held by GOP Reps. Tom DeLay (Texas), Richard Pombo (Calif.) and Don Sherwood (Pa.), as well as Foley and Bob Ney (Ohio).

The Virginian

But Davis also knows that opening up a Democratic-trending seat like the one that he holds won't be helpful to the GOP's cause to make up ground lost in 2006.

Fairfax County Board of Supervisors Chairman Gerry Connelly (D) is viewed as likely to run for Davis' seat. Davis used the same board position as a springboard to Congress in 1994 and Connelly would be a strong contender.

While Davis said he would not abandon his seat without lining up a top-flight candidate — one who would undoubtedly fit the Congressman's same moderate ideological mold — it also isn't likely that conservatives in the district would pass up the opportunity to nominate one of their own.

If that happens, the fight for Davis' seat could become an important junction in the larger struggle now facing Virginia Republicans, who rose to political dominance in the state in the mid-to-late 1990s.

Republicans have lost the past two statewide elections in the Commonwealth, and Northern Virginia is expected to be the epicenter of Democratic efforts to pick up state legislative seats this fall. Davis' wife, state Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R), is among those facing a tough re-election contest.

Davis has been a vocal critic of his party's growing reliance on catering to the needs of its conservative base, and if he does get the opportunity to seek statewide office it will be a test of whether party elders have been listening to his sermons.

He argues that Republicans' old formula for getting elected — managing losses in Northern Virginia and then making it up with large margins in the rest of the state — is outdated and that his party will continue to lose if it does not accept that.

"The last Republican to be nominated from Northern Virginia was 1981 when it was 15 percent of the vote, now it's doubled, and growing," he said. "So I think anybody can do the math and say we need to bring it into the coalition. That means an acceptance sometimes of candidates that are going to have a little bit different issue matrix than people from southern Virginia."

As a start, one of Davis' constituents recently became state Republican Party chairman. Ed Gillespie, a lobbyist and former Republican National Committee chairman, took the reins of the party recently, although Davis said that his new position requires paying more attention to the party base.

If Warner does retire, Davis hardly would have the GOP field to himself. Former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore (R), who already has launched a quixotic 2008 presidential bid, has indicated interest in another statewide run and several of Davis' House colleagues have Senate ambitions as well.

Davis has been the most aggressive in laying the groundwork for a 2008 run, spending part of the previous cycle traveling around the state.

But Davis also spent the bulk of his campaign war chest in 2006 not taking anything for granted in his race against an unknown and underfunded Democratic challenger.

He spent $3.3 million on his re-election , including more than $105,000 for polling despite the fact that he was not viewed as particularly vulnerable.

The survey data — much of which looked far beyond his own House race — is just one indication of how intimately involved Davis is in the local politics of his 11th district, which takes in most of Fairfax County and portions of Prince William County.

In the previous cycle he donated $45,000 to the Fairfax County Republican Committee, $45,000 to the Republican Party of Virginia and $180,000 to the NRCC.

The Congressman — who once coached a Little League team with now-Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) — also knows the importance of the grass roots.

In the previous cycle he also gave $7,300 to Little League teams in his district.

Appellate Court Hears Dispute On Stem-cell Initiative (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

The California Court of Appeal in San Francisco heard oral arguments Wednesday in the 2-year-old dispute that has kept the state's voter-created stem-cell institute from issuing any of the $3 billion in bonds approved under Proposition 71, the 2004 stem-cell research initiative.

The plaintiffs in the two consolidated lawsuits are appealing a decision by the Alameda County Superior Court in April that upheld the constitutionality of the institute and its citizen oversight committee.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs -- the People's Advocate, National Tax Limitation Foundation and California Family Bioethics Council -- argued again that Proposition 71 was unconstitutional because it created a taxpayer-funded entity that is not under the direct management and control of the state. They also argued that the proposition violated the single-subject rule for such measures and that the citizen board has conflicts of interest.

The three-judge panel, whose members interrupted the plaintiff's arguments numerous times, has 90 days to rule but is expected to do so relatively quickly. Both sides have said they would appeal to the California Supreme Court. Meanwhile, the stem-cell institute plans to award $24 million in research grants Friday, drawing on a state loan and private donations. The institute last year awarded $12 million in training grants to 16 California institutions.

New Congress, New Lobbyists (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

WASHINGTON -- After Democrats took over Congress earlier this year, they set new limits on lobbyists, aiming to reduce their influence on Capitol Hill.

But the launch of a new firm, Heather Podesta+Partners, shows that, rather than diminishing the clout of Democratic lobbyists, the new Congress has led to the creation of a fresh crop, whose sway could grow even more as the 2008 presidential campaign heats up.

Ms. Podesta's tale illustrates how hard it is to cut the link between lobbyists and politicians. These relationships often forged at the start of careers, when working together on Capitol Hill as low-level staff or while knocking on doors along the campaign trail.

During the first week of the new Congress, freshly sworn-in House leader Nancy Pelosi was in the Capitol's speaker's lobby one evening greeting Ms. Podesta with a kiss on the cheek. Ms. Podesta was there to pose in the official swearing-in photo for California Democratic Rep. Ellen Tauscher, a long-time friend who had advised Ms. Podesta on setting up her firm -- an enterprise she launched based on her confidence in maneuvering the reshaped corridors of power.

After Democrats' victory in November, Ms. Podesta's friends on Capitol Hill suddenly were more powerful -- and her links to them more valuable to clients seeking to influence Congress. That helped Ms. Podesta to build a roster of clients -- such as software provider SAP Americas, which has an interest in new patent legislation, as well as HealthSouth Corp. and health-care provider Cigna Corp., which are concerned by talk of cuts in Medicare payments.

"There will never be a better time to do this," Ms. Podesta said, about launching her firm.

Capitol Hill Career

Ms. Podesta, 37 years old, has worked on and off as a Capitol Hill staffer and lawyer since graduating from the University of California at Berkeley. She worked as an aide to the late Rep. Bob Matsui (D., Calif.), an ally of then-Minority Whip Pelosi. That job gave her a seat at Ms. Pelosi's strategy sessions.

In 2003, she married Tony Podesta, a Democratic lobbyist and brother of former Clinton White House Chief of Staff John Podesta.

Ms. Podesta left Capitol Hill in 2004 to become a lawyer and lobbyist at Blank Rome LLP., a rare Democrat in a Republican-leaning firm, and eventually became a major Democratic fund-raiser. The Podestas estimate they raised $1 million for Democratic candidates in last year's congressional campaign.

For Washington Sen. Maria Cantwell, Ms. Podesta flew in four female chefs from Seattle to prepare one course each for a fund-raiser. She had Alice Waters, founder of California's Chez Panisse, prepares meals at an event for Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow event. After the election, Blank Rome offered to make her an equity partner while other firms tried to recruit her away. It was a turning point: "I had to decide if I wanted to invest in the firm or in me," she recalls.

On Dec. 15, she chose the latter. She turned for advice to Ms. Tauscher, a former Wall Street executive poised to lead the moderate New Democrat Coalition. Ms. Tauscher, who was elected in 1996, became friends with Ms. Podesta after working with her on Capitol Hill and socializing at Democratic events. Their first topic: the firm's name. Ms. Podesta leaned dramatic: "Butterfly-Sting Strategies" and "Velvet Steel Strategies." Ms. Tauscher nixed the word "strategies" and urged a name with a clear message.

Before opening her firm Jan. 1, Ms. Podesta persuaded all her Blank Rome clients to shift at least some of their business to her new shop. She scrambled to have business cards ready by Jan. 3, the opening of the new Congress.

Setting Up Shop

On the morning of Jan. 4, she headed to the Senate Rules Committee room for the swearing-in reception for Maryland Democratic Sen. Ben Cardin, whose campaign she helped with three events raising more than $100,000. Sporting a "Madame Speaker 2007" pin she had received at the previous day's Pelosi tea party, Ms. Podesta positioned herself in Sen. Cardin's path.

"Hi, Heather. Thank you," he said, amid a hug from another well-wisher. Ms. Podesta offered congratulations and departed. "That's a twofer. Done," she says, noting he recognized her and remembered her support.

After a taxi ride -- during which she made a pitch about her firm's lobbying services on her cellphone to HealthSouth -- she caught Independent-Democrat Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, as he arrived for lunch in a ballroom across town. Mr. Lieberman called, "Heather, you look marvelous."

By day's end, Ms. Podesta had given away dozens of business cards, cornered several executives at parties, and greeted almost every new Democratic senator.

In addition to HealthSouth, Cigna and SAP, clients on her first lobbyist disclosure report filed last week, include Michigan's Thomas M. Cooley Law School; Aramark Corp., a food and uniform provider; and the Casey Family Foundation, which provides foster-care services and prepares studies circulated on Capitol Hill. Her fees range from $15,000 to $35,000 a month. Ms. Podesta estimated her monthly business income at the end of January at about $100,000.

Ms. Podesta says she isn't concerned the new lobbying rules will hurt her ability to represent clients on Capitol Hill. She says she doesn't need to pay for politicians' lunches or plane rides to get access.

Ms. Tauscher says she can remain friends with Ms. Podesta without being unduly influenced. "My job is to listen to everybody and then make decisions that can be supported by facts," she says.

Looking to 2008

Nadeam Elshami, a spokesman for Ms. Pelosi, downplays the significance of the speaker's interactions with Ms. Podesta saying: "The Democratic majority broke the link between lobbyists and legislators by passing bipartisan landmark reforms to restore accountability, honesty, and openness to the House of Representatives."

In the midst of pitching clients and filing corporate organizing papers, Ms. Podesta also has been sought after as a fund-raiser by Democratic presidential hopefuls Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton. She has known all of them for years.

On Feb. 1, Ms. Podesta decided to join the Clinton camp. "Hillary's in and so am I," Ms. Podesta said, in a telephone call with the campaign's finance director, Jonathan Mantz.

Mr. Mantz outlined the campaign's plans to set up a regional fund-raising network spanning the country. Ms. Podesta agreed to try to generate $250,000 for the Clinton campaign. "The maximum I can do is $4,600," Ms. Podesta confirms, committing to the top amount permitted from an individual for the primary and general election. "I'm going to do that today," she adds.

"Beautiful," Mr. Mantz says.

Majority Formalizes K St. Ties (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

As Congressional Democrats firm their grip on power, they are opening a regular channel of communication with corporate lobbyists.

Leaders from the new majorities in both chambers have begun meeting twice a month with K Street allies to keep them apprised of their agenda and strategy.

The huddles, organized by the centrist think tank Third Way, are bringing together as many as 80 lobbyists to hear updates from Democratic leadership aides.

Lobbyists familiar with the meetings said they are becoming a hot ticket as Democrats wrap up work on their “100 hours” agenda and turn their focus toward formulating plans for the rest of the year.

“The pivot to regular order means that everybody is really focused on how to start putting together the coalitions to get things done, and how to find ways to work with the business community so there isn’t a constant battle,” said one Democratic lobbyist with ties to leadership.

Unlike their predecessors in the GOP, Democratic leaders face the challenge of juggling two key but regularly conflicting constituencies: business and labor. While members of those two camps found a few areas of agreement during the previous Congress — most notably on pension and immigration reform — they are ramping up for battles on big-ticket items this year. They already have locked horns on a minimum-wage hike and foresee major clashes over health care, trade and union-organizing measures.

And while Democratic leaders are keeping corporate interests attuned to their plans, they are closely coordinating with labor unions, whose backing helped restore the party to power. On Wednesday, presidents of about a half-dozen major unions met with majority leaders in both chambers to discuss their priorities. Twenty-two Senators, including Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), turned out for one meeting. Union officials got a separate audience with a full complement of leaders on the other side of the Capitol, including Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), according to those in attendance.

"There was a recognition that we won't get everything we want done this year, but [Democratic leaders] expressed their happiness at being in the majority, and everybody from the union side shared that opinion," said one source at the meetings.

The organization started the event to replace one founded by Senate Democratic aides. The original meeting, informally known as the Monday Group, was shuttered early last year when Democrats on Capitol Hill grew nervous about appearances while seeking to make ethics reform a central campaign message.

While the crowd at the new meeting claims many familiar faces and is still held on alternating Mondays, there are some differences. It has moved from its original location at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee to a rented conference room in the Hall of States Building on North Capitol Street. House aides are now looped in. And the ranks of K Streeters in attendance have grown, including some Republicans.

"The list is large and very inclusive. We've got nothing to hide," said Matt Bennett, Third Way's vice president for public affairs and a co-chairman of the meeting.

He said fundraising pitches from leadership are off-limits, as are lobbying pitches from the crowd. Instead, the session provides an opportunity for information sharing on the issue of the day. A meeting on Jan. 22, the day before the State of the Union address, focused on the Democratic response to the president's speech. Another, earlier this month, centered on the Iraq War debate in the Senate and a report from the House Democrats' retreat.

"There's so much misinformation in this town. It's like a game of telephone: When you get two steps removed, the information gets less accurate," said Jonathon Jones, who co-founded the original meetings as chief of staff to Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.). Now a lobbyist with Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland & Stewart, Jones co-hosts the meetings with Bennett. "This is an opportunity for leadership to communicate directly with people downtown and give them the facts."

One lobbyist in regular attendance added, "There is no such thing as too much information being put out to the public, no such thing as too much dialogue."

The next meeting, scheduled for Feb. 26, will feature two top Reid aides — Penny Lee, senior adviser for communications, and Mark Wetjen, counsel and senior policy adviser — and, from the House, Gina Mahoney, Hoyer's senior policy adviser, according to an invitation.

Bush Rejects Criticism Over Korean Nuclear Deal (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, February 15, 2007

US President George W. Bush has rejected criticism of a breakthrough nuclear deal with North Korea and launched a personal bid to press Pyongyang to live up to its commitments.

Bush telephoned Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun and they agreed to work together to ensure North Korea kept its side of the pact adopted at six-nation talks in Beijing this week.

Speaking at a White House press conference, the US leader said the agreement aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear weapons was a "good first step" but added "there is a lot of work to be done to make sure that the commitments made in this agreement become a reality."

Bush defended the deal against critics, including from his key conservative base, who said that offering aid and other guarantees to North Korea in return for disbanding its nuclear network was rewarding "bad behavior" and a sign of US weakness.

Among the agreement's vocal critics was Washington's former envoy to the United Nations, John Bolton, who called it "a very bad deal" that shows US weakness at a time when Washington is challenging Iran over its controversial nuclear program.

It also "undercuts" UN sanctions resolutions against North Korea, Bolton said.

"I strongly disagree, strongly disagree with his assessment," Bush said, however.

The US leader said he wanted to solve the North Korean nuclear crisis peacefully and that he had "an obligation to try all diplomatic means necessary to do so.

"I changed the dynamic on the North Korean issue by convincing other people to be at the table with us on the theory that the best diplomacy is diplomacy in which there is more than one voice that has got an equity in the issue speaking," he explained.

"Now, those who say the North Koreans have got to prove themselves by actually following through in the deal are right, and I'm one," he said.

Under the accord, North Korea will be given 50,000 tonnes of fuel aid for closing their key Yongbyon nuclear facility north of Pyongyang and allowing UN nuclear inspectors back into the country.

The hardline Stalinist state would eventually receive one million tonnes if the accord advances as planned and it permanently disables key facilities.

The United States, for its part, would begin the process of delisting the North as a sponsor of terrorism and normalizing relations with a country with which it is still technically at war, dating back to the 1950s Korean conflict.

Bush on Wednesday telephoned Japanese Prime Minister Abe and South Korean President Roh, who "agreed on the importance of close coordination on North Korea," said US National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

Bush said the accord "has provided a way forward for North Korea, but that North Korea must live up to its commitments. The Japanese and South Korean leaders pledged to make sure that North Korea does so," Johndroe added.

Roh's spokesman and a Japanese press agency confirmed that the allies had agreed to keep pressure on Pyongyang to abide by the terms of the agreement unveiled Tuesday.

Bush said China and Russia together with US military allies South Korea and Japan had played a crucial role in moving to end the nuclear crisis afflicting the Korean peninsula.

"Perhaps the most significant voice that had been added to the table was China," he said.

Bush also promised to step up food aid to impoverished North Korea if Kim Jong-Il's regime took "verifiable measures" to end its nuclear weapons program.

On the question of US financial sanctions on North Korea, Bush said it should be treated "separate" from the nuclear weapons issue, even though US chief negotiator Christopher Hill said Monday that Washington intended to resolve the matter within 30 days.

Accusing Pyongyang of money laundering and counterfeiting, the United States imposed the sanctions in 2005, effectively freezing 24 million dollars in North Korean funds in Macau-based Banco Delta Asia.

Meanwhile Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told Russian journalists that Moscow plans a "radical reduction" in the debt it is owed by North Korea.

"We are discussing settling the debt," he said. "Conditions can vary but in any event it will be a radical reduction in the North Korean debt.

On Thursday officials from the two Koreas prepared to hold talks aimed at reviving a high-level dialogue and possibly open the way for major aid shipments.

Seoul's delegation, led by Lee Kwan-Se, an assistant unification minister, left for Kaesong early Thursday for the one-day working-level talks, Yonhap news agency reported.

"We hope to make substantive progress not only in a solution to the North's nuclear weapons programme, but also in the government's policy of peace and prosperity by resuming the cabinet-level talks," Unification Minister Lee Jae-Joung told the team.

Conservatives Assail North Korea Accord (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

DOJ_NMG_0132521

The White House yesterday found itself fending off a conservative revolt over the North Korea nuclear deal, even scrambling to mollify one of its own top officials who expressed sharp disagreement with a provision that could spring Pyongyang from the list of countries that sponsor terrorism, U.S. officials said yesterday.

Elliott Abrams, a deputy national security adviser, fired off e-mails expressing bewilderment over the agreement and demanding to know why North Korea would not have to first prove it had stopped sponsoring terrorism before being rewarded with removal from the list, according to officials who reviewed the messages.

John R. Bolton, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called the agreement -- in which North Korea would freeze its main nuclear facility in exchange for an initial supply of fuel oil -- "a bad deal" that violated principles that were closely held in the beginning of the Bush administration.

And the National Review, a conservative bastion, yesterday slammed the agreement as essentially the same one negotiated by President Bill Clinton in 1994 -- a charge the Bush administration rejects. "When exactly did Kim Jong Il become trustworthy?" the magazine's editors asked. The Wall Street Journal editorial page, normally a Bush supporter, also condemned the accord yesterday as "faith-based nonproliferation."

Bolton's comments, the barbs from conservative publications and the Abrams e-mails reflected deep concerns among conservatives that the agreement could turn out to be an important and troubling turning point. Current and former Bush officials said they fear that after six years they are losing control of foreign policy to more pragmatic forces. The shift, they said, has become especially apparent with the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld, who as defense secretary was often seen as a counterweight to State.

More specifically, conservatives said, they worry that the administration's willingness to bend on North Korea does not bode well for hard-line policies toward Iran, the Palestinians or other issues. Indeed, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov yesterday called on the United States to demonstrate "the same flexibility, a sensible flexibility" toward Iran's nuclear program.

At a news conference yesterday, Bush appeared irritated by criticism from Bolton, once a leader of the administration's conservatives. When a reporter mentioned that Bolton, whom Bush championed, had called it a bad deal, Bush smiled ruefully. "I strongly disagree, strongly disagree with his assessment," Bush said.

Abrams, a legendary bureaucratic infighter and outspoken neoconservative, is responsible for policies aimed at promoting democracy overseas. Officials who reviewed his e-mails on the nuclear deal would not quote from them but described the messages because they agreed with the concerns and wanted to make public the depth of disagreement within the administration. They said Abrams appeared frustrated because so many key decisions had been made at the highest levels without much vetting by officials scattered across the government.

Abrams, they said, was especially concerned about a section of the agreement that stated: "The U.S. will begin the process of removing the designation of the DPRK as a state-sponsor of terrorism, and advance the process of terminating the application of the Trading with the Enemy Act with respect to the DPRK." DPRK is the abbreviation of North Korea's official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. Countries that are on the U.S. terrorism list are subject to trade and other sanctions.

In an e-mail that Abrams sent to officials involved in Asia policy and nonproliferation policy, he reminded the recipients that, in a deal with Libya on abandoning weapons of mass destruction, the United States said it would start a "delisting" process only if Libya ended its support for terrorism -- and that the terrorism track was separate from the weapons deal.

When one of the Asia experts replied that the process was young, Abrams shot back that he thought that section of the deal was bad.

Gordon Johndroe, a National Security Council spokesman, did not dispute this account but said: "Initial press reports on the six-party-talks agreement sparked a discussion among staff that were seeking clarification of some of the deal's aspects. All has been clarified, and we look forward to implementation."

The provision that irritated Abrams has also sparked concern in Japan, which fears that the United States will remove North Korea from the terrorism list before North Korea has come clean on its kidnappings of Japanese citizens decades ago. Bush tried to mollify those concerns in a phone call yesterday with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe. The State Department says North Korea has not committed a terrorist act since the 1987 bombing of a Korean Air Lines flight.

Bush defended the nuclear agreement as a "unique deal," in part because of his decision to bring in other nations, such as China.

"I changed the dynamic on the North Korean issue by convincing other people to be at the table with us on the theory that the best diplomacy is diplomacy in which there is more than one voice," Bush said.

Bolton later stood by his criticism. "I'm very sad about the president's change in policy," he said in an interview. "The policy as originally articulated and implemented in the first term was exactly right. There's no need to change it. The pressure was what brought North Korea to the table originally. Why get rid of the pressure?"

Asked if he felt disloyal to Bush, who stood by him through a long and ultimately unsuccessful Senate confirmation fight, Bolton said: "I didn't say anything for a good long time, and I wouldn't have said anything if they hadn't changed the policy. I'm loyal to the original policy."

South Korea And Japan Split On North Korea Pact (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

TOKYO, Feb. 14 — The deal to freeze North Korea's nuclear program has had immediate ripple effects in Japan and South Korea, apparently freeing South Korea's hands and tying Japan's.

A day after the accord was brokered, requiring the North to shut its main nuclear reactor in return for food and fuel assistance, the South Korean government invited North Korea to resume ministerial talks suspended after its nuclear test last October. Seoul announced that officials from both sides had agreed to meet Thursday in Kaesong, just north of the demilitarized zone.

"What is very important about the agreement is that it not only resolves the North Korea nuclear issue itself," South Korea's president, Roh Moo-hyun, said, "but, in a further step, it includes a clause for discussions, negotiations on establishing a permanent peace regime on the Korean Peninsula."

But in Tokyo, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe came under attack from members of the opposition and his own party for his government's refusal to provide assistance to the North over what it says are unresolved cases of Japanese abducted by North Korean agents. Critics said Tokyo's narrow focus on this issue, seemingly at the expense of regional stability, would leave it isolated.

"We must not be isolated and we are not in fact isolated," Mr. Abe said in Parliament. "Other countries understood our decision not to provide oil unless progress is made in the abduction issue."

South Korea, by contrast, appeared set to resume its economic and diplomatic engagement of the North, a policy that had long strained its relations with the Bush administration. "It will be easier for President Roh to carry out his engagement policy now, maybe even further than he ever had," said Shin Jung-wha, a political scientist at Dongseo University in Pusan, South Korea.

The deal also made it more unlikely that South Korea would alter its policy even if the conservative opposition were to win in next December's presidential election. "Many Koreans feel that President Roh has been too lenient on North Korea," Ms. Shin said. "But there is a national consensus on the engagement policy, and, if the conservatives gain power next December, there might be a few tweaks but no fundamental change in the policy."

In Japan's case, Mr. Abe's government tied the nuclear talks to the cases of Japanese abducted by the North in the 1970s. The North has acknowledged kidnapping a dozen Japanese and it returned five survivors four years ago, saying the rest had died. But Japan says more survivors remain in the North.

Mr. Abe made his political career by championing the abduction issue, which critics say he has exploited to stir nationalist sentiments. Analysts say it would be difficult for Mr. Abe, whose approval ratings have plummeted after a series of scandals and gaffes, to compromise on the issue.

At the same time, refusing to assist North Korea in keeping with the accord could lead to charges that Japan was putting regional stability at risk over a domestic issue that has little resonance outside Japan.

"Japan should be conducting diplomacy with a broader perspective," said Makoto Taniguchi, president of Iwate Prefectural University in Japan and a former senior diplomat. "It should be thinking of Asian security and peace. If Japan thinks narrowly, only of its relations with the United States at the expense of its relations with its neighbors, it will find itself excluded.

"Japanese diplomacy has, so to speak, been abducted by the abduction issue," Mr. Taniguchi added.

The Japanese government said it hoped to address the abduction issue in a working group established under the accord and aimed at normalizing relations between Japan and North Korea. Tokyo has said it would not normalize relations with the North and provide it with reparations for its colonial rule unless the abducted Japanese were accounted for.

But Japan's emphasis on the abductions in the working group is likely to bring forth a long list of historical grievances on North Korea's part. A North Korean Foreign Ministry official, Ri Pyong-dok, told the Kyodo news agency in Japan that the North's focus in the working group would be on Japan's colonial rule.

"The settlement of crimes committed by Japan is a priority," Mr. Ri said. "Without that, there will be no normalization of relations between the two countries."

China Wins Praise Over N Korea Deal (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Anna Fifield

Financial Times, February 15, 2007

In the wake of the latest breakthrough in the long-running negotiations to end North Korea's rogue nuclear programme China has again won plaudits for muscling its recalcitrant neighbour to the table and brokering a deal.

"China has done a great job of getting us together," Christopher Hill, the chief US negotiator, said after the first day of talks in what became a mantra he repeated throughout the week.

When the agreement was announced on Tuesday, Mr Hill stressed it could not have been done without Beijing and praised his Chinese counterpart, Wu Dawei.

But far from solidifying Beijing's role on the diplomatic stage, the talks underlined its variable approach to global disputes. While Beijing has become Washington's indispensable partner in North Korea, it has consistently refused to sign on to the western agenda to end the killings in Darfur, Sudan, and so far reluctantly gone along with limited sanctions against Iran.

Local experts in international relations have also taken a more nuanced view of Chinese activism than Mr Hill, with some suggesting that Beijing's role was diminished in the latest talks.

Shi Yinhong, of Renmin University in Beijing, said that the deal had mostly been hammered out in bilateral meetings between the US and North Korea in Berlin in January.

"Generally, the US and North Korea bypassed the other countries [in the six-party talks]. China's role has been reduced," he said on Wednesday. "North Korea has taken a hostile attitude to China since last year. They have slapped China in the face again and again."

China has long had a fraught relationship with its fraternal neighbour. Pyongyang relies on Beijing for vital fuel and food aid but resents China's role in marshalling international pressure on its nuclear programme and also its market economy.

The bilateral relationship hit new lows last year when Pyongyang conducted missile tests and then later exploded a nuclear device, in defiance of Beijing's wishes.

Beijing has always walked a tightrope in calculating its interests in the six-party talks. On the one hand, it wants them to succeed, but not at the expense of ceding influence in North Korea to the US.

Shen Dingli, of Fudan University in Shanghai, gave China more credit for this week's deal, saying its assertiveness was important in pushing North Korea into signing.

Delegates to the talks supported this view, saying the Chinese had taken the draft agreement forged in Berlin and worked it into a joint statement, shuttling be-tween the numerous bilateral meetings to hone the deal.

They said China ran the meeting with an iron fist, adding that it was Mr Wu's decision to impose the Monday deadline to inject the stagnating talks with some momentum.

Beijing's officials were then "banging heads together" during the 16-hour marathon talks that resulted in an agreement all sides could put their signatures on, delegates said.

But Mr Shen reflected the pessimistic mood about the talks' future in Chinese circles, saying he did not believe Pyongyang was ready to give up the nuclear weapons it had worked so hard to acquire. "A nuclear state like this will not abandon its weapons without regime change," he said.

Zhang Liangui, a professor at the Central Party School, a training ground for senior officials, said this week's agreement was superior in many ways to the one struck by the Clinton administration in 1994, because of the stricter timelines.

But the suggestion that the agreement will bring closer relations between the US and North Korea, if it came to pass, would not necessarily be favourable for Beijing.

"North Korea is trying to replace the six-party talks with the Berlin model, where the agreement made in bilateral talks could later be sent to the six-party talks for approval," Mr Zhang said. "China could be sidelined, as the six-party talks become a rubber stamp." ¦ The two Koreas will meet today to discuss resuming stalled high-level talks, officials said, in a sign of warmer relations, AP reports from Seoul.

Cabinet-level talks were suspended last year amid chilled relations following North Korea's missile launches in July and nuclear test in October.

Agreement Falls Short (USAT)

By Bruce Klingner

USA Today, February 15, 2007

The six-party agreement announced in Beijing Tuesday has significant shortfalls that will hinder efforts to denuclearize North Korea. Its vague provisions and deferred requirements provide Pyongyang with loopholes that it will seek to exploit. Moreover, the accord sends a dangerously accommodating signal not only to North Korea, but also to Iran and other aspiring nuclear weapons states.

Conspicuously absent is any direct reference to North Korea's uranium-based weapons program, which was the catalyst for both sides abrogating a 1994 agreement. The accord doesn't address the steps by which North Korea must divest itself of nuclear weapons it has. Nor does it provide assurances that Pyongyang will agree to verification measures sufficient to allay international concerns over past cheating. The Beijing agreement defers settlement of most of the significant issues to five working groups.

It may still be possible to salvage the results. Doing so, however, requires insisting upon stricter measures in follow-on negotiations to ensure that North Korea divests itself of nuclear weapons expeditiously and in a rigorously verifiable manner.

During these subsequent negotiations, the six party countries must: ensure that the uranium-based nuclear weapons program is subject to the agreement; require verifiable dismantlement of all nuclear weapons and programs; and make progress in providing security reassurances, a permanent peace treaty and formal diplomatic recognition conditional on North Korean behavior and satisfactory resolution of the Japanese and South Korean abductee issue.

At the same time, the United States should maintain pressure on Pyongyang, including taking action against any North Korean entities engaged in illicit activities; pressing countries to comply with United Nations sanctions against North Korea's weapons of mass destruction and missile programs; and continuing efforts to deter North Korean proliferation of WMD or missiles.

Washington should underscore that its willingness to continue discussions is not an open-ended commitment and recommend a deadline. Doing so would prevent Pyongyang from dragging out negotiations and solidifying international de facto recognition of North Korea as a nuclear weapons state. We must not lower the bar for success.

One of the most important things President Bush could achieve before leaving office would be to persuade North Korea to follow Libya's path by giving up its nuclear weapons program.

That's a tall order, given that North Korea's eccentric leader, Kim Jong Il, has been making nuclear weapons, has carried out his first nuclear test, and may have continued selling nuclear parts and technology. But this week, progress seems more possible than at any other time since Bush took office (and subsequently took a hard-line approach to North Korea). Under a new "action plan" announced Tuesday, North Korea will get energy aid and direct talks with the United States in exchange for shutting down its main nuclear reactor within 60 days. In return, the administration is easing a financial squeeze that had begun to cut off Kim's favorite luxury goods.

The deal, though welcome, is no cause for starry-eyed optimism. North Korea gets to keep its declared nuclear weapons — perhaps 10 — pending future negotiations. Further, the secretive nation has a history of deceit. A 1994 deal collapsed eight years later when North Korea admitted it was cheating. This time, it might well be trying to con the outside world into giving it aid and fuel.

Nevertheless, the deal is notable on two counts. It is a "first step," as President Bush put it. A baby step, perhaps, but one without which no others would be possible. And it is an interesting measure of how far the debacle in Iraq has moved Bush toward pragmatic diplomacy and away from the hard-liners who favored the war and who rushed to attack Tuesday's agreement with North Korea. As in Iraq, they would prefer to make threats and dictate terms.

Instead, the deal is a toehold for talks with the bizarrely isolated North Koreans and a way to get nuclear inspectors into the country. At best, North Korea could follow the Libya pattern. At worst, little is lost.

One reason the new agreement might last longer than the 1994 deal is that it involves China, Russia, South Korea and Japan in addition to the United States and North Korea. China's role was particularly significant. Part of its reluctance to use its leverage with its Stalinist former ally North Korea, which depends on Beijing for energy and food, was its fear of a flood of North Korean refugees. But China toughened up after North Korea carried out a nuclear test four months ago, embarrassing Beijing and sparking fears of a nuclear arms race in the region.

The deal is attracting criticism from the right and left. Conservatives are outraged at how vague the action plan is beyond the initial freeze, in contrast to the 1994 agreement: no mention of destroying nuclear weapons North Korea has, or of its parallel uranium enrichment program. Liberals wonder what took so long when a similar agreement might have curbed North Korea's nuclear ambitions sooner.

Both critiques have some merit. At this point, however, even a shaky deal is better than no deal. Ever since Bush called Iran, Iraq and North Korea an "axis of evil" in 2002, all three have become more dangerous places. This agreement has potential to ratchet down tensions on the Korean peninsula.

Belatedly trying diplomatic pragmatism in North Korea is worth the effort — and could provide a model for Iran. Clearly, there's a long way to go. But, as an old Chinese proverb would have it, the journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step.

Canceled TV Speech Points To Hamas And Fatah Split (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

JERUSALEM, Feb. 14 — In another sign of tension with Hamas over a possible national unity government, the Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas of the Fatah faction, canceled a televised speech scheduled for Thursday night, his aides said Wednesday.

In the speech, Mr. Abbas was to have told Palestinians about his talks with Hamas leaders in Mecca, Saudi Arabia. But those talks, which ended last Thursday with a proclamation of success, left many details unresolved, including who would fill key posts like interior minister, which controls the Hamas-dominated parallel police force, known as the Executive Force. The details of a political program for the new government are also unclear.

European and American officials have not been convinced by Mr. Abbas that a new government will meet international conditions for resuming direct budgetary aid to the Palestinian Authority. Washington and Israel insist that a new government recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and terrorism and accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Mr. Abbas's aides argue that all these conditions are met implicitly and that the Mecca accord means significant movement from Hamas, but in fact, in the agreement there is no mention of Israel at all and no rejection of violence against Israel.

On Wednesday evening, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, a close aide to Mr. Abbas, told Palestinian television that the president would postpone his speech until he could have further talks with Hamas in Gaza.

[A news agency] reported that another Abbas aide, who was not identified, said: "Hamas has made several unacceptable conditions that cannot be implemented. The Mecca agreement cannot be reinterpreted and must be implemented immediately without any conditions." This aide said that Hamas was putting new conditions on who will fill the jobs of interior and foreign ministers, which are supposed to go to independents approved by Hamas.

The Art Of The Possible Peace (WP)

By Dennis Ross

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East this weekend and hold a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Her stated purpose is to discuss permanent-status issues with an eye toward producing an agreement on a political horizon for ending the conflict. For many, such a political horizon has been long overdue; with it, they argue, both Israelis and Palestinians will know how the conflict ends and find it easier to confront those who oppose peace.

Many, including Rice, see Saudi, Israeli, Egyptian and Jordanian leaders as sharing a perception of Iran as a threat. With such common fears, the thinking goes, the leaders should be willing to accept the necessary hard compromises and end the Palestinian conflict (or show how it can be ended) so Iran can no longer exploit the conflict to build its following and put the region's moderates on the defensive.

The assessment of the common threat perception is correct. But basing policy only on this misses an important regional reality. Priorities differ on how best to respond to the Iranian threat. For the Saudis, weaning Hamas away from Iran and producing intra-Palestinian peace is more important than trying to forge peace between Palestinians and Israelis. For the Israelis, however, an intra-Palestinian peace that entails accommodating Hamas (and that does not require Hamas to change its hostile posture toward Israel) is hardly a basis for reaching out to Palestinians in a way that would satisfy the Saudis, Egyptians and Jordanians.

And one sure way to threaten intra-Palestinian peace is to push now for a political horizon that inevitably will mean Palestinian compromises on core issues such as refugees. Will Hamas accommodate giving up the Palestinian right of return? A political horizon that purports to outline the endgame will require such a concession, and Hamas is not going to accept it or a process likely to produce it.

Of course, the compromises won't be one-sided. But is Israel likely to contemplate excruciating concessions on Jerusalem or territory with a Palestinian government led in part by those who refuse to acknowledge its existence or renounce terrorism? My point is that the political options available for peacemaking between Israelis and Palestinians have been reduced. And Rice's efforts have to be guided by what is possible, not by what is most desirable.

In Middle Eastern terms, what is logical and possible is intra-Palestinian peace and Palestinian-Israeli calm. That would argue for a comprehensive cease-fire to be negotiated between Abbas and Olmert. A deal would require all Palestinian attacks against Israelis to stop and all smuggling of weapons into Gaza or the West Bank to end. In return, the Israelis would stop all incursions, targeted killings and arrests. As Palestinians demonstrate that they are fulfilling their responsibilities, checkpoints would be lifted and crossing points opened, making economic revitalization possible.

This agreement would differ from previous cease-fires in that it would be negotiated with clear understandings of what constitutes a violation and penalties for violations. Israel might be willing to accept such a deal because Hamas would have to enforce the cease-fire -- not merely observe it. Hamas's readiness to enforce it would mean for the first time that Hamas was acting to prevent "resistance," which would signal that its fundamental credo might be changed.

Hamas might be willing to accept such a cease-fire for two reasons: First, it needs a respite. Second, in an atmosphere where life is improving and conflict with Israel is deferred, Hamas is likely to believe its superior organization will allow it to supplant Fatah and dominate Palestinian society.

For his part, Abbas has long favored a comprehensive cease-fire, and he, too, might believe that Hamas would be transformed by having to fulfill responsibilities.

In any case, a comprehensive cease-fire could change the atmosphere between Israelis and Palestinians and lead to a negotiation designed to pursue the vision that Olmert originally campaigned on -- an extensive Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank. Only this withdrawal would not be unilateral and would depend on Palestinian performance on security obligations.

A comprehensive cease-fire won't be hammered out without intensive U.S. brokering. Even Rice's more ambitious desire for a political horizon need not be surrendered. But to accomplish it, she must get the Saudis, Egyptians and Jordanians to publicly embrace basic trade-offs on the core issues, even if Arab leaders must get out in front of Abbas and Olmert on stating their acceptance of the compromises. Both leaders are politically weak; Abbas needs Arab political cover if he is to accept historic concessions on refugees and security, while Olmert must show that the Arab world has adopted unprecedented compromises if he is to justify crossing historic thresholds on Jerusalem and borders. Absent that, Rice will need to change her horizon for what is possible in the Middle East.

Rival Groups Kept Apart In Beirut (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Feb. 14 — The military on Wednesday rolled out acres of razor wire and fashioned a no man's land to separate the hundreds of thousands of government supporters who poured into the center of this city from the hundreds of opposition supporters who have camped downtown since December.

The occasion was the second anniversary of the assassination of the former prime minister Rafik Hariri. Although people on both sides of the no man's land called for unity among all Lebanese, the day's events illustrated the deep divisions and tensions that keep this country on the edge of civil conflict.

"We are against sectarianism," a group of people chanted as they marched toward the memorial ceremony. "And God is with the Sunnis."

Lebanon is caught up in a dangerous political battle between the former prime minister's allies, who control the government, and their opponents, who want more power.

The conflict has deepened sectarian tensions in a country where power is divided among sects. In this fight, the Sunnis are primarily on the government side, Shiites are primarily in the opposition, and Christians are split.

The two competing sides regularly call for unity as a preamble to listing their non-negotiable demands. On Wednesday, the pattern held.

"We are here to say that we want to have dialogue with all Lebanese and we want national unity," Saad Hariri, the former prime minister's son and leader of the largest bloc in Parliament, said in a speech to the crowd. He also said the majority, known as the March 14 Coalition, would not back down on the creation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in Rafik Hariri's death and other political assassinations. Opposition leaders have insisted that the creation of the court be at least delayed.

The day was preceded by an increase in violence. On Tuesday, three people were killed when two minibuses were blown up. It was the first attack on ordinary citizens — not the politically outspoken — in two decades, and it raised fears of a slide into civil war.

By Wednesday morning, the attack had been absorbed into the collective experience, added to the list of bombings and killings and wars that have defined the years since Mr. Hariri was killed. People moved on, and waited for the next incident.

Buses, cars, minivans, mopeds and long lines of marchers began pouring into the center of the city early in the morning. It was in all corners a joyful procession with horns honking and banners waving.

The people snaked their way through intensified security, with the security forces frisking people and checking bags and cars. Armed security men lined the roofs surrounding the square where Mr. Hariri's grave has become a rallying site for the government.

The anniversary offered the government one day, at least, to take control of the city from the opposition, which has shut the center of town with an open-ended sit-in.

"We are the true Lebanese!" Hussein Hashem, 26, shouted as he thrust his finger toward the opposition supporters on the other side of the razor wire. "They are not Lebanese."

Najla Housheimi, 50, said she attended the rally to show defiance.

"Bombs don't scare us, we are ready to present our blood," Ms. Housheimi said as she waved the flag of Lebanon.

The heaviest security was dispatched to keep the crowds of government supporters out of the tent city that has become the center for the opposition's efforts to bring down the government. It was quiet in the tented area. The protesters had turned off their loudspeakers, which had been blaring nonstop since early December, and relinquished the moment to their adversaries.

"Of course they are not our enemies," said Ali Mahmud, 19, a Hezbollah supporter from the south of Lebanon as he sat in a plastic lawn chair beside a tent spiked into the blacktop. "What is common between us is Lebanon. We are all Lebanese."

Then, looking at the legions of heavily armed men separating the two groups, his friend Muhammad Ali, 25, said: "We did not divide the country. It is not us who are irresponsible. They divided the country."

The fight is intensified because it also involves regional players who see the outcome of the events here as important to their national interests. Syria and Iran are with the opposition. The United States, Sunni Arab governments and Europe are with the government.

The international tribunal has, for example, become a flashpoint even as all sides say, in theory, they support it. Syrian officials have been implicated in the preliminary investigation into Mr. Hariri's death, and their allies in Lebanon have worked to slow its establishment.

That reality led to more calls for unity on Wednesday, followed by denunciations certain not to foster unity with the opposition.

"Whoever fights against what is right will be knocked out," Samir Geagea, leader of the Lebanese Forces, a Christian party and member of the governing coalition, said in a speech. "The international tribunal will certainly be created."

U.S., Britain Fare Poorly In Children Report (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — The United States and Britain ranked as the worst places to be a child among 21 wealthy nations, according to a report by UNICEF released Wednesday. The Netherlands was the best, it said, followed by Sweden and Denmark.

UNICEF's Innocenti Research Centre in Italy ranked the countries in material well-being, health, education, relationships, behaviors and risks, and young people's sense of happiness.

The finding that the children in the richest countries are not necessarily the best-off surprised many, said Marta Santos Pais, the study director. The Czech Republic, for example, ranked above countries with a higher per capita income, such as Austria, France, U.S. and Britain, in part because of a more equal distribution of wealth and higher relative investment in education and public health.

Some of the wealthier countries' lower rankings were a result of less spending on social programs and "dog eat dog" competition in jobs that led to adults spending less time with their children and heightened alienation among peers, said one of the report's authors, Jonathan Bradshaw, at a televised news conference in London.

"The findings that we got today are a consequence of long-term underinvestment in children," said Bradshaw, who is a professor of social policy at York University in England.

The highest ranking for the United States was for education, where it placed 12th. But the U.S. and U.K. landed in the lowest third for five of the six categories measured.

The United States was at the bottom in health and safety, mostly because of its high rates of child mortality and accidental deaths. It was next to last in family and peer relationships and risk-taking behavior. The U.S. has the highest proportion of children living in single-family homes, which the study defined as an indicator for increased risk of poverty and poor health, though it "may seem unfair and insensitive," it said. The U.S. was close to the bottom of the scale for children who eat and talk frequently with their families.

Britain had the highest rate of children involved in activities that endangered their welfare: 31 percent of those studied said they had been drunk at least twice by the age of 15, and 38 percent had had sexual intercourse by that age. Canada had the highest rate of children who had smoked marijuana by age 15 -- 40.4 percent. Japan ranked the worst on "subjective well being," with 30 percent of children agreeing with the statement, "I am lonely."

Children in the Netherlands, Spain and Greece said they were the happiest, and those in Spain, Portugal and the Netherlands spent the most time with their families and friends.

Because of a lack of internationally comparable data, the study did not address children's exposure to domestic violence, both as victims and as witnesses, and children's mental and emotional health.

The report acknowledges that some assessment scales have "weak spots."

The study, for example, measured relative affluence by asking if a family owned a vehicle, a computer, if children had their own bedroom and how often the family traveled on holiday. Some answers might depend on the quality of public transportation and real estate prices, making the average child in New York's affluent areas seem equal to one in a less developed country because of the constraints of city living.

The authors acknowledge the study is "a work in progress in need of improved definitions and better data." But they say it is a first step in providing benchmarks for comparing countries and highlighting poor performance in otherwise rich nations.

"All countries have weaknesses to be addressed," Santos Pais said.

U.S. Envoy Urges India To Open Up (WSJ)

By P.r. Venkat

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

NEW DELHI -- The U.S. is willing to cut farm subsidies further if other countries reciprocate by improving access to their markets and reducing tariffs, the U.S. commerce secretary said.

"We would be willing to take the lead on subsidies, but we can't do it unilaterally," Carlos Gutierrez said in an interview yesterday.

He said India holds the key to the successful conclusion of the long-running World Trade Organization talks under the Doha round of negotiations. Mr. Gutierrez is on a two-day visit to India aimed at boosting bilateral trade. The U.S. is India's largest trading partner. Last year, two-way trade hit $32 billion, Mr. Gutierrez said.

He said the U.S. would like to see "movement" in terms of India cutting tariffs on agricultural products and providing greater market access for industrial goods from other countries. "India is a leader among developing nations, and developing nations look to India to see how India makes its decisions" on WTO issues, he said.

Asked about the U.S. farm bill, which many see as crucial for WTO negotiations, Mr. Gutierrez said: "The farm bill is a domestic matter; the WTO talks are separate from the farm bill."

Started in 2001, the Doha round is meant to help poor countries gain access to the developed world's markets by cutting subsidies and tariffs in rich markets -- especially in agriculture. In return, wealthy nations would win access to important markets for services such as banking and insurance. Talks collapsed in July after hitting numerous roadblocks.

At the World Economic Forum meetings in Davos last month, representatives of many countries said they wanted negotiations to resume.

The U.S. farm bill, still to be approved by Congress, would cut farm spending by $18 billion, to $87 billion, over the next five years. Many countries have said the cut isn't steep enough.

The European Union has said it is prepared to make deeper cuts to its own subsidies if others, including the U.S., also make large cuts.

"We believe that getting an agreement as soon as possible is important," Mr. Gutierrez said. "However, the real important objective is to get a good agreement."

Mr. Gutierrez said India needs to open its market further to attract investment and maintain the pace of economic growth.

"Every country in the world is competing for capital, and capital will go to those markets that welcome investment," he said.

U.S. companies want India to liberalize the retail, insurance and pension sectors, thus opening up opportunities for foreign firms.

Professionals Exit Venezuela (WSJ)

By Peter Millard

Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Oil-rich Venezuela has experienced the kind of economic boom in recent years that should be flush with job opportunities. But an increasing number of professionals, many of them from the oil industry, are looking abroad for work, driven away by President Hugo Chávez's effort to extend state control over the economy, and by inflation verging on 20%.

Since his re-election in December, Mr. Chávez has pursued an agenda of "21st Century Socialism," painting a future of "communal cities" and state-run cooperatives dedicated to production, not profit.

"Chavez's electoral triumph and the radicalized discourse has increased the desire to emigrate," said Luis Vicente Leon, the head of Datanalisis, a Caracas polling firm.

Not everyone is dissatisfied. Mr. Chávez, who first took office in 1999, has gained a broad base of popular support among Venezuela's poor, largely by spending billions of dollars on social programs. And a newly rich class of Venezuelans with close connections to the government is likely to stick around as long as they can continue to profit from Mr. Chávez's rise.

Still, at the U.S. Embassy call center for visas in Caracas, the lines have been jammed since Mr. Chávez announced in early January the nationalization of the electricity industry and Venezuela's largest telecommunications firm. "It doubled practically overnight," said a U.S. diplomat.

The number of Venezuelans receiving U.S. legal permanent residence more than doubled from 2000 to 2005, when 10,870 got their green cards. In that period the overall number of green cards increased by a third. During that period the number of Venezuelan-born U.S. residents increased 42%, to 151,743, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The oil industry appears to be taking notice of the available talent. Qatar Petroleum has run ads in local papers this year, offering tax-free salaries for geologists, reservoir engineers and geophysicists.

Canadian immigration law firm Benchetrit & Associates recently held four days of seminars in Caracas on living and working in Canada. "A plan for your life," read an advertisement for the seminars.

A Canadian embassy spokesman said oil companies are the main recruiters on the ground in Caracas. Canada is developing extra-heavy oil reserves that are comparable to those in Venezuela's Orinoco river basin, providing a ready job market for current and former staffers at Venezuela's state oil company, Petroleos de Venezuela SA, or PdVSA. The number of work visas Canada granted Venezuelans more than doubled last year, to 340.

Any opposition-minded oil workers still left at PdVSA face a difficult environment. During the presidential campaign last year, PdVSA President Rafael Ramirez told company executives to join Mr. Chávez's political movement or hit the road. In 2003, Mr. Chávez sacked around 20,000 PdVSA staffers -- about half the company's work force -- for walking off the job, calling them "terrorists." A majority of them were the managers, accountants and field engineers who turned the state oil venture into a world-class oil company during a period of robust expansion in the 1990s.

Many found work elsewhere, including in Mexico, Canada and Saudi Arabia, at a time of high demand for experienced oil workers.

The lost expertise has taken a toll on PdVSA, the country's largest single employer. Its share of the global market for crude oil supply is shrinking, and accidents and outages are on the rise. Analysts say the cost to PdVSA of producing a barrel of oil has nearly doubled in the past five years to more than $4.50.

White-collar executives at Electricidad de Caracas, which provides 10% of the country's power, and CANTV, the leading telephone company, also are bracing for a politicized workplace after Mr. Chávez finishes nationalizing the two firms by the end of March. Employees there say many staffers are seeking early retirement and expect management to discourage political opposition to Mr. Chávez. In January, Mr. Chávez floated the idea of capping salaries for state employees, giving the most valuable technicians and managers at these firms another reason to move on.

This isn't the first time Venezuelan professionals have rushed for the exits. A multitude of professionals fled the country in 2003 after a nationwide general strike failed to remove Mr. Chávez from office.

According to Datanalisis, the number of Venezuelans who said they were interested in emigrating peaked at around 44% during the 2002-2003 political crisis, which saw the country run out of gasoline for two months. Interest in emigration started declining as the economy rebounded, but Datanalisis expects another spike this year.

Russians To Vote, But Some Parties Lose In Advance (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

ST. PETERSBURG, Russia — Two candidates in local elections here in March, a soccer star and figure skating champion, have no known intention of giving up sports for legislative politics. If they win, as they almost certainly will, their Kremlin-friendly parties, not the voters, will choose the candidates to fill their seats.

An opposition party was kicked off the ballot for forging signatures but given little chance to prove otherwise. Government-controlled television has effectively barred parties except those loyal to President Vladimir V. Putin from the airwaves.

The elections here on March 11, like those in 13 other regions, will preview coming national elections in which voters' choices will be severely limited at best. "Democracy?" asked Vladimir I. Fyodorov, a leader of the Communist Party here, which faces an uphill task of winning any seats to the city's 50-member legislature. "I would not call the process under way in our country democracy."

At the Kremlin's urging, Putin foes and independent analysts say, Parliament has raised the threshold for parties to win seats, eliminated minimum turnout requirements, abolished district elections in favor of party lists, and eliminated the option of voting "against all." A new law on extremism would ban a candidate from criticizing his or her opponent, or anyone actually in office.

The Kremlin has also made it more difficult for political parties to form and register. According to officials, the Justice Ministry refused to qualify 15 of the 32 that applied last year, and other, largely inactive, parties faded into history.

That measure, like most of the others, has an ostensibly reasonable and democratic purpose: to simplify and clarify the rules of elective politics. To critics, though, the Kremlin has simply assured the smooth re-election of pro-presidential parties.

"It would be like if California had an election and only five Republican Parties could run," said Maksim L. Reznik, head of the St. Petersburg branch of Yabloko, a liberal party.

The city election commission disqualified it after declaring that a sample of the 40,000 signatures on the party's voter registration application contained forgeries. The party was given two days to disprove a handwriting expert's conclusions by producing signed affidavits and copies of passports for hundreds of would-be voters.

By early February, with the elections barely a month away, Yabloko had also been barred from the ballot in two other regions, Orel in west central Russia and Leningrad, which surrounds St. Petersburg, in what party officials called an attempt by the Kremlin to weaken it further.

Another liberal party, the Union of Right Forces, was knocked off the ballot in Vologda, Pskov and Samara. The Communist Party faced challenges in several regions, including Tyumen and Dagestan, but ultimately qualified after protests.

In all, parties were denied registration in 17 instances. The only three parties that faced no problems were United Russia, Just Russia and the Liberal Democratic Party, all pro-presidential.

In Russia, as elsewhere, all politics is local. Yabloko's leaders argue that their banishment here in St. Petersburg resulted from their opposition to the city's governor, Valentina I. Matviyenko, a devoted supporter of Mr. Putin.

Yabloko's three members in the city legislature were the only ones who voted against Mr. Putin's reappointment of her as governor in December. They have also led a public challenge to plans by Ms. Matviyenko and Gazprom, the energy giant, to build a skyscraper on the banks of the Neva River.

Party officials and political analysts, though, have detected a national trend in the pressure on opposition parties. "They would like to reduce uncertainty as much as possible," said Vladimir Y. Gelman, a political scientist at the European University at St. Petersburg.

The goal, he and others said, is to bolster United Russia, which now controls the lower house of Parliament and is called "the party of power," by forcing out smaller parties like Yabloko. At the same time, the Kremlin hopes to create a loyal counterweight in Just Russia, a party created by the merger of three smaller parties and led by a staunch Putin supporter, Sergei M. Mironov.

"Just Russia is the only real opposition currently," Mr. Mironov said recently, campaigning in the icy cold at a small park here, where he unveiled a new merry-go-round. "The others are just playthings."

Oleg A. Nilov, the party's regional chairman, acknowledged that political debate had withered in Russia since the emergence of United Russia. Just Russia, he said, will become a populist challenger, taking the side of the poor, the pensioners and the workers who have shared far less of Russia's new energy-fueled boom than most. That stance, though, extends only to the local legislature and the lower house of Parliament, the State Duma.

"We are saying that on the level of the State Duma there should be real competition," he said in an interview in the party's headquarters, which displays large portraits of Mr. Putin. "The executive power exists on the next level."

On that level, he added, "there should be unity."

Vadim A. Tulpanov, the incumbent chairman of St. Petersburg's legislature, dismissed criticism of Yabloko's registration troubles, calling them self-inflicted. He said the election simply reflected the natural evolution of Russia's young democracy, with the old parties like Yabloko and the Communists losing their popular appeal.

"Gradually in Russia, as I understand it, a two-party system is being created, like in America," he said.

For now, the two main parties have distinct advantages: access to the airwaves, which are government controlled, and to campaign financing. Private donations to parties became risky after the prosecution of Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, the former chairman of Yukos Oil, after he openly supported political parties in the Duma.

A result of the uneven resources is visible on the streets here: posters and billboards of United Russia and Just Russia are ubiquitous, the others largely absent. Another advantage of incumbency has been the city's refusal to allow Yabloko and other parties to hold protests or other rallies.

Roman S. Mogilevsky, a sociologist and pollster with the independent Agency for Social Information, said he found optimism in Russia's development. "I don't think there are many who are against elections," he said, as though the question of holding them at all remained in doubt. "Even in the Soviet Union there were elections. The level of freedom, though, depends on whom you ask."

Opposition Candidate Shot

MAKHACHKALA, Russia, Feb. 14 (Agence France-Presse) — A local legislative candidate was shot in the head Wednesday in the southern Russian region of Dagestan less than an hour after making a campaign speech on television here, a police spokeswoman said.

Eduard Khidirov, the head of the Dagestani branch of the nationalist party Patriots of Russia, was in serious condition, the spokeswoman said.

U.N. Commander In Kosovo Resigns After Demonstrators' Deaths (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

LJUBLJANA, Slovenia, Feb. 14 — The commander of the United Nations police in Kosovo resigned Wednesday, days after violent clashes between the police and demonstrators left two protesters dead and another critically injured.

The commander, Stephen Curtis, a former British police officer, resigned under pressure from the mission's most senior official, Joachim Rücker.

On Tuesday, autopsy reports showed that the two protesters, both men, had been killed by rubber-coated bullets. Television pictures of the demonstration on Saturday in the center of Pristina, the regional capital, showed members of a

Romanian riot squad attached to the United Nations firing rubber bullets into the crowd. A third man remains in critical condition in a military hospital, United Nations officials said.

Mr. Rücker said the commissioner's resignation "would follow the principle of political accountability." He also appointed an international prosecutor to lead the investigation into the men's deaths.

The United Nations mission has come under substantial pressure to accept responsibility for the handling of the demonstration, which was held in protest of terms set out in a United Nations plan for Kosovo. In the plan, Kosovo is granted de facto statehood — an army, a constitution and a flag — but it would still be protected by NATO and overseen by the international community for the indefinite future.

Agim Ceku, prime minister of Kosovo's government, which is dominated by ethnic Albanians, has described the police measures as "excessive," and Interior Minister Fatmir Rexhepi resigned Monday, saying he felt morally responsible for the men's deaths, although the police officers implicated in the shooting were not under his command.

The shootings left many people in Kosovo shocked, and took place at a critical juncture.

The United Nations is planning to withdraw from the region by the end of summer and grant the province substantial self-rule, subject to approval by the Security Council. The mission first took over administration of the province in June 1999, after a 78-day NATO-led bombing campaign drove out the Serbian-dominated security forces who were accused of widespread atrocities against the ethnic Albanian population that forms the majority of Kosovo.

The plan benefits the Albanian majority, but a small number of Albanians complain that it gives too many rights to the Serb minority, and that the international authorities are trying to retain a hold over the province.

In a show of political unity, all main Serbian parties on Wednesday rejected the United Nations proposal, [a news agency] reported. In its first act since inconclusive elections on Jan. 21, Serbia's new Parliament overwhelmingly endorsed a resolution rejecting key aspects of the plan.

Vetevendosja, the group behind the demonstration on Saturday, has called for further protests next Monday.

Washington

MY friend was visibly shaken. He had just learned that he had lost one of his clients to Chinese competitors. "It's amazing," he told me. "The Chinese have completely priced us out of the market. We can't compete with what they're able to offer."

There's nothing surprising about that, of course; manufacturing jobs are lost to China every day. But my friend is not in manufacturing. He works in foreign aid.

His story is about Nigeria's trains. The Nigerian government operates three railways, which are notoriously corrupt and inefficient. They are also falling apart. The World Bank — where my friend works — proposed a project based on the commonsense observation that there was no point in lending the Nigerians money without also tackling the corruption that had crippled the railways. After months of negotiation, the bank and Nigeria's government agreed on a $5 million project that would allow private companies to come in and help clean up the railways.

But just as the deal was about to be signed, the Chinese government offered Nigeria $9 billion to rebuild the entire rail network — no bids, no conditions and no need to reform. That was when my friend packed his suitcase and went to the airport.

It is not an isolated case. In recent years, wealthy nondemocratic regimes have begun to undermine development policy through their own activist aid programs. Call it rogue aid. It is development assistance that is nondemocratic in origin and nontransparent in practice, and its effect is typically to stifle real progress while hurting ordinary citizens.

China is actively backing such deals throughout Africa; its financing of roads, electrical plants, ports and the like boomed from $700 million in 2003 to nearly $3 billion for each of the past two years. Indeed, it is a worldwide strategy. Beijing has agreed to expand Indonesia's electrical grid in a matter of months. Too bad the deal calls for building several plants that use a highly polluting, coal-based Chinese technology. No international agency would have signed off on such an environmentally unfriendly deal.

In the Philippines, the Asian Development Bank, which lends money at low interest rates to poor countries, had agreed to finance Manila's new aqueduct. It, too, was suddenly told that its money was no longer needed. China was offering cheaper rates, faster approval and fewer questions.

What's behind this sudden Chinese drive to do good around the world? The three short answers are money, international politics and access to raw materials. China's central bank has the world's largest foreign exchange reserves, totaling $1.06 trillion. Beijing is increasingly leveraging this cash to ensure its access to raw materials and to advance China's growing global influence. What better than a generous foreign-aid program to ensure the good will of a petro-power like Nigeria or a natural-resource-rich neighbor like Indonesia?

China is not the first country to make aid a tool in advancing its interests abroad. The Soviet Union and the United States spent decades giving development aid to dictators in exchange for their allegiance. Even today, American largess to Egypt and Pakistan is rooted in geopolitical calculation.

But beginning in the 1990s, foreign aid had begun to slowly improve. Scrutiny by the news media shamed many developed countries into curbing their bad practices. Today, the projects of organizations like the World Bank are meticulously inspected by watchdog groups. Although the system is far from perfect, it is certainly more transparent than it was when foreign aid routinely helped ruthless dictators stay in power.

Nor is China the only regime offering rogue aid. President Hugo Chávez has not been shy in using his nation's oil money to recruit allies abroad. Indeed, Venezuela's ambassador to Nicaragua, explaining his country's large aid packages in the region, bluntly announced, "We want to infect Latin America with our model."

Mr. Chávez's financial aid to Cuba far exceeds what the island used to get from Leonid Brezhnev during the heyday of Soviet communism, and it has dashed hopes for Cuba's opening as a result of Fidel Castro's demise and the island's bankruptcy. Because of Mr. Chávez's artificial lifeline, Cubans will be forced to wait even longer for the indispensable reforms that will bring their society opportunities for true prosperity and freedom.

Iranian aid to Hamas in Palestine and Hezbollah in Lebanon may have increased Iran's influence in the region, but it is damaging to the people in those countries for the same reason that Venezuelan aid hurts Cubans. The same can be said of Saudi Arabia's sponsorship, in countries like Pakistan, of religious schools that fail to equip students with the skills they need to get jobs.

One could argue that students are surely better off going to any school than being in the streets. But why should these be the only options? Why can't the Saudis finance education, the Chinese pay for railroads and electric grids, and the Venezuelans help Cuba's economy without also hurting poor Pakistanis, Nigerians and Cubans? Because the goal of these donors is not to help other countries develop. Rather, they seek to further their own national interests, advance an ideological agenda or even line their own pockets. Rogue aid providers couldn't care less about the long-term well-being of the population of the countries they aid.

States like China, Iran, Saudi Arabia and Venezuela have the cash and the will to reshape the world into a place very unlike the one where we want to live. By pushing their alternative development model, such states effectively price responsible aid programs out of the market exactly where they are needed most. In place of those programs, rogue donors offer to underwrite a world that is more corrupt, chaotic and authoritarian. That sort of aid is in no one's interest, except the rogues.

Africa's Last Best Chance (WSJ)

By Richard Holbrooke And Stuart Eizenstat

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

The long-stalled Doha round of trade talks recently had, in the words of WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy, a jolt of "new energy" after the recent meeting of key trade ministers in Davos. What is not clearly understood is that if a successful agreement is reached, it will be especially good news for Africa.

Failure, conversely, would have tragic consequences for the continent. It would lead the United States and the European Union to negotiate more bilateral free-trade agreements with key countries, but not with sub-Saharan Africa and other poor countries, which offer few attractive markets for developed countries' manufactured goods and services. Africa, which has seen its share of world trade shrink in recent years, would fall even further behind.

Developing countries felt that previous multilateral trade negotiations like the Kennedy round, the Tokyo round and the Uruguay round primarily benefited the highly developed nations. While they undertook costly obligations to protect developed countries' intellectual property and impose sanitary and phytosanitary standards, the developed countries did not significantly open their markets to the labor-intensive manufactured goods and agricultural products of developing countries.

For the Doha round launched in 2001, however, there is a development agenda. At its heart is agriculture -- a politically sensitive sector in the EU and the U.S. but the largest employer in low-income countries, accounting for about 60% of their labor force and 25% of their GDP. The World Bank estimates that these agricultural products face what former U.S. Trade Representative Robert Portman observed is a practically insurmountable global average tariff rate of 62%, and that 93% of the benefits from a successful Doha round would come from improved market access for developing nations' agricultural products.

Farmers represent less than 5% of the labor force in industrial countries, but they have very substantial political power in the U.S., EU and Japan. These political forces, especially in the EU, led to the eventual derailment of the Doha round last summer. But as the Doha talks take on new life, Congress and the Bush administration need to stay true to the commitments of the Doha Development Agenda, especially in agriculture.

Two weeks ago the administration proposed ending subsidies for 80,000 wealthy farmers, substituting trade-distorting subsidies with cash payments to farmers, and trimming traditional agriculture programs by $4.5 billion over the next decade. These proposals, if approved, would directly benefit some of the poorest people on earth, save lives and ultimately reduce American foreign aid, while helping Susan Schwab, the U.S trade representative, put wind in the sails of the ministers' pledge in Davos to restart serious talks.

The promise for developing countries, and particularly the poorest African nations, is huge. In particular, Africa stands to gain significantly if sensitive product exclusions do not disproportionately target key African exports. Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner, pledged recently that Europe will significantly improve its previous tariff reduction offer; he needs to make good on that promise. But even the current U.S. and EU proposals on the table far surpass those offered in previous multilateral trade rounds and offer real gains for developing countries:

• WTO members have agreed to provide duty-free/quota-free market access to the least developed countries for at least 97% of their products.

• An agreement has been reached to end the direct EU and U.S. export subsidies by 2013 that have squeezed out the products of farmers in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

• Assistance will be given to help poor countries streamline their customs procedures to help with the red tape and corruption that historically impeded engagement in significant international trade.

Developing nations also must make serious commitments to complete the Doha round. A growing percentage of trade is between developing nations, with more than 70% of the duties paid by developing countries to other developing countries. This makes no sense.

The World Bank has found a significant increase in per capita income of developing countries that lower their own trade barriers, and concluded that totally eliminating global trade barriers could lift 300 to 500 million of the world's poor out of poverty -- growing their economies by $259 billion by 2015. Opening their trade arteries to manufactured goods and services is also important. It will help developing nations trade with each other, which is growing 50% faster than world trade overall, but where levels of protection on goods are four times higher than levels of protection in rich countries. Intraregional trade in Africa was only 5.3% of GDP in 2002, in part due to self-destructive trade barriers between African countries.

As trade ministers make an effort to reach a Doha deal, they should recognize that it is the poorest nations, particularly those in Africa, that would be the biggest losers if Doha collapses. We hope this will be understood by everyone, on a bipartisan basis, as this crucial negotiation heads into its final phase. For Africa, this may be the last best chance.

'Competitive Cooperation' (WSJ)

By Edward C. Prescott

Of all the thankless jobs that economists set for themselves when it comes to educating people about economics, the notion that society is better off if some industries are allowed to wither, their workers lose their jobs, and investors lose their capital -- all in the name of the greater glory of globalization -- surely ranks near the top. This is counterintuitive to many people (politicians among them), because they view it the government's economic responsibility to protect U.S. industry, employment and wealth against the forces of foreign competition. If the government has any economic role at all, surely this must be it.

Actually, no. Government has a higher calling in this country (and others like the United States), which is to provide the opportunity for people to seek their livelihood on their own terms, in open international markets, with as little interference from government as possible. That doesn't mean we shouldn't provide short-term social insurance policies to aid those displaced by foreign competition, but the purpose of that aid should be to prepare workers, not protect them.

Also, just because a country is open to international competition doesn't mean that it won't meddle in international markets. Complexities (and hypocrisies) abound when countries establish international trade agreements. In this regard, the U.S. and its free-trade friends are deserving of no small amount of shame. But broadly speaking -- and these broad operating principles matter -- those countries that open their borders to international competition are those countries with the highest per capita income.

This is more than mere correlation. Competitive openness is the key to bringing developing nations up to the standard of living enjoyed by citizens of wealthier countries. I am not speaking here of those countries faced with extreme poverty amid the ills of war, civil unrest, disease and famine. Those are countries with big problems and special needs, beyond the bounds of much economic theory. But I am talking about the majority of the world's population, who reside in countries with the opportunity for growth but who are stifled by protectionist policies and anti-competitive institutions.

Let's review some historical facts. With the signing of the Treaty of Rome in 1957, France, Italy, Belgium, West Germany, Luxembourg and the Netherlands formed what would eventually become the European Union. For six decades prior to the treaty, those countries were about 55% as productive as the U.S. But over the following 25 years, those countries essentially caught up to the U.S. in terms of productivity.

When that historic economic treaty was signed, three countries were roughly on par with those original six -- Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom. However, a funny thing happened in subsequent years -- those three countries started falling behind their former peers. So in 1973 they joined the original group and their economic fortunes improved. It took time, but the U.K. now is as productive as Germany.

The story continues in the 1980s, when Spain, Portugal and Greece joined the club. Spain has essentially caught up with the pack, and Portugal and Greece have narrowed the gap. By 1995, Austria, Sweden and Finland joined and have shown improvement relative to the group, after having fallen behind prior to signing. How about the 10 countries that joined in 2004? It's still early, but signs of positive movement are already apparent.

How to explain this phenomenon? The answer lies predominantly with competition -- aided by an attendant drop in transportation costs -- that industries had to face from their new member states. With regard to Europe, it is useful to consider the example of the U.S., which, from its early days, created wealth from the healthy competition among businesses and industries in its member states. This competitive cooperation was not a foregone conclusion during this country's formation, but its establishment has left an institutional legacy that has guaranteed the increasing standards of living that we all now enjoy.

This same competitive cooperation has been firing the economic engine of Europe for 50 years, when those first six countries took the historic step of uniting their economic fortunes. And there is other evidence throughout the world for the benefit of international openness. Like the U.S., Australia is also a tale of competition among member states; in addition, Australia had to reform once the U.K. joined the EU. The five wealthy countries of Eastern Asia -- Taiwan, Singapore, Japan, South Korea and Hong Kong -- were not so well off just a few decades ago, but their subsequent commitment to export markets and international competition put them on an upward trajectory that has improved the lives of millions of people.

And what of Latin America? Unfortunately, the region provides a case study in the perils of protectionism. Recent research by my Minneapolis Fed colleagues, Lee Ohanian and Jim Schmitz, and two co-authors, shows that from 1950 to 2001, per capita GDP for Europe increased 68% relative to the U.S.; Asia increased by 244%, while Latin America decreased by 21%. This is all the more striking when we realize that Latin America's per capita GDP actually exceeded Asia's by 75% in 1950.

The authors provide much evidence to support their claim that competitive barriers are to blame for Latin America's retarded growth. But there is hope. Microlevel examples of industries that have opened to foreign competition -- the Chilean copper industry and Brazilian iron ore industry, for example -- reveal that Latin American producers can match the high productivity levels of their Western counterparts.

Of course, many other factors account for marginal differences in productivity and wealth among countries that are already wealthy -- tax rates being key among those factors -- but they are comparative "frosting on the cake," and the cake in this case is the institutional commitment to international competition. The day when Latin American countries have joined the ranks of wealthy countries and are competing on the basis of marginal tax rates will be a happy day, indeed.

Protectionism is seductive, but countries that succumb to its allure will soon have their economic hearts broken. Conversely, countries that commit to competitive borders will ensure a brighter economic future for their citizens. This lesson should not be lost on the U.S., the paragon of competitive growth, where politicians and policy makers are contemplating whether to construct more protective barriers. It is openness that gives people the opportunity to use their entrepreneurial talents to create social surplus, rather than using those talents to protect what they already have (or to protect rents, as economists like to say). Social surplus begets a rising standard of living, which begets growth, which begets social surplus, and so on. Rent protection stops growth cold and keeps people poor.

People in all countries are motivated to improve their condition, and all countries have their share of talented risk-takers, but without the promise that a competitive system brings, that motivation and those talents will only lie dormant. The 50th anniversary of the Treaty of Rome is a good time to reflect on the benefits that competitive cooperation can bring to people. Here's hoping that more citizens of the world will reap similar benefits over the next 50 years and beyond.

Freedom And Labor (WSJ)

Europe just got its best jobless report in a very long time. The bad news: In a decade when record numbers of people found work in the rich world, Europe's best is an unemployment rate of 7.5%, significantly higher than America's 4.6% or that of any other developed economy.

The Old World offers a useful model of what not to do. Its largest economies -- Germany, France and Italy -- have shunned a policy mix that has enabled English-speaking and Nordic countries to reduce their jobless rolls. In its annual "Going for Growth" report released Tuesday, the OECD argues that deregulated labor and other markets are the best route to full employment. That's hardly man-bites-dog news, but the study draws on a decade's worth of empirical data to make the case.

Before a French politician gets upset, let's be clear that no one's calling for an end to the welfare state. The OECD study shows that a social safety net can coexist with strong growth and low unemployment, notwithstanding other social and economic costs. But the kind of safety net matters.

Look at the welfare-besotted Nordics, in particular Denmark, which has recently found tough love. Its "flexisecurity" system combines generous jobless benefits, strong incentives to get new work fast and lenient hiring and firing rules. This encourages Danish employers to create jobs and pushes beneficiaries back into the work pool. The result: Unemployment fell to 4.8% in 2005 from 8% in 1994 (see nearby chart).

Rigid job protection laws have the perverse effect of keeping people out of work. Germany and France are generous with benefits, lax about getting the unemployed off the dole and inflexible on hiring and firing. Such laws discourage companies from hiring and they discriminate against the jobless by raising the bar to enter the workforce; women and minorities are disproportionately hit.

In France, the overall jobless rate is a still high 8.5% today, down from 12.3% in 1994. But the youth jobless rate is three times higher. Even after its poor minority young rioted in late 2005, France did nothing to make it easier for these kids to get jobs. Unemployment in Germany rose to 10.3% in 2005, from 8.4% in 1994. After Berlin tightened eligibility rules for unemployment insurance on the margins, without touching hiring and firing rules, the rate has since gone down -- marginally -- to 9.5%. That's still a long way from Denmark or the U.S.

As the OECD study shows, countries with low jobless rates not only have the most open labor markets but also the freest product markets. These are, in descending order, the U.S., Britain, Australia, Canada, New Zealand and Denmark. Except for the U.S., all these countries abandoned statist policies and opened up their economies in the past decade or two. The result: more growth and jobs. By the way, half the one-percentage-point decrease in euro-zone unemployment in the past decade comes from Spain, where market reforms got the jobless rate down to 8.5% today from 24% in 1994.

The OECD report also points out the often-overlooked benefits of deregulation to job creation. Freer competition in product and service markets reduces prices. That in turn relaxes wage demands and lets companies hire more workers. Financial deregulation, for example, tends to bring down interest rates, enabling companies to expand. In this virtuous circle, it's then theoretically easier to fix bad labor laws in a growing economy.

New governments in Italy and Germany and a soon-to-be new president in France have a chance to catch up with other developed economies on getting their citizens into jobs. The recipe isn't complicated: Reduce taxes to reduce wage costs, tighten rules on government benefits, loosen up employment protection laws. Come to think of it, the new majority in the U.S. Congress could stand to read the OECD report, too.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bad Guys Of The Week: Hezbollah's Hamadei, Islamic Jihad's Shallah (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, February 15, 2007

Add two more Middle Eastern terrorists to the $5 million club. The State Department this week put Mohammed Ali Hamadei, an alleged leader of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia, and Ramadan Abdullah Mohammad Shallah, a founder of Palestinian Islamic Jihad, in its Rewards for Justice program.

Although both men have figured on U.S. wanted lists for years, they now join 32 other terrorist fugitives in the rewards program, which typically offers up to $5 million for tips leading to arrests.

Hamadei has been on the FBI's wanted list since his 1985 indictment for the infamous hijacking of TWA Flight 847, a 17-day ordeal during which terrorists brutalized passengers and murdered U.S. Navy diver Robert Stethem. Nabbed by German authorities in 1987, he was given a life sentence and tossed into prison. But in December 2005, in what the Counterterrorism Blog's Andrew Cochran calls "a unique act of cowardice and weakness," German officials paroled him–despite U.S. protests–and he quickly fled to Lebanon.

The other fellow, Shallah, has served since 1985 as secretary general of Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a small but hyperviolent offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood. Based in Damascus, Syria, the group has claimed responsibility for scores of terrorist attacks against Israel since 2000, killing U.S. citizens along with Israelis. Shallah's leadership has earned him a place on the U.S. terrorist blacklist since 1995.

Shallah is no street thug: He has a Ph.D. in banking and economics from a British university and has worked as a professor in several countries. He's wanted by the FBI for running Islamic Jihad "through a pattern of racketeering activities such as bombings, murders, extortions, and money laundering."

E.U. Report Faults 16 Nations In Probe Of Secret CIA Flights (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 14 -- The European Parliament on Wednesday approved a report admonishing 15 European countries and Turkey for helping the CIA transport terrorism suspects held in secret or for failing to cooperate in the parliament's investigation of the practice.

The legislative body for the European Union's 27 countries said many member states have been "turning a blind eye" to the CIA-operated flights carrying prisoners who were subjected to "incommunicado detention and torture" during interrogations, violating E.U. human rights standards.

"We have opened up a closed door and there is even more behind this," said parliament member Giovanni Claudio Fava, an Italian Socialist who drafted the report. It was approved by a 382 to 256 vote, with 74 abstentions.

The parliament criticized the CIA renditions -- an extralegal tactic by which alleged terrorists have been abducted and interrogated at secret sites overseas -- "as an illegal instrument used by the USA in the fight against terrorism" and condemned the "acceptance and concealing of the practices by the secret services and governmental authorities of certain European countries."

The parliament deleted some of the toughest sections of the report, however, including recommendations for sanctions against some countries for human rights violations. It softened criticisms of some governments, including those of Britain, Germany and Spain, after intense lobbying from those states.

Parliament member Jas Gawronski of Italy criticized the final report as "a blanket condemnation of the secret services" and said it was "predicated on the assumption that there is one chief guilty party and that is the USA."

President Bush acknowledged last September that the CIA used secret prisons to interrogate some terrorism suspects overseas. He did not say where the prisons were located.

A parliamentary committee spent a year investigating the allegations and interviewed more than 200 witnesses, including E.U., NATO and U.S. State Department officials as well as individuals who alleged they had been kidnapped by CIA agents in Europe and held in secret U.S. prisons.

The report criticized the E.U. foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, for "omissions" in his testimony before the parliamentary panel.

The report, which repeated basic findings made in a draft released last year, admonished 11 countries for having a role in CIA flights: Germany, Sweden, Spain, Ireland, Greece, Cyprus, Denmark, Turkey, Macedonia, Bosnia and Romania. The report also cited Britain, Austria, Italy, Poland and Portugal as uncooperative in the probe.

The report said its investigators had received no information to "contradict any of the allegations" that the CIA ran a secret prison in Romania and said the parliament could not "acknowledge or deny" that any of the secret facilities had been set up in Poland. Those two countries have denied hosting CIA prisons.

Separately, the Swiss government on Wednesday authorized a criminal investigation into a February 2003 CIA flight that reportedly carried Egyptian cleric Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar, from Italy, where he was allegedly kidnapped, to Ramstein Air Base in Germany, crossing Swiss airspace. Nasr was then taken to Cairo.

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2007

(AP) - McLEAN, Virginia-A former university professor who pleaded guilty last year to supporting a Palestinian terror group was transferred to a medical prison Wednesday as he entered the fourth week of a hunger strike.

Sami al-Arian, 49, began the hunger strike Jan. 22 to protest efforts to force him to testify in front of a grand jury investigating a group of Muslim charities in Virginia. He said a plea bargain with U.S. prosecutors last year frees him from any obligation to cooperate with the government.

Nikki Credic, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Marshals Service, said prison officials have been monitoring his health daily.

Prosecutors obtained a court order late last week approving the transfer, al-Arian's lawyer said, adding that the real motivation may have been to move al-Arian to a more isolated location.

Al-Arian's daughter Laila said her father fainted and hit his head Tuesday, and that he has lost 30 pounds (13.5 kilograms) since beginning the hunger strike, during which he is only drinking four glasses of water a day.

"We're definitely worried about him, but we respect why he chose to go on a hunger strike," she said. "You understand it when you sort of feel like you're cornered and you feel like the legal system is failing you."

Al-Arian was a prominent Palestinian activist who met with U.S. President George W. Bush and other political leaders in the years before he was charged.

Al-Arian has said he believes the effort to bring him in front of the grand jury is merely a trap by an overzealous U.S. prosecutor.

"I think it's just a pretext to hold me either in contempt or charge me with perjury, because whatever I'm going to say, they're going to say, 'You lied,'" al-Arian said in a jailhouse interview earlier this month with Democracy Now!, an independent media outlet.

But two U.S. judges have sided with prosecutors and said al-Arian must testify.

Because a judge has found al-Arian in contempt, every day he serves on the contempt charge extends his release date on a 57-month prison term handed down as part the plea for providing support to members of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad (PIJ).

Prosecutors had sought to prove al-Arian was a leader of PIJ, a terrorist group that has carried out suicide bombings against Israel. The trial ended with acquittal on some charges and a hung jury on the rest.

Al-Arian's lawyer, Peter Erlinder, said his client's fear of a perjury trap is valid given the aggressive tactics employed by federal prosecutors in Alexandria, who have handled numerous high-profile terrorism cases in recent years.

Benkahla had been one of just two defendants to win acquittal among more than a dozen who faced terror-related charges at the Alexandria courthouse since Sept. 11, 2001. Shortly after his acquittal in 2004, prosecutors said he lied in grand jury testimony about his training with a Pakistani militant group and charged him with perjury. He now faces up to 25 years in prison.

The civil contempt sentence al-Arian is now serving could run through June, or until the judge decides that further incarceration is unlikely to coerce al-Arian's testimony. But even then, prosecutors can seek another six-month term if they extend the grand jury and subpoena al-Arian again.

"It just feels like an endless nightmare," Laila al-Arian said. "It feels like purgatory." 2007-02-14T23:00:17Z

Restoring A Right (WP)

LAST SEPTEMBER, President Bush used the leverage of a midterm election to pressure Congress into granting his administration broad powers to detain, interrogate and try "enemy combatants" in the war on terrorism. The hastily considered bill had many flaws, but perhaps the most serious was a provision stripping foreign detainees of the right of habeas corpus, by which they could appeal their detentions, their treatment or the fairness of their trials to U.S. courts. With Congress under their control, Democrats have the chance to correct this serious breach of liberty. They should move quickly.

Two substantial pieces of legislation have been introduced in the Senate so far. One is a bipartisan measure backed by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and his predecessor as chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). Their bill would simply and straightforwardly restore the habeas right -- which is spelled out in Article I of the Constitution and has been a fundamental guarantor of freedom in Anglo-Saxon common law since the 12th century -- for all foreign prisoners in U.S. jurisdiction. The measure was narrowly defeated last year in the Senate by a vote of 51 to 48. Since then the elections have changed the arithmetic, and supporters believe a comfortable majority is within reach, though some compromises may be necessary to overcome a filibuster.

A much broader bill was introduced Tuesday by a group of Democrats led by Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), who is a candidate for president. In addition to affirming the habeas right, the Restoring the Constitution Act would correct many other problems with the military commissions law. It would prevent the administration from introducing evidence at the trials that was obtained through coercion; close loopholes that might allow the CIA to use abusive interrogation techniques; and improve the appeals process. The measure would also narrow -- in our view excessively -- the current law's overly broad definition of who can be defined as an "enemy combatant" subject to trial by a military commission. At present, even legal residents of the United States who do no more than "support" a terrorist group could be tried as enemy combatants; under Mr. Dodd's bill, only al-Qaeda members connected to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and fighters captured in "a zone of active combat against the United States" would be covered.

Most of the Dodd bill's reforms are badly needed. But many could be addressed through the courts if the habeas right were restored. Over the past several years, court supervision has proved essential to curbing the Bush administration's excesses in holding and interrogating prisoners at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere. Court rulings or the imminent prospect of them have caused prisoners held incommunicado to be granted attorneys and hearings, trial procedures to be improved and abusive treatment to be curbed. There is much still to do to reform foreign detentions; Congress needs to put the federal court system back into the process. It can do so by guaranteeing detainees the basic human right to appeal their imprisonment.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Dubai Firm's Sale Of U.S. Ports Hits A Snag (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

The long-running effort by Dubai Ports World to sell off its extensive U.S. port holdings has hit an 11th-hour snag over squabbles with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

The Port Authority has thrown up a number of unexpected objections and conditions to DP World's proposed sale of its port-management contract to AIG Global Investment Group, people familiar with the deal said.

DP World has received approval for the sale at all of the other facilities it operates in the U.S., but the Port Authority is demanding that the company pay as much as $84 million in order to approve the lease transfer, the people said. The Port Authority has also demanded access to sensitive business information, which both DP World and AIG Global, the investment arm of insurance giant American International Group Inc., have been reluctant to turn over.

The new demands have cast the overall transaction into jeopardy by greatly increasing the transaction cost for DP World. "The entire deal could fall apart," said one person familiar with details of the transaction. Another official involved in the deal said the demand amounted to a "departure fee" for DP World, which has been forced by political pressures to divest itself of its U.S. holdings.

The Dubai-based ports company, which is owned by the Persian Gulf emirate of Dubai in the United Arab Emirates, found itself at the center of a political furor a year ago, after the Bush administration signed off on its acquisition of a British ports company that had long managed operations at six U.S. ports, including the port of New York/New Jersey, which is owned by the Port Authority.

Amid an outcry in Congress over perceived national-security concerns related to the deal, the Bush administration urged DP World to sell off its newly acquired U.S. assets, which also included contracts to run marine terminals in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Miami, Tampa, Florida and New Orleans, as well as smaller stevedoring operations in around a dozen other U.S. locations.

In December, DP World said it had found a buyer in AIG Global, a New York-based asset-management company with more than $680 billion in assets. The terms of the sale haven't been disclosed.

AIG spokesman Chris Winans declined to comment on the negotiations with the Port Authority, but said "we remain excited about the possibility of acquiring this business." DP World also declined to comment.

Port Authority spokesman Steve Sigmund said the Port Authority is "having productive discussions" with AIG and hopes to reach an agreement in "short order." He said the Port Authority is trying to get commitments from AIG to invest in infrastructure improvements to wharves and other facilities and expansion of railroad tracks to move cargo. "We are not using it to extract cash," Mr. Sigmund said. "We are trying to ensure that the ports are run safely and responsibly."

Were the New York/New Jersey portion of the deal to fall apart, that would jeopardize the entire transaction, possibly requiring DP World to find another buyer. DP World agreed with the administration last spring that it would turn over its U.S. port holdings to a U.S.-owned company, but it took months to find a buyer willing to pay the right price.

State Farm Retreats In Gulf (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, February 15, 2007

State Farm's decision Wednesday to stop writing new home and commercial policies throughout Mississippi could prompt other insurers to retreat further from the Katrina-battered region, industry groups and legal experts say.

State Farm — which insures about one of every three Mississippi homes — is the first company since Hurricane Katrina to stop offering new policies throughout a state in the Gulf Coast area. Its move underscores the precarious nature of the region's insurance. Since the hurricane, insurers have cut back on homeowner policies in affected coastal areas.

The decision Wednesday is one State Farm came to "reluctantly," says company spokesman Phil Supple, partly because of the torrent of lawsuits and rulings in Mississippi since Katrina and the uncertainty of pending legal battles. The move doesn't affect existing policyholders, at least for now. State Farm is the largest insurer of homes in the USA, as well as in Mississippi. Last year, the company wrote about 29,000 new homeowner policies in the state.

The insurer's "extraordinary step" could affect companies facing similar legal issues, says Robert Hartwig of the Insurance Information Institute. "I can't rule out that other insurers might make similar legal decisions."

Mike Siemienas, a spokesman for Allstate, another large insurer, says his company "can't speculate on what we'll do," but when it makes coverage decisions, "we review the entire situation" in the state.

Insurers are still grappling with thousands of homeowners' lawsuits related to Katrina damage. At issue is whether homes reduced to slab were damaged by wind or water. Homeowner policies cover wind damage, but only federal flood policies cover flooding.

In Mississippi, State Farm has agreed to settle 640 individual lawsuits and to pay at least $50 million to reopen up to 35,000 hurricane-related homeowners' claims. A federal judge, though, has suspended part of the settlement in question, seeking more information. A hearing on the settlement is set for late February.

Matthew Steffey, a professor at Mississippi College School of Law, believes the timing of State Farm's announcement — weeks before the federal court hearing — isn't coincidental. "I think the message is if we can't settle these cases favorably, then we will quit doing (new) business in your state, and the fear is that other insurers" will pull out, he says.

The bad news for homeowners, says Birny Birnbaum of the Center for Economic Justice, a consumer-advocacy group, is that "other insurers are probably going to follow suit (in pulling back on homeowners' coverage in the region) because they want to apply political pressure" like State Farm.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Declares Iran's Arms Role In Iraq Is Certain (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Marc Santora

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — President Bush said Wednesday that he was certain that factions within the Iranian government had supplied Shiite militants in Iraq with deadly roadside bombs that had killed American troops. But he said he did not know whether Iran's highest officials had directed the attacks.

Mr. Bush's remarks amounted to his most specific accusation to date that Iran was undermining security in Iraq. They appeared to be part of a concerted effort by the White House to present a clearer, more direct case that Iran was supplying the potent weapons — and to push back against criticism that the intelligence used in reaching the conclusions was not credible.

Speaking at a news conference in the East Room of the White House, Mr. Bush dismissed as "preposterous" the contention by some skeptics that the United States was drawing unwarranted conclusions about Iran's role. He publicly endorsed assertions that had until now been presented only by anonymous military and intelligence officials, who have said that an elite branch of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps known as the Quds Force has provided Shiite militias in Iraq with the sophisticated weapons that have been responsible for killing at least 170 American soldiers and wounding more than 600.

"I can say with certainty that the Quds Force, a part of the Iranian government, has provided these sophisticated I.E.D.'s that have harmed our troops," Mr. Bush said, using the abbreviation for improvised explosive device. "And I'd like to repeat, I do not know whether or not the Quds Force was ordered from the top echelons of the government. But my point is, what's worse, them ordering it and it happening, or them not ordering it and its happening?"

The House of Representatives is debating a resolution disapproving of Mr. Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq. [Page A16.] And so Mr. Bush used his appearance to defend that decision as necessary in the face of deteriorating security in Baghdad. Asked about a possible American response to Iranian interference, he said, "We will continue to protect our troops." With skeptics asking why the intelligence about Iran's meddling is coming to light now, a number of possibilities have been raised, including the increase in attacks and American casualties in recent months. [Page A16.]

American intelligence officials have said they think that top leaders in Iran must have approved of the attacks on the American forces, in part because the Quds Force has historically reported to the country's top religious leaders. But aides to Mr. Bush, mindful of the criticism about its use of intelligence before the Iraq war, said the White House wanted to be careful not to make that kind of accusation without hard proof.

As Mr. Bush discussed Iran in Washington, the chief American military spokesman in Baghdad provided a more detailed, on-the-record account of how the administration believed the weapons, particularly lethal explosive devices known as explosively formed penetrators, or E.F.P.'s, got to Iraq. The spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, was also careful not to link the actions of the Quds Force directly to Iran's top leaders. He said American assertions about a link between the weapons and the force were based on information obtained from people, including Iranians, detained in Iraq in the past 60 days.

"They in fact have told us that the Quds Force provides support to extremist groups here in Iraq in the forms of both money and weaponry," General Caldwell said. He added: "They have talked about how there are extremist elements that are given this material in Iran and then it is smuggled into Iraq. We have in fact stopped some at the border and discovered it there, coming from Iran into Iraq."

The coordinated messages out of Baghdad and Washington were an effort by the White House to tamp down reports of divisions within the American government about who in Iran should be held responsible for the weapons shipments. A senior Defense analyst said at a briefing in Baghdad over the weekend that the effort was being directed "from the highest levels of the Iranian government." But Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, offered a contradictory account this week, telling The Associated Press that while some bomb materials were made in Iran, "that does not translate that the Iranian government, per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this."

At Wednesday's news conference, Mr. Bush suggested that it did not matter whether senior leaders were involved. "What matters is, is that we're responding," Mr. Bush said. He said that if the United States found either networks or individuals "who are moving these devices into Iraq, we will deal with them."

Some experts said the question of Iran's responsibility remained important. "There's a big difference between saying that there is a rogue element doing things and then asking the Iranian government to rein it in, as opposed to saying this is a calculated deliberate strategy of the Iranian government," said Vali Nasr, a Middle East scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations. "That has very different implications in terms of how do you hold Iran culpable."

The administration's claims about Iran have been met with intense skepticism, from Democrats in Congress and from experts like David Kay, who led the search for illicit weapons in Iraq. Some critics have said the White House is using Iran as a scapegoat for its problems in Iraq, and some have suggested that the administration, which has been trying to pressure Iran into abandoning its nuclear program, is laying the foundation for another war.

On Wednesday, a leading contender for the Democratic nomination for president, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, took to the Senate floor to call on Mr. Bush to seek authorization for any military action against Iran. "We cannot and we must not allow recent history to repeat itself," she said.

Mr. Bush has said that he has no intention of invading Iran and that any suggestion that he was trying to provoke Iran "is just a wrong way to characterize the commander in chief's decision to do what is necessary to protect our soldiers in harm's way." But experts say that the ratcheting up of accusations could provoke a confrontation. Gary Sick, an expert on Iran at Columbia University, said there was a "danger of accidental war." He said, "If anything goes wrong, if something happens, there's an unexplained explosion and we kidnap an Iranian, and the Iranians respond to that somehow, this could get out of control."

Mr. Bush has also refused to meet with Iran's leaders, and he said Wednesday that he did not believe that it would be an effective way of persuading the Iranians to give up their nuclear goals. "This is a world in which people say, 'Meet! Sit down and meet!' " he said. "And my answer is, if it yields results, that's what I'm interested in."

By Terence Hunt

AP, February 15, 2007

Challenged on the accuracy of U.S. intelligence, President Bush said Wednesday there is no doubt the Iranian government is providing armor-piercing weapons to kill American soldiers in Iraq. But he backed away from claims the top echelon of Iran's government was responsible.

Bush, at a news conference, also said he would fight any attempt by the Democratic-controlled Congress to cut off money for the war. "They need to fund our troops and the need to make sure we have the flexibility necessary to get the job done," he said.

The House is expected to vote Friday on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

The meeting with reporters in the East Room was Bush's first news conference since Dec. 20 and the first since he announced the troop buildup in Iraq. The four-year-old war hangs heavily on his presidency, and Bush's approval rating in an Associated Press-Ipsos poll in February matched an all-time low of 32 percent.

Iran was a dominant theme of reporters' questions because of conflicting statements about U.S. intelligence in Iran and recurring speculation that Bush is looking for an excuse to attack the Islamic republic, which is believed by Washington and its allies to be seeking nuclear weapons.

Defending U.S. intelligence that has pinpointed Iran as a hostile arms supplier in Iraq, Bush said, "Does this mean you're trying to have a pretext for war? No. It means I'm trying to protect our troops."

There have been mixed signals in the administration about Iran's involvement in supplying Shiite groups in Iraq with a particularly lethal type of roadside bombs known as explosively formed penetrators.

Three senior U.S. military officials, at a weekend briefing in Baghdad, said the highest levels of the Iranian government had ordered the weapons smuggled into Iraq. They based their claim on the belief the weapons are moving into Iraq through the Iran's Revolutionary Guards elite Quds Force.

But Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said later he was not ready to conclude that Iran's top leaders were behind the attacks. Some lawmakers also have questioned the administration's statements.

Wading into the debate, Bush said the Quds Force was instrumental in supplying the weapons — "we know that," he said — and that the Quds Force was part of the Iranian government. "That's a known," he said. "What we don't know is whether or not the head leaders of Iran ordered the Quds Force to do what they did."

Pressed again on the subject, Bush displayed some irritation and said, "Whether (Iranian President Mahmoud) Ahmadinejad ordered the Quds Force to do this, I don't think we know. But we do know that they're there and I intend to do something about it. And I've asked our commanders to do something about it. And we're going to protect our troops." Ahmadinejad has denied Iran was behind the attacks.

Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee emerged from a classified briefing Wednesday saying they wanted more information about Iran. The committee chairman, Sen. Carl Levin, said it was unclear to him precisely what the administration knows about the Tehran government's ties to the weapons found in Iraq.

"There seems to be some disarray," said Levin, D-Mich. He said he eventually hopes to see some declassified information on the subject.

Bush said he talked with Petraeus about coordination between Iraqi and coalition forces, and that while it seemed to be good, more work was needed on developing an efficient command-and-control structure.

Bush responded carefully when asked about Russian President Vladimir Putin's accusations Saturday that the United States was undermining global security and provoking a nuclear arms race. The depth of Putin's criticism surprised U.S. officials.

Bush said Putin was "the same strong-willed person" he has known since 2001 and there is a "complicated relationship" between Washington and Moscow.

On other matters, Bush said:

_The agreement announced Tuesday to shut down North Korea's nuclear program in exchange for fuel assistance was "a good first step." He said he strongly disagreed with former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton that it was a bad deal.

_He will not comment on the 2008 presidential race. "I will resist all temptation to become the pundit-in-chief."

_He will not comment on whether he authorized members of his administration to leak the identity of Valerie Plame, a one-time CIA officer whose husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, criticized the administration's case for the Iraq war. Similarly, Bush refused to say whether he might pardon I. Lewis "Scooter Libby, the former aide to Vice President Dick Cheney. Libby is on trial on charges of lying and obstructing the investigation into the Plame's identity.

Bush Backs Off Key Charge Against Iran (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, February 15, 2007

US President George W. Bush said he was unsure whether top Iranian leaders were behind arms shipments to anti-US fighters in Iraq, undercutting a volatile US charge levelled just days ago.

But he said there was no doubt that the elite Al-Qods Force of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Corps was behind powerful new improvised explosive devices (IEDS) killing US soldiers in Iraq and vowed he would "do something about it."

"Whether (Iranian President Mahmoud) Ahmadinejad ordered the Qods Force to do this, I don't think we know. But we do know that they're there," Bush told his first press conference since December 20.

Bush, who also dismissed as "preposterous" any suggestion that Washington was fabricating charges against Tehran, ruled out direct bilateral talks for now with the Islamic republic.

"If I thought we could achieve success, I would sit down. But I don't think we can achieve success right now," he said, stressing that he believed the ongoing multilateral approach to Iran's nuclear programs was paying off.

"That's a more effective way of convincing the Iranians to give up their nuclear weapons ambitions," he said. "And I believe we are making good progress toward solving this issue peacefully."

"If they want us at the table, we're more than willing to come, but there must be a verifiable suspension of this weapons program that is causing such grave concern," he said. Tehran denies seeking nuclear weapons.

Three days after anonymous US officials in Baghdad told a roomful of reporters that "the senior levels of the Iranian government" had approved weapons shipments to Iraqi fighters, Bush said he could not vouch for it.

"I can say with certainty that the Qods force, a part of the Iranian government, has provided these sophisticated IEDs that have harmed our troops," he said.

"I do not know whether or not the Qods force was ordered from the top echelons of government. But my point is what's worse -- them ordering it and it happening, or them not ordering it and it happening?

His comments came after the chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine General Peter Pace, cast doubt on the allegation that the highest levels of Iran's government were directing the weapons flows.

Pace told Voice of America radio that the explosives were made in Iran but added: "What I would not say is that the Iranian government, per se, knows about this."

Pace's apparent break with the briefing in Baghdad added fuel to criticisms that the Bush administration was exaggerating the case against Iran and recalled the bitter debate over the flawed case for invading Iraq.

"The idea that somehow we're manufacturing the idea that the Iranians are providing IEDs is preposterous," countered Bush.

"When we find the networks that are enabling these weapons to end up in Iraq, we will deal with them. If we find agents who are moving these devices into Iraq, we will deal with them," said the US president.

"We know they're there, we know they're provided by the Qods force. We know the Qods force is a part of the Iranian government. I don't think we know who picked up the phone and said to the Qods force, go do this, but we know it's a vital part of the Iranian government," said Bush.

The US president spoke hours after the US military in Baghdad formally repeated the charges made at the weekend briefing, where officials spoke on condition that they not be named and recording devices were banned.

Major General William Caldwell repeated the bulk of the charges -- but backtracked from Sunday's claim that the shipments initiated at "the highest level" of the Iranian government, calling that an analysts' "inference".

Iranians Aid Iraq Militants, Bush Alleges (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

President Bush bluntly accused Iranian agents yesterday of providing sophisticated explosives to kill U.S. troops in Iraq but said he did not know whether they were acting on orders of the Islamic republic's leaders and denied using the allegations as a pretext to go to war with Tehran.

As the House entered its second day of debate over the Iraq war, Bush tried to quiet talk that he is heading down the same road with Iran that he did with its neighbor four years ago. At his first news conference since announcing that he will send more troops to Iraq, Bush said he sees fresh progress in Baghdad and warned Congress not to cut off funding or set timetables for withdrawal.

The president spent much of the hour-long televised session in the East Room addressing skepticism about his government's assertions regarding Iran and fears of a widening regional conflict. "The idea that somehow we're manufacturing the idea that the Iranians are providing [explosives] is preposterous," Bush said. Repeating a reporter's question, he added: "Does this mean you're trying to have a pretext for war? No. It means I'm trying to protect our troops."

Bush rejected suggestions that his administration has provided conflicting accounts of the Iranian leadership's involvement in arming Iraqi extremists. On Sunday, U.S. military officials briefing reporters in Baghdad on the condition of anonymity said that the "highest levels" of Iran's government are involved, but Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, later said he would not say the Iranian government is complicit.

"There's no contradiction that the weapons are there and they were provided by the Quds Force," an Iranian paramilitary unit, Bush said. He added: "We know that. And we also know that the Quds Force is a part of the Iranian government. That's a known. What we don't know is whether or not the head leaders of Iran ordered the Quds Force to do what they did."

The administration has long asserted that Iran has been fomenting trouble in Iraq, but the issue has taken on new urgency in recent weeks as Bush dispatched an additional aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf and confirmed orders to capture or kill Iranian agents caught in Iraq. Democrats and other critics have accused Bush of exaggerating the situation to justify new military action.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the early Democratic presidential front-runner, went to the Senate floor after Bush's news conference to insist that he ask Congress for permission before attacking Iran. "It would be a mistake of historical proportion if the administration thought that the 2002 resolution authorizing force against Iraq was a blank check for the use of force against Iran without further congressional authorization," she said.

The president's news conference demonstrated how much the three countries Bush dubbed an "axis of evil" continue to dominate his presidency five years after he coined the term. With the war in Iraq still mired in violence and the confrontation with Iran growing, Bush was able to cite North Korea as a bright spot. U.S. negotiators reached agreement this week in six-party talks with Pyongyang to shut down its nuclear weapons program in exchange for food and energy.

"This is progress," Bush said. "It is a good first step. There's a lot of work to be done to make sure that the commitments made in this agreement become reality, but I believe it's an important step in the right direction."

The deal has come under fire from figures on the left and the right, who complain that it rewards bad behavior and gives away too much without certainty that North Korea will live up to its end. Bush bristled at the criticism, saying: "The assessment made by some that this is not a good deal is just flat wrong."

The Iran issue has inflamed the already emotional debate on the House floor, as lawmakers consider a nonbinding resolution denouncing Bush's decision to order 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq. The president had largely stayed out of that debate in recognition that it seems certain to pass with even some Republican support and that it is only symbolic. But he signaled a willingness, even an eagerness, to fight any attempt to tangibly tie his hands.

"My hope . . . is that this nonbinding resolution doesn't try to turn into a binding policy that prevents our troops from doing that which I have asked them to do," Bush said. A few moments later, he added: "I'm going to make it very clear to the members of Congress, starting now, that they need to fund our troops and they need to make sure we have the flexibility necessary to get the job done."

Bush arrived for his meeting with reporters after receiving a briefing from Gen. David H. Petraeus, who recently took over as the top U.S. commander in Iraq. The president expressed optimism that the Iraqi government is beginning to meet certain benchmarks, noting that it has set aside $10 billion of its own money for reconstruction as promised and is moving toward a distribution deal on oil proceeds and new rules allowing some lower-level members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party back into the government.

He sought to lower expectations for what constitutes success, however, describing his goal as "relative peace" in Iraq, because "if it's like zero car bombings, it never will happen that way." Bush continued to reject the notion that the conflict in Iraq is now a civil war, despite a new U.S. intelligence conclusion that the term "accurately describes key elements" of the strife, though not its entire complexity.

His comments triggered more criticism among Democrats. "This stubborn refusal to face reality has led this administration into blunder after blunder in Iraq and is now behind the president's misguided plan to send American troops into the crossfire," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), urging colleagues to block the troop increase.

The debate over Iraq and the anxiety over Iran have played out against the backdrop of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury trial, where the origins of the war have been revisited. Defense lawyers for Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff rested their case yesterday after weeks of testimony that confirmed that three administration officials other than Libby -- Bush adviser Karl Rove, then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage and then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer -- leaked the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, had become a vocal critic of the handling of Iraq intelligence. Bush once promised to fire anyone who had leaked Plame's name to the media. But he would not say yesterday whether he had authorized any of the three to leak it. "I'm not going to talk about any of it," he said. And he refused to rule out pardoning Libby.

On another recent foreign flash point, Bush offered a gentle response to Russian President Vladimir Putin, who last weekend accused him of undermining global peace and provoking a new arms race. Bush declined to reevaluate his 2001 assessment about seeing Putin's soul: "I think the person who I was referring to in 2001 is the same strong-willed person. He is a person with whom I have had agreements and disagreements throughout the course of my presidency and his."

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 15, 2007

George W. Bush yesterday angrily rejected criticisms of Tuesday's six-party agreement on North Korea's nuclear programme while singing the praises of multilateral diplomacy.

The US president's backing of the deal has attracted fierce attacks. John Bolton, the former US ambassador to the United Nations, called it a "charade" and a "hollow agreement".

"I strongly disagree with his assessment," said Mr Bush when asked about Mr Bolton's comments yesterday. "The best diplomacy is where there is more than one voice sitting down with an equity in the issue . . . the assessment made by some that this is a bad deal is flat wrong."

The deal has been attacked by former neoconservative allies, who see it as evidence that the president has caved into a "realist" foreign policy. It has also been taken as a sign that Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, is driving US diplomacy.

Senior officials say that Christopher Hill, the chief US negotiator close to Ms Rice, was given great latitude to negotiate a deal that could work in practice. Ms Rice reportedly cut out senior State Department non-proliferation officials from the North Korea talks.

Danielle Pletka, a neoconservative at the American Enterprise Institute, said the deal was worse than the "general framework" agreement negotiated by the Clinton administration in 1994, which fell apart in 2002.

"The Clinton administration had a view that we should accommodate the bad guys and then deal with the problem later," said Ms Pletka. "We disagreed with his approach but it had the merit of at least being coherent. I see no strategy whatsoever behind the Bush administration's current approach to North Korea. Anyone who believes Pyongyang will honour the agreement needs their head examining."

Ms Pletka and other neoconservatives also say that the deal will send the wrong signal to Iran, which will interpret North Korea's success as having directly flowed from its decision to test a nuclear device last October. "The message is that Iran should accelerate its nuclear programme then it will get more concessions," she said.

Mr Bush yesterday reiterated his aversion to talks with Iran while it refuses to suspend its uranium enrichment programme. He also played down apparent contradictions between recent US military briefings over whether the Iranian government was directly supplying improvised explosive devices to terrorist groups in Iraq.

Mr Bush said that it did not matter whether or not Tehran ordered Quds - a unit of Iran's revolutionary guard corps - to supply the bombs. "What we do know is the Quds force is instrumental in providing these deadly IEDs to networks inside of Iraq," he said. "What we don't know is whether or not the head leaders of Iran ordered the Quds force to do what they did."

Bush Insists That Iran Provides Weapons For Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Wednesday that he is sure bombs supplied by Iran are killing U.S. troops in Iraq, but doesn't know if Iran's top leaders are complicit.

Bush's uncertainty, expressed at his first White House news conference this year, contrasted with an assessment by the U.S. military in Iraq. Military officials said Sunday that Iran's government was involved in the shipments of powerful roadside bombs to radical Shiite militias.

Bush said it is known that the al-Quds Force, an elite branch of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, is providing Shiite groups in Iraq with weapons, known as explosively formed penetrators. "I don't think we know who picked up the phone and said to the Quds Force, 'Go do this,' " Bush said during a session dominated by the topics of Iraq and Iran.

The president said the point is that the weapons exist. He vowed to "continue to protect our troops."

In Baghdad on Wednesday, the top U.S. military spokesman said Sunday's briefing was not designed to accuse the Iranian government but to present evidence of its role in Iraq's violence. The briefer "was responding to questions and trying to be informative," said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has denied the Bush administration's charges.

Democrats such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York have expressed skepticism of the intelligence on Iran, citing unfounded claims about weapons of mass destruction before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. "We must be on guard that we never again make decisions on the basis of intelligence that turns out to be faulty," said Clinton, a 2008 presidential candidate.

Bush has said the faulty Iraq intelligence has raised questions about the credibility of all U.S. intelligence gathering. The president also told reporters he is not making new charges against Iran as a "pretext" for war. "To say it is provoking Iran is just a wrong way to characterize the commander in chief's decision to do what is necessary to protect our soldiers in harm's way," he said.

In the hour-long news conference, the president also addressed the House debate on a non-binding resolution opposing his plan to boost U.S. troop levels in Iraq. The measure is expected to pass on Friday, with some Republicans joining the Democratic majority.

Challenging anti-war Republicans as well as Democrats, Bush said his critics need to prove they support the troops by voting on emergency funding: "You can be against my decision and support the troops, absolutely, but the proof will be whether or not you provide them the money necessary to do the mission."

On other topics:

·Russia. Bush said he and Russian President Vladimir Putin have a "complicated relationship" but also have "common interests." Last weekend, the Russian leader accused Bush of pursuing an aggressive foreign policy that undermines global security.

·Korea. The president said he "strongly" disagrees with criticism by his former United Nations ambassador John Bolton of a deal with North Korea on nuclear weapons. Bush said the deal reached among the United States, North Korea and four other nations "is a good first step" and represents a "breakthrough."

·2008 presidential campaign. Bush declined to handicap the candidates in the 2008 election or discuss how the campaign might affect the Iraq debate. "I will resist all temptation to become the pundit-in-chief," Bush said.

Bush Certain Iranian Unit Tied To Arms (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

President Bush yesterday said he knows an elite Iranian military unit is supplying arms to insurgents in Iraq, though he acknowledged he can't say if they were sent on the orders of Iran's top officials.

"Here's my point: Either they knew or didn't know, and what matters is, is that they're there," he said of the Quds force, a branch of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, during a morning press conference at the White House. "What's worse -- that the government knew or that the government didn't know?"

On Iraq, Mr. Bush called for Americans to give his new strategy time to work, saying it would give the Iraqis "political breathing space" to get their own affairs settled. And he said while Congress can express itself through nonbinding resolutions, they must not withdraw funding from the troops.

"I'm going to make it very clear to the members of Congress, starting now, that they need to fund our troops and they need to make sure we have the flexibility necessary to get the job done," he said.

But Iran dominated the foreign-policy-heavy, hourlong press conference, with Mr. Bush saying he is working on several levels to try to engage that country.

U.S. officials, speaking on the condition they not be named, told reporters in Baghdad over the weekend that Iran was supplying mortars and roadside bombs called explosively formed penetrators (EFPs) to insurgents to be used against U.S. troops trying to create peace in Iraq. One official said the direction was "coming from the highest level of the Iranian government."

That official, though, was contradicted this week by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He said the arms transfer "does not translate that the Iranian government per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this."

Mr. Bush yesterday sought to split the difference, saying either way it is a dangerous situation.

"We do know that they're there, and I intend to do something about it," he said. "And I've asked our commanders to do something about it. And we're going to protect our troops."

It's a thorny issue because it comes five years after Congress, citing intelligence reports now known to be faulty, voted to go to war in Iraq to disarm Saddam Hussein's regime of weapons of mass destruction (WMDs).

Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, said Mr. Bush is being too confrontational with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0132552

"Instead of hyping intelligence that our nation's top military leader has called into question, instead of trying to scare the American people and bully the Iranian government, the Bush administration ought to cool its rhetoric and redouble its diplomatic efforts with Iran," said Mr. Byrd, the Senate's senior Democrat.

He said Mr. Bush must come back to Congress before going on the offensive against Iran.

"Show the proof. Make the case. Level with the country," Mr. Byrd said. "Any benefit of doubt that this administration may have once deserved disappeared with the vanishing WMDs in 2002 and the twisting of intelligence to build the case for war against Iraq."

Mr. Bush said the idea that he is manufacturing intelligence to go to war with Iran is "preposterous."

The president weighed in on the nonbinding resolution the House is debating this week that disapproves of his plan to increase troops in Iraq, saying Congress may speak its piece but must not interfere with the actual policy.

He portrayed the resolution vote as less important than the Senate's vote last month to confirm Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to lead U.S. forces in Iraq, and the upcoming vote on his $100 billion emergency-spending request to fund the war on terrorism.

Mr. Bush also defended the deal the United States and four other nations struck this week with North Korea, which ties incentives to the rogue nation's halting its nuclear weapons development program.

The president shrugged and smiled a little when asked how he responded to his former top nonproliferation official and ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, who said this week that the North Korea agreement was a bad deal.

"This is a good first step," he said. "It will be a great deal for the North Korean people if their government follows through with the agreement."

Tehran's Iraq Role Unclear, U.S. Now Says (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

But Bush calls it irrelevant that no solid evidence links Iranian officials to alleged weapons aid.

WASHINGTON — U.S. officials from President Bush to a top general in Baghdad said Wednesday that there was no solid evidence that high-ranking officials in Iran had ordered deadly weapons to be sent to Iraq for use against American troops, backing away from claims made by military and intelligence officials in Baghdad this week.

But Bush continued to maintain an aggressive posture toward Tehran, saying elite Iranian Quds Force operatives were supplying weapons to insurgents in Iraq.

"What we don't know is whether or not the head leaders of Iran ordered the Quds Force to do what they did," he said.

"What matters is that they're there," Bush said, adding, "What's worse: that the government knew or that the government didn't know?"

Bush then issued a threat that hinted at a direct clash with Iranian units.

"When we find the networks that are enabling these weapons to end up in Iraq," he said at a late-morning White House news conference, "we will deal with them."

The Quds Force is a special unit of the Revolutionary Guard, which is a force separate from Iran's military, created to safeguard and spread the 1979 revolution that established Shiite clerical rule in the country.

Critics have accused the Bush administration in recent days of overstating claims of official Iranian involvement in Iraq's violence.

On Sunday, U.S. officials in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity alleged that Iranian officials at the "highest levels" of the government, including supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, were behind the smuggling of a deadly type of explosive device used against U.S. forces.

But during news conferences Wednesday in Washington and Baghdad, Bush and Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief military spokesman in Iraq, appeared to step back from that claim, just as Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, did in interviews this week.

Caldwell characterized the recent statements about Iranian weapons in Iraq as a diplomatic endeavor to persuade Iranians to stop the flow of such weapons.

"We want to tell [the Iranians], 'You need to stop,' " he said. " 'We need your assistance.' "

The controversy surrounding the claims revolves around the nature of wartime intelligence work, which often requires making conclusions based on classified information, confidential sources, circumstantial inferences and historical patterns rather than the type of evidence that could prove a court case.

At a presentation Sunday in Baghdad, U.S. officials showed reporters weapons found in Iraq that they said had been made in Iran. They spoke on condition of anonymity and barred reporters from bringing in cameras or recorders. The unusual secrecy, amid several Washington investigations of abuses of intelligence in the run-up to the Iraq war, led critics to question the administration's motives.

U.S. officials removed some of the secrecy Wednesday and allowed photographers to scrutinize the weapons. The arms included rockets with recent date marks that officials said could be traced to munitions factories in Iran, as well as an Explosively Formed Penetrator, a sophisticated roadside bomb that can pierce an armored vehicle.

Officials claimed that the projectiles have been used by Shiite Muslim militias with long-standing ties to Iran. On Sunday they said the penetrators had caused the deaths of about 170 U.S.-led forces in Iraq,

Also on display Wednesday were identification cards seized from Iranians allegedly linked to the Quds Force. One, belonging to a graying, middle-aged man in military uniform, says he worked for the intelligence branch of the Revolutionary Guard, which mostly is involved in domestic Iranian security matters.

"We're not trying to hype this," Caldwell said.

In Washington, Bush bristled when asked whether he was using such displays to provoke Iran, much as critics say he used intelligence about Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction and ties to Al Qaeda that turned out to be flawed.

"To say it is 'provoking Iran' is just a wrong way to characterize the commander in chief's decision to do what is necessary to protect our soldiers in harm's way," the president said.

"The idea that somehow we're manufacturing the idea that the Iranians are providing IEDs is preposterous," Bush said, referring to improvised explosive devices. "My job is to protect our troops. And when we find devices that are in that country that are hurting our troops, we're going to do something about it, pure and simple."

Some analysts have suggested that even if the weapons did come from Iran, the degree of government involvement and the motivation remain unclear. Iran may have supplied weapons to Shiite militias primarily to arm them against Sunni forces in the nation's sectarian warfare, they say.

Even the issue of where the weapons were manufactured is cloudy. A U.S. military explosives expert at the news conference in Baghdad acknowledged that there was no forensic evidence or labels linking the canister-shaped weapons to munitions plants in Iran.

Rather, Army Maj. Marty Weber said, the weapons were similar to those that the Iranian-backed Hezbollah militia used against Israeli forces during Israel's late-1990s occupation of southern Lebanon.

The link to Iran was based on "historical knowledge of these types of weapons, having first seen their use by an Iranian surrogate terrorist group in 1998," Weber said.

The Iranian government has denied that it is sending weapons to Iran to kill U.S. troops or seeking to stir up trouble in Iraq, which is run by longtime Shiite and Kurdish allies.

Asked what assurances he could give about the accuracy of the intelligence on the Iranian explosives, Bush said: "We know they're there. We know they're provided by the Quds Force. We know the Quds Force is a part of the Iranian government. I don't think we know who picked up the phone and said to the Quds Force, 'Go do this,' but we know it's a vital part of the Iranian government."

Caldwell appeared to suggest at times during his briefing that the simultaneous presence of Quds Force operatives and the Explosively Formed Penetrators in Iraq indicated that Iranians were involved in the smuggling of the deadly weapons into the country.

"We have physical evidence of munitions being supplied to extremists," he said. "We have in custody Quds Force officers who are, at a minimum, here illegally in Iraq.

"There's no question that Quds Force elements are involved in this," he said.

Why Accuse Iran Of Meddling Now? U.S. Officials Explain (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — One of the questions posed by skeptics about the Bush administration assertions about Iran's meddling in Iraq is why the charges are coming to light only now, when American officials say the shipment of lethal weapons from Iran to Shiite militias was first detected several years ago.

Among possible explanations for the timetable, some critics have suggested, is that the White House is making its assertions now in an effort to blame Iran for the deteriorating situation in Iraq, or that President Bush is trying to lay a legal and political groundwork for a military strike against the government in Tehran, which he singled out in 2002 as a member of the "axis of evil."

In recent interviews and in a military briefing on Wednesday in Baghdad, American officials have offered a more direct explanation for the timetable: attacks with the device have increased sharply in recent months, prompting the United States to react, and then to justify its actions.

According to one military official, reports of the "explosively formed penetrator," as the weapon is known, first surfaced in late 2003. But attacks with the device have steadily increased since then. The last quarter of 2006 was a particularly dangerous period in terms of attacks with the device, with a new high reached in December.

As the attacks have gone up, so have the American casualties. Since 2004, at least 170 Americans have been killed and 620 wounded in attacks with the device. But a significant number of those casualties occurred in the last part of 2006.

Faced with stepped-up attacks, military officials said they began to carry out raids to try to disrupt efforts to train and equip Shiite militants with the weapon. That led to the detention of Iranian officials — and questions from the Iraqi government, the public and the press about why the American military was capturing and detaining Iranians, including some officials who said they were diplomats.

American officials assert that the raids produced additional evidence implicating a branch of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, known as the Quds Force, in supplying the devices, a charge Iran has denied.

Even so, the decision by American military officials to put forward the evidence in a full-scale briefing was not an easy call, according to Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American military spokesman in Iraq. One concern was that discussing the weapon would let adversaries know how effective it is.

After concluding that efforts to warn the Iranians through diplomatic channels not to send the weapons components were not producing results, Bush administration officials and military commanders in Baghdad decided to organize a briefing and present some of the evidence in a session last Sunday.

"The intent of the press conference was to talk about a force protection issue, not politics," General Caldwell said on Wednesday.

Skepticism Over Iraq Haunts U.S. Iran Policy (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

The specter of the war in Iraq -- a war the Bush administration denied it was planning, supported by evidence that turned out to be false -- looms large over administration policy toward Iran.

Skeptical members of Congress have questioned administration charges of Tehran's support for Iraqi insurgents and President Bush's insistence that his plans for dealing with Iran remain purely diplomatic. The administration, conscious of its low credibility, believes it has gone out of its way to convince doubters that Iran is not Iraq all over again.

"No, no, no, no," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday in response to questions about whether the administration embellished evidence against Iran in a U.S. military briefing in Baghdad the previous day. "I'm almost ready to hit my head on the microphone."

Much as the Vietnam Syndrome dogged the foreign and military policies of a generation of U.S. presidents, the Iraq Syndrome has become an ever-present undercurrent in Washington. "Everyone is reliving the whole thing again in everything we do," said one administration official, referring to the tumultuous months surrounding the U.S. invasion in March 2003.

"In the old days, if the U.S. government had come out and said, 'We've got this, here's our assessment,' reasonable people would have taken it at face value," the official said of the Baghdad briefing. "That's never going to happen again."

In yesterday's White House news conference, Bush grappled with the issue head-on. "What makes you so certain," a reporter asked Bush, of the military's charge that "the highest levels of Tehran's government" are responsible for shipments of lethal weapons to Iraq for use against U.S. troops?

Bush contradicted the military's account, saying, "We don't know . . . whether the head leaders of Iran ordered" it.

"But here's my point," he added. "Either they knew or didn't know, and what matters is, is that [the weapons] they're there."

Yet, as questions that have peppered senior officials all week suggest, what matters in the post-Iraq invasion era is whether the administration can prove it.

The bottom line for many congressional Democrats and an increasing number of Republicans was reflected Tuesday by Rep. Bob Etheridge (D-N.C.) during the House debate on the Iraq war. "The president said Saddam Hussein was in cahoots with al-Qaeda terrorists," Etheridge said. "I took the president at his word."

Burdened by its troubles in Iraq, the Bush administration is being doubly scrutinized over its policy toward Tehran. For weeks, despite occasional saber rattling, officials from the president on down have insisted there are no plans to attack Iran.

Instead, they have said they are fully committed to a peaceful resolution of all outstanding grievances, including Iran's nuclear weapons activities, support for terrorists in Lebanon and support for insurgents in Iraq.

"We've been very careful in what we've said over the last few weeks," Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, the administration's point man on Iran, said in an appearance yesterday at the Brookings Institution.

Asked about the "highest levels" charge, Burns replied: "The president . . . did not claim that today. We are not claiming that today."

That was precisely what the military asserted in its Baghdad briefing for reporters Sunday, a secretive session in which no cameras or tape recorders were allowed and no names were given for the speakers.

The charge was that Tehran's operatives were supplying explosive devices to Iraqi Shiites who are killing U.S. troops. Proof was laid out on a table: Iranian-made weapons and copies of false identity cards found on captured agents said to be members of the Quds Force of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards.

"The Quds Force," a senior defense analyst then explained, "on paper reports to the IRGC, the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps. In reality, they really report directly to the supreme leader," Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. "So the activities that the IRGC Quds Force are conducting in Iraq, we assess, are coming from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

(Although the briefer emphasized that he was referring to Khamenei and not to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Bush cited the Iranian president at yesterday's news conference. "Whether Ahmadinejad ordered the Quds Force to do this, I don't think we know," he said.) The briefer's comments Sunday shifted the focus of a lengthy presentation that had been planned for more than a month. Several media accounts Monday morning noted that no proof had been offered for the "highest levels" charge. "The process fumbled what should be an easy story to tell," one administration official said ruefully.

Controversy grew Monday over reports that the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, had told reporters in Australia that while he knew the weapons were Iranian-made, "I would not say by what I know that the Iranian government clearly knows or is complicit."

Frantic telephone calls from Washington to Pace's traveling party ensued. Snow and his counterpart at the State Department, Sean McCormack, were pummeled in daily briefings and directed questions to the Pentagon.

On Tuesday, even as Snow told reporters in Washington he had spoken with Pace and they were on the same page, the general reiterated his view. The discovery of the explosives, Pace said during a news conference in Jakarta, "could not translate to the Iranian government per se is directly involved in doing this."

At another contentious White House briefing, Snow said that he would "push all evidentiary questions to the DNI" -- the director of national intelligence.

The intelligence community, still licking its wounds over faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq, displayed an air of "I told you so" this week and insisted that the Baghdad briefers had gone beyond vetted information.

A senior intelligence official Tuesday offered carefully parsed written guidance he said had been provided to the briefers in Baghdad. "The Qods Force -- a special element of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard . . . -- is involved in providing lethal support to select groups of Shia militants in Iraq. Based on our understanding of the Iranian system and the history of IRGC operations, the IC [intelligence community] assesses that activity this extensive on the part of the Qods Force would not be conducted without approval from top leaders in Iran."

The distinction was important, the official said. The Baghdad briefer's verbal use of "highest levels" went beyond what the intelligence community had suggested. The "top officials" wording, the official said, better reflected administration knowledge.

In Baghdad yesterday, a U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, tried to clarify, saying the intent of the news conference was not to talk about who had authorized Iranian arms shipments: "This is about the fact that American forces . . . are being killed by munitions and weaponry that are being produced in Iran."

A Man Of Many Beliefs Gives A News Conference With Few Answers (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

President Bush must have heard that National Public Radio was reviving the 1950s program "This I Believe," because his news conference yesterday sounded like an audition.

On Iran: "I believe Iran is an unbelievably vital nation."

On his Iraq plan: "I believe that success in Baghdad will have success in helping us secure the homeland."

On his Middle East policy: "I believe it's going to yield the peace that we all want."

On the North Korea agreement: "I believe it's an important step in the right direction."

On immigration: "I strongly believe that we need to enforce our borders."

Bush has always supported a faith-based initiative, but his recitation of beliefs in the East Room yesterday -- he listed no fewer than 18 principles he holds to be true -- sounded less like a question-and-answer session than a reading of the Nicene Creed. The only thing the president did not believe in was answering the questions he was asked.

When ABC News's Martha Raddatz asked whether he shares the intelligence community's view that Iraq is in a civil war, the Great Believer grew suddenly agnostic. "We've got people on the ground who don't believe it's a civil war," he dodged.

"Do you believe it's a civil war, sir?" Raddatz pressed.

"It's hard for me, you know, living in this beautiful White House, to give you a firsthand assessment," he punted.

The Post's Peter Baker asked about three members of Bush's administration who leaked the identity of a CIA officer; Bush had promised to fire anybody who did.

"I'm not going to talk about it --," Bush said before the question was finished. "I'm not going to talk about any of it."

"They're not under investigation, though," Baker pointed out.

"Peter," Bush said, reproachfully. "I'm not going to talk about any of it."

Baker asked whether Bush might offer pardons in the case. Bush arched his eyebrows and said, as if handling a recalcitrant child: "Not going to talk about it, Peter."

The president even announced that he was not going to answer a question he hadn't been asked. ABC's Ann Compton asked about possible briefings on Iraq for presidential candidates. "I thought for a minute you were going to try to get me to comment on the presidential race," Bush said. "I will resist all temptation to become the pundit in chief." He must have liked the pundit-in-chief line, because he repeated it twice more.

The president seemed petulant in his refusal to answer questions; he was, after all, the one who summoned reporters to the White House for the purpose of questioning him. Probably, it was the tone of the questions that set him off: While Bush freely voiced his beliefs, the reporters seemed disinclined to accept his statements of faith.

Steve Holland of Reuter asked about Iranian weapons in Iraq. "What makes you so certain that the highest levels of Tehran's government is responsible?"

Bush admitted he doesn't know "whether or not the head leaders of Iran" were involved. "But here's my point: Either they knew or didn't know."

NBC's David Gregory wasn't buying. "Critics say that you are using the same quality of intelligence about Iran that you used to make the case for war in Iraq," he noted.

Bush said he is "confident" Iran's Quds force was involved in sending weapons to Iraq.

But CNN's Ed Henry still didn't share Bush's confidence. "What assurances can you give the American people that the intelligence this time will be accurate?" he asked.

"Ed," Bush vouched, "we know they're there."

The skepticism about Bush's beliefs was not confined to Iran. The AP's Terry Hunt asked Bush whether the increasingly autocratic Russian president is "the same Vladimir Putin whose soul you looked into and found to be trustworthy."

Bush acknowledged that "it's a complicated relationship."

The president's discomfort was evident in his verbal tics. Asked about Iran, he stated that "we have a comprehensive strategy to deal with Iraq." Eleven times he used the phrase "in other words" to magnify his points ("Money trumps peace sometimes; in other words, commercial interests are very powerful").

Ultimately, Bush found it more comfortable to ask the reporters questions. CBS's Jim Axelrod dropped his BlackBerry. "You dropped?" the commander in chief asked. NBC's Gregory consulted his watch. "What are you looking at?" the president inquired. "Checking the time?"

Late in the hour-long session, he turned to White House reporter Mike Allen, who had just started his sixth job in a decade, joining a Capitol Hill newspaper and Web site.

"Michael, who do you work for?" Bush needled.

"Mr. President, I work for Politico.com," Allen reported.

"Pardon me? Politico.com?"

"Yes, sir -- today," Allen quipped.

"You want a moment to explain to the American people exactly what --"

Allen did not. "Thank you for the question," he demurred.

"Quit being so evasive," Bush said.

Bush Sends Ambiguous Signals About His Intentions On Iran (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush on Wednesday accused Iran of contributing to American deaths in Iraq and said, "I intend to do something about it." But he insisted that he isn't looking for another war in the Middle East.

Bush also acknowledged that he doesn't know whether Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad or other top Iranian officials have authorized the shipment of roadside bombs to Iraq. The sophisticated munitions, known as "explosively formed penetrators," are one of the deadliest weapons that Iraqi insurgents use.

Bush outlined the circumstantial evidence against Iran at a White House news conference dominated by questions on Iraq. He defended his handling of the war as about a dozen House Republicans spoke out against his plan for more troops.

The president's recent focus on Iranian involvement in Iraq has raised new concerns that the Iraq conflict could spread.

"When we find the networks that are enabling these weapons to end up in Iraq, we will deal with them. If we find agents who are moving these devices into Iraq, we will deal with them," Bush said. "We're going to do something about it, pure and simple."

U.S. officials have been trying for days to tamp down fears of war with Iran even as they pressure Tehran to behave, but Bush's comments left some ambiguity about his intentions. Although he said he favors a peaceful resolution and isn't trying to provoke Iran, he didn't rule out military action.

He also seemed to shrug off the lack of evidence tying top Iranian officials to the weapons shipments. Bush said the munitions were sent to Iraq by the Quds Force, an elite unit with close ties to the top levels of the Iranian government.

"What's worse, that the government knew or that the government didn't know?" Bush asked. "Whether Ahmadinejad ordered the Quds Force to do this, I don't think we know. But we know that they're there."

Bush held his first news conference of the year as lawmakers in the House of Representatives debated a nonbinding resolution denouncing his plans to send more troops to Iraq. The president said lawmakers "have every right" to criticize his strategy as long as they continue to fund it.

Backers of the resolution opposing the troop increase predict that roughly two dozen House Republicans will support the measure when it comes to a vote on Friday. Virtually all Democrats support it, ensuring its passage.

"Interjecting more young American troops into the crosshairs of an Iraqi civil war is simply not the right approach," said Rep. Ric Keller, R-Fla.

Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C., took issue with suggestions that lawmakers who oppose Bush favor a cut-and-run strategy.

"If we had removed Saddam (Hussein), which most Iraqis wanted, and then withdrew four or five weeks later, or even four or five months later, that would have constituted cutting and running. But we've been there four years. The time has come, in my opinion, for the baton to be handed to the Iraqis."

With the resolution headed for passage, Bush focused his attention on the next flash point - his request for another $174 billion to fund the war through 2008. The additional funding would push the war's total cost to more than $500 billion.

Congress will consider the next installment for Iraq next month when it takes up Bush's request for $99.6 billion in emergency funding for Iraq and Afghanistan. The rest of the Iraq money is in the president's proposed 2008 budget, which probably won't face votes until summer.

While Bush seemed resigned to the likelihood of a rhetorical rebuke from the House, he warned against any effort to restrict war funding. Congressional Democrats, under pressure from anti-war activists to stand up to the White House, have said that funding restrictions could be the next step.

"They have every right to express their opinion. ... I think you can be against my decision and support the troops, absolutely. But the proof will be whether or not you provide them the money necessary," Bush said.

On another topic, Bush hailed the new agreement with North Korea as a vital step toward dismantling its nuclear weapons program. The Tuesday agreement calls on North Korea to abandon its nuclear programs in return for economic assistance.

Turning to domestic politics, Bush said he is "intrigued" by the 2008 presidential campaign, but he issued a blanket "no comment" on the candidates vying to succeed him.

"I'd just like to establish some ground rules here with those of you who are stuck following me for the next little less than two years: I will resist all temptation to become the pundit-in-chief," he said.

Clinton Warns Bush About Action In Iran (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, February 15, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton warned President Bush on Wednesday not to take any military action against Iran without getting congressional approval first.

DOJ_NMG_0132558

"If the administration believes that any, any use of force against Iran is necessary, the president must come to Congress to seek that authority," Clinton said in a Senate speech.

Clinton, a member of the Armed Services Committee, voted in 2002 to give Bush the authority to use military force in Iraq — a vote that has prompted some Democrats to demand that she repudiate.

Since then, the New York senator has become an outspoken critic of Bush's handling of the war. She said the new Democratic Congress must not let him make similar mistakes in the increasingly tense relationship with Iran.

"It would be a mistake of historical proportion if the administration thought that the 2002 resolution authorizing force against Iraq was a blank check for the use of force against Iran without further congressional authorization," Clinton said.

She also insisted the resolution authorizing force against those responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks did not allow for U.S. action now against Iran.

Clinton, who has come under fire from anti-war Democrats, excoriated the previous Republican-controlled Congress for not questioning the administration over the past six years.

"We continue to experience the consequences of unchecked presidential action," she said, later adding: "This president was allowed for too long to commit blunder after blunder under cover of darkness provided by an allied Republican Congress."

Clinton spoke shortly after President Bush said he was certain the Iranian government is supplying deadly weapons used by fighters in Iraq against U.S. troops, even if he can't prove that the orders came from top Iranian leaders.

"I'm going to do something about it," Bush pledged, displaying apparent irritation at being repeatedly asked about mixed administration signals on who was behind the weaponry. He said the United States is pursuing diplomatic solutions with Iran about its nuclear program and said he was not seeking a pretext for war.

U.S. officials have said that Iran is behind attacks against troops in Iraq, an assertion denied by Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Iran Eyeing North Korean Model (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

TEHRAN, Iran -- Iran is quietly accelerating efforts to negotiate a deal on its nuclear program, using this week's agreement to freeze North Korea's program as a model.

In this week's pact, the Bush administration signed a deal that provides significant incentives to North Korea even before that country completely stepped back from its nuclear weapons program. The administration's willingness to do that seems likely to harden Iran's demands that it, too, should receive tangible benefits as part of any agreement, analysts here say.

Those benefits could include guarantees for the security of Iran's government, an end to years of economic sanctions and the right to continue developing modern, peaceful nuclear technology.

At the same time, some hard-liners in Iran appear to want to use North Korea's example as an opportunity to toughen Iran's demands in the expectation that the U.S. will eventually be obligated to meet them.

Some U.S. conservatives have criticized the deal with North Korea, predicting it would encourage Iran and other nations that are considering nuclear programs. In a news conference Wednesday, President Bush dismissed such criticism by his former U.N. ambassador, John R. Bolton.

"I strongly disagree. Strongly disagree with his assessment," Bush said. "I have told the American people, like the Iranian issue, I wanted to solve the Korean issue -- North Korean issue -- peacefully, and that the president has an obligation to try all diplomatic means necessary to do so."

"So the assessment made by some that this is not a good deal is just flat wrong."

But the debate here now appears to focus on how hard Iran should push for favorable terms. "The hard-liners, perhaps impressed by North Korea's achievement, are now inclined to be more resilient and more uncompromising," Sadegh Zibakalam, professor of politics at Tehran University, said Wednesday.

"They say if North Korea could do it, why shouldn't we? Why should we let the United States dictate to us, rather than negotiate with us?"

Until this week's pact, U.S. officials had insisted that North Korea dismantle all its nuclear programs and fully disarm before any deal could be reached. But in the end, North Korea agreed only to begin disabling its nuclear facilities in exchange for about $400 million in aid and other incentives. For now, the North Koreans will keep the nuclear material they already have, which U.S. officials believe is enough to make 8 to 10 bombs.

North Korea's situation is different from Iran's in several respects. North Korea has built and tested a nuclear bomb. Iran insists its program is strictly for civilian power generation. While U.S. and other international leaders doubt that Iranian claim, most intelligence officials believe Iran is at least two years away from being able to build a nuclear weapon.

A U.N. Security Council resolution passed in December with strong backing from the U.S. demands a full halt to Iran's uranium-enrichment activities.

Iran has signaled it might be willing to compromise on enrichment, either by limiting it, temporarily suspending it, or operating its centrifuges for a time with an inert gas, rather than uranium. Iranian negotiators insist real movement can be achieved only through open negotiations without preconditions.

But while hard-liners believe Iran can tough it out against the U.S., a broad range of the political elite in Iran is now behind an effort by Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, to reach a compromise.

"This scenario has been at the back of the minds of some Iranian leaders: that if we reach a stage that we would be respected as an equal partner, then we could do real negotiations and reach a deal over our nuclear program," Zibakalam said.

A source familiar with the negotiations said Iran has a four-part package that includes security guarantees, continued access to nuclear technology, and certain "political and economic" guarantees.

Nonproliferation experts suggested that these would include a demand for dropping the U.N. sanctions and possibly the unilateral sanctions which the U.S. has had in place against Iran since shortly after the 1979 Islamic revolution.

In an interview Wednesday, Mohammad Kazem Anbarlouee, head of a conservative Islamic faction in the parliament and editor of Resalat, a hard-line newspaper, said Iran must also insist on return of $19 billion in Iranian funds intended for purchase of U.S. weapons during the Shah's regime and never returned after the revolution.

"We don't have any conditions right now, and we don't accept any preconditions. Because everything they asked us, we met. For example, they asked us to suspend our activities, we did that (in the past). They asked us for U.N. supervision and visits, and we accepted this. We have nothing left. So Mr. Larijani will have some suggestions, not conditions," Anbarlouee said.

"If they have some conditions, for example, about giving them some guarantees about not having nuclear weapons, they can tell us that. But if they want to ask us to suspend our nuclear activities for peaceful purposes, no, we are not ready for that," he said.

Car Bomb In Iran Destroys A Bus Carrying Revolutionary Guards (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 14 — A car loaded with explosives blew up on Wednesday in front of a bus carrying members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards in the southeastern city of Zahedan, killing at least 11 people and wounding 34 others, the state news media reported.

The governor of Zahedan, Hassan Ali Nouri, told state-run television that the car exploded at 6:37 a.m. as the bus taking members of the Revolutionary Guards to work approached.

One official told the ISNA news agency that six people had been arrested.

The explosion was the largest in this troubled region along the Afghan and Pakistani borders since last March, when an attack on a convoy in the same province, Sistan-Baluchistan, killed 22 officials.

In December 2005, a car carrying President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was ambushed when he was on a visit in the same province. The attack, near the city of Zabol, killed one of his bodyguards and wounded another. Further details of that attack have not been disclosed.

The semiofficial Fars news agency reported that a Baluchi group opposed to the government, the Jondollah Organization of Iran, claimed responsibility for the attack on Wednesday.

Hossein Ali Shahriari, the representative from Zahedan in Parliament, said the attack had been carried out by "insurgents and smugglers who are led by the world imperialism," a common reference to the United States and Britain. Iranian officials have repeatedly accused the United States and Britain of provoking ethnic unrest in Iran and of supporting opposition groups.

Zahedan, the capital of Sistan-Baluchistan, is home to many ethnic Baluchis, who are Sunni Muslims. A majority of Iranians are Shiites.

The region has also been a major gateway for drug traffickers from Pakistan and Afghanistan. Iran has built a security trench at the border, but says more than 3,300 security force members have died in fighting drug smugglers since the country's Islamic revolution in 1979.

There has been increasing unrest in the province in the past year. The Baluchis accuse the government of discriminatory and repressive policies.

Iran has said that Jondollah and its leader, Abdolmalek Rigi, have ties to Al Qaeda and drug traffickers. However, the group denied the accusation in a letter that was published in the newspaper The Guardian in Britain in October.

Jondollah claimed responsibility for the attack last March that killed the 22 officials and wounded six others. The group has also claimed responsibility for kidnapping soldiers in the province.

The government has stepped up punishing those behind ethnic unrest. ISNA reported that two men accused of kidnapping and hostage-taking were hanged in Zahedan last June.

Bush To Congress: Give New Iraq Strategy A Chance To Work (CHIT)

By Mark Silva And Aamer Madhani

Chicago Tribune, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, facing a congressional vote of protest over his escalation of military force in Iraq, confronted a growing challenge to his presidency with complaints Wednesday that members of Congress are pressing for a symbolic vote without allowing his new strategy a chance to restore security inside Iraq.

As an emotional floor debate played out on Capitol Hill, the president cautioned Congress that whatever non-binding resolution is adopted, lawmakers must not jeopardize any of the added money that he is seeking for the support of the war effort—an additional $100 billion this year for war in Iraq and Afghanistan, plus a further $145 billion next year.

"People are prejudging the outcome of this," Bush said of a House resolution opposing his deployment of 21,500 additional troops. "My hope, however, is that this non-binding resolution doesn't try to turn into a binding policy that prevents our troops from doing that which I have asked them to do."

Ex-admiral: 'A bad military bet'

On the House floor, in the second day of a marathon debate, Rep. Joe Sestak (D-Pa.), a retired Navy admiral who is sponsor of a binding measure calling for redeployment of most troops by the end of the year, called Iraq a "tragic misadventure."

"My experience says don't double-down on a bad military bet," Sestak said.

The president, confronting the non-binding resolution of the Democratic-led House as a fait accompli, employed the forum of an East Room White House news conference—his first of the year—to lay down his marker before the House vote, expected Friday.

The Senate, meanwhile, is torn over its own vote on a war resolution, offering the president an uncertain moment when yet another plea for patience with the nearly 4-year-old war could buy his newest security strategy some time.

"I find it interesting that there is a declaration about a plan that they have not given a chance to work," said Bush, suggesting that members of Congress as well as candidates for the presidency in 2008 can debate it all they want, but "what really is going to matter is what happens, ultimately," in Iraq.

Yet what happens in Washington is of equal concern to the White House, which won congressional authorization for the use of military force in Iraq in 2002 and now is seeking to avert any binding congressional vote that could restrict war funding.

William Howell, a political scientist at the University of Chicago and co-author of a book on congressional limits on presidential war powers, said: "If this latest surge doesn't succeed and the president continues to push the way he is pushing … I think it's quite likely that we'll see a real showdown, where there will be discussions about cutting funding, setting caps."

Democrats are maneuvering to attach language to a bill limiting future deployments or perhaps even bringing troops home. Separately, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has filed a bill calling for an immediate troop cap and for redeployment of combat forces by spring 2008.

Some insist that any troop cap is unconstitutional.

David Rivkin Jr., a constitutional law expert who served in the Justice Department under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, maintains that the commander in chief holds a unique responsibility and that capping the number of troops that he has deployed is tantamount to "emasculating" the executive branch.

"If you take it to its logical conclusion, a well-crafted appropriations bill with enough conditions can pretty much tell the president what to do from early morning until late night, and there is nothing left for him to exercise any discretion," Rivkin said.

While this week's symbolic debate could be a precursor to a fight over Bush's war spending request, some are warning the House against a retreat. Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.), recalled the U.S. withdrawal from Lebanon precipitated by the 1983 suicide bombing of a Marines barrack that left 241 military personnel dead, and the lack of action following the Battle of Mogadishu in 1993 in which 18 U.S. service members were killed.

Still others complain of empty symbolism. Rep. Jim Marshall (D-Ga.), a Vietnam veteran who has long called for drawing down the U.S. military presence in Iraq, said he would not support the resolution because it amounts to sitting out when disagreeing with a coach's calls.

The president also has asserted that an agency of the Iranian government is supplying weaponry being used against U.S. forces inside Iraq—while brushing aside questions about the quality of intelligence about Iraq's own weaponry that was invoked as cause for the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

"The idea that somehow we're manufacturing the idea that the Iranians are providing [weapons] is preposterous," he said.

The only question, Bush said, is how much the leaders of the Iranian government know about what is going on.

"I can't say it more plainly," Bush said after repeated questions about the reliability of U.S. intelligence. "There are weapons in Iraq that are harming U.S. troops because of the Quds force. …

"Whether [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad ordered the Quds force to do this, I don't think we know," he said, calling it irrelevant.

Bush insisted this will not require direct conflict with Iran.

While the House debates, the troop deployment is under way.

Those troops "will be arriving on time," the president vowed, having just spoken with Gen. David Petraeus, the new American commander in Iraq, who assured him that the new security plan that Bush announced in January is "beginning to take shape."

That plan involves an additional 17,500 U.S. soldiers embedded with Iraqi-commanded units in Baghdad in a bid to gain control over sectarian violence as well as the deployment of 4,000 additional Marines in western Anbar province.

Asked about a recent National Intelligence Estimate reporting that some of the conflicts in Iraq amount to civil war, Bush avoided use of the term.

"It's hard for me, living in this beautiful White House, to give you an assessment, firsthand assessment. I haven't been there," said Bush, who has visited Baghdad's Green Zone, headquarters for U.S. military and the Iraqi government, and the Baghdad airport but has not traveled beyond.

12 Republicans Break Ranks On Iraq Resolution (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — A dozen Republicans arrived in the House chamber on Wednesday to set aside their party allegiances and lend their names to a resolution intended to rebuke President Bush for his Iraq policy.

Representative Howard Coble of North Carolina said that Iraqis had their chance at freedom, but chose civil war. Representative Steven C. LaTourette of Ohio argued that troop buildup was a tactic that had already failed. And Representative John J. Duncan Jr. of Tennessee suggested that military contractors had profited mightily at the expense of the American treasury.

As they spoke in the capital on the second day of an extensive debate over the Iraq war, Mr. Bush called a White House news conference to defend his plan to send more troops to Baghdad. He said that there would be more violence, but that the plan would provide breathing space to the Iraqi government as it worked to stabilize the country.

“They have every right to express their opinion,” Mr. Bush said of the debate in Congress. Yet he warned lawmakers against taking additional steps to limit war financing when they considered his military budget request next month, saying, “They need to fund our troops.”

Democratic leaders, even as they condemn the president’s Iraq strategy, have vowed not to cut financing for the troops already in Iraq. But pressure is increasing inside the party for more scrutiny on war spending when the administration’s military budget request is considered by Congress next month.

The proceedings on Capitol Hill foreshadowed challenges to come in both parties as Republicans seek to persuade fiscal conservatives to invest more money in the war and as Democrats determine whether they intend to take a stand to limit financing of the war.

“I insist that we do not maintain an eternal presence in Iraq,” Mr. Coble said, “if for no other reason than the cost to taxpayers, which has been astronomically unbelievable.”

Congressional debate this week is largely revolving around a resolution intended to express support for troops and oppose the president’s plan to expand the military operation in Iraq. Even though most Republicans oppose the proposal, the testimony from a handful of Republicans on Wednesday suggested that the deliberations were no longer unfolding along partisan lines.

Representative Walter B. Jones of North Carolina opened the debate on Wednesday by reading a newspaper clipping from before Mr. Bush was elected. It was 1999, and the topic was a Congressional debate over military escalation in Bosnia, which Republicans sought to quash by sending a nonbinding resolution to President Clinton.

Holding a sheet of paper, Mr. Jones quoted Karen Hughes, a chief adviser to Mr. Bush, who declared, "If we're going to commit more troops, we want to be sure they have a clear exit strategy." The message, Mr. Jones argued, could apply to the current Iraq debate.

For a time on Wednesday, an unusual scene played out on the House floor, with some Republicans coming forward one by one to speak against the Iraq policy while fellow party members argued against them.

"We need to tell all these defense contractors that the time for this Iraqi gravy train, with their obscene profits, is over," said Mr. Duncan, the congressman from Tennessee. "It is certainly no criticism of our troops to say that this was a very unnecessary war. This war went against every conservative position I have ever known."

Representative Ric Keller, a Florida Republican who said he was simply passing along common-sense advice from his constituents, compared the Iraqi government to an ungrateful next-door neighbor.

"Imagine your next-door neighbor refuses to mow his lawn and the weeds are all the way up to his waist, so you decide you're going to mow his lawn for him every single week," Mr. Keller said. "The neighbor never says thank you, he hates you and sometimes he takes out a gun and shoots you. Under these circumstances, do you keep mowing his lawn for ever?

"Do you send even more of your family members over to mow his lawn?" he added. "Or do you say to that neighbor, you better step it up and mow your own lawn or there's going to be serious consequences for you."

A majority of House Republicans have assertively defended the administration during the Iraq debate, accusing their Democratic rivals of being a weak link in the fight against terrorism. Those accusations seemed to soften a bit on Wednesday, when suddenly the person on the other side of the argument was another Republican.

Representative Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican, said she opposed the troop increase in Iraq but declined to support the resolution. She infuriated Democrats when she hinted that their party was considering plans to limit war financing.

"What about the five brigades of young Americans who are now preparing their families and packing their gear to deploy?" Ms. Wilson said. "What about them? What are you saying to them? Will we buy body armor for them? Will we have armored Humvees for them?"

Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic majority leader, rushed to the House chamber and delivered a sharp rebuttal to Ms. Wilson. "If the commander in chief has sent them there, we will support them," he said.

The House is scheduled to conclude the debate Friday. The Senate intends to consider a similar resolution when it returns from next week's Congressional recess. Republican Senators Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine urged Senate leaders late Wednesday to cancel the recess so the Iraq debate could proceed.

Earlier this month, when the Senate had intended to take up an Iraq resolution, a procedural and political stalemate stymied debate. As deliberations stretched on into the night, the themes of the debate carried a familiar ring as each member of Congress was given at least five minutes to speak. Nearly every Democratic speaker rose to assail Mr. Bush, while Republicans came to his aid. Even Mr. Coble, who delivered one of the day's most stinging assessments of the administration's Iraq policy, said he liked Mr. Bush.

"Some Americans — and some in this body — oppose the Iraqi operation because they dislike President Bush," Mr. Coble said. "I, however, do not march to that drum. I am personally very high on President Bush, but on the matter of troop escalation, I am not in agreement."

Troops Sweep 3 Shiite Areas In Baghdad Push (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 14 — Thousands of American troops in armored Stryker vehicles swarmed three mostly Shiite neighborhoods of northeastern Baghdad on Wednesday, encountering little resistance during what commanders described as the first major sweep of the new security plan for the capital.

The push into the neighborhoods of Shaab, Bayda and Ur, on the northern edge of Sadr City, came a day after the top Iraqi general claimed broad powers to search, detain and move residents from their homes. But even though an Iraqi announced the new phase of the security plan, it was clearly an American-led operation: only 200 Iraqi police officers and soldiers were involved, commanders said, working alongside about 2,500 Americans.

Col. Steve Townsend, commander of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, said the operation in northeastern Baghdad had been pushed up a day because of a request from Iraq's Shiite-led government.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has received blistering criticism for what some Iraqis have described as dangerous delays in setting the plan in motion. On Wednesday, he seemed determined to show some sign of action, even if the relatively low number of Iraqi troops involved was likely to add to concerns about the government's ability to provide the troops it has promised.

"We've started a new phase today, the phase of building the state on the basis of two ideas," he said at a news conference in the southern city of Karbala. "The basis of reconciliation — to include all those who want to support the country — and the basis of striking hard at those who want to rebel."

At the White House, President Bush said that the new plan, fueled by the addition of more American troops, was "beginning to take shape" and that the goal was "relative peace," though he did not refer to any specific operations. But he warned against high expectations.

"I say relative peace," he said, "because if it's, like, zero car bombings, it never will happen that way."

Although the sweep in the three Shiite neighborhoods on Wednesday was the biggest operation in the capital, other efforts were felt across the city. Armored vehicles were set up on the border of Sadr City and Ur. Jets thundered overhead for much of the day and night.

In the southeastern neighborhood of Dora, two airstrikes killed 15 suspected insurgents as they defended a building and tried to set roadside bombs, the United States military said in a statement. To the northeast, in the Sunni enclave of Adhamiya, American troops arrested a suspected Sunni insurgent leader and searched house to house for weapons, military officials said.

The military said that four soldiers died of wounds during combat operations in Diyala Province, and that another soldier died Wednesday after being attacked by small-arms fire a day earlier while patrolling an area north of Baghdad. A soldier died Tuesday in a noncombat-related incident that the military said it was still investigating.

In Baghdad, traffic also snarled more than usual as Iraqi forces narrowed wide boulevards and bridges into a trickle, searching trunks and climbing aboard trucks for searches.

Bombs, mortar shells and gunfights left at least eight people dead across the city — fewer than most days since the security plan was announced a month ago.

For some Iraqis in Ur and in other neighborhoods searched in recent days, the question was whether such gains could last. The current security plan is the third major effort to bring peace to Baghdad, and in each case, initial progress was supplanted with a return to chaos.

"If the Americans keep doing it, they can make a difference," said Ali Muhammad, 37, an ice cream shop owner who lives in Ur. "But they have to stay. Otherwise it will never work."

The sweep through Shaab, Ur and Bayda began at dawn with three battalions of American troops from the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, part of the Second Infantry Division, and a fourth battalion from the Second Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division.

Despite the low number of Iraqi troops and security forces on Wednesday, Colonel Townsend said that more Iraqis would eventually flow into the area. "You've got to remember that our surge plans are ahead of the Iraqis'," he said. "The Iraqis are still getting set."

In Ur, as the sun rose, American troops clustered on corners in 19-ton armored Stryker vehicles. Soldiers poured out of the vehicles, knocking on doors and searching empty lots and two- to three-story brick homes. Gunmen from the Mahdi Army, the pervasive Shiite militia that claims loyalty to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr, were believed to have made the area a base of operations. But residents said most of the fighters left several days ago; some of their leaders are thought to have fled to Iran, and the American government and military say Mr. Sadr has done so, as well.

About 7 a.m., one company of troops from the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team reached a two-story warehouse in eastern Ur, near the border with Sadr City, and found three empty, rusted missile launchers that were more than 10 feet tall. The soldiers determined that they had not been used in a very long time, and no missiles were found.

The only sign of enemy contact on Wednesday morning came later, when an explosion blew out a few tires on one squad's vehicle.

"The information we had was that Moktada al-Sadr told all the JAM folks to lay low and not resist," said Colonel Townsend, using a common acronym for Jaish al-Mahdi, Arabic for the Mahdi Army. "And so far we're not really seeing much resistance."

Maj. Jesse Pearson, a battalion operations officer in the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, said the militia seemed uninterested in fighting. Echoing the view of many Iraqi officials, he said: "They are taking the strategic view, which is smart. They can wait us out."

The goal in Ur and the other areas has been laid out for weeks: flush out the militias, confiscate weapons and then set up small security precincts in the heart of the neighborhood where American soldiers and Iraqi security forces can live and work together. At least six of these so-called joint security sites have already been established in the mostly Sunni areas of western Baghdad.

But for the people of Ur, it was still not clear whether the new neighborhood bases would be enough to distinguish the current plan from past operations that failed to stanch the city's relentless violence.

Late Wednesday morning, Major Pearson's battalion commander, Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, met with a former Iraqi Army officer, a Shiite who said he was worried about the loyalties of the Iraqi security forces. As an American helicopter gunship thundered overhead, the former officer said that many of the Iraqi policemen were criminals.

"You really don't know what's inside them," he said.

At the border of Shaab and Ur, American troops encountered a warmer reception. Some residents in both areas seemed hopeful. Mustafa Jasim, 27, a Sunni, said that the idea of bases in the neighborhood convinced him that the Americans would not leave immediately. "With them here, now I can feel safe," he said.

American officers and soldiers described the Iraqi security forces, or I.S.F., as eager, even brave. But they acknowledged that full competence would be harder for them to achieve.

"The challenge we have is getting the I.S.F. to the point that when we de-surge, we can get the I.S.F. to where they can do the job on their own," Colonel Smiley said.

But other soldiers, like Staff Sgt. Kenley Beazer, 35, worried about what would happen when the Iraqis were in charge. "As far taking over the whole city by themselves, it will never happen," Sergeant Beazer said. "They rely too much on U.S. forces. As soon as we pull out, I give it six months, then it goes back to as bad as it was before."

Bush: Redeployments To Iraq Don't Hurt Troop Morale (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Wednesday that he did not believe morale of troops in Iraq had declined because of repeated deployments to the war zone, saying his commanders on the ground would have informed him if any problems existed.

The issue of troop morale has bubbled up repeatedly during the debate on Capitol Hill over legislation that would criticize the administration's decision to increase troop levels in Iraq. Some backers of the Bush plan say any congressional resolution condemning the buildup would undermine morale.

The issue also emerged in surveys of active-duty troops, whose opinion of Bush's handling of the war has plummeted in the last year. Among military personnel, only 35% approved of Bush's handling of the war during 2006, down from 54% a year earlier, polls by the independent Military Times newspaper found.

But speaking at a White House news conference, Bush said that though commanders were concerned about how soldiers' families were bearing up under the strain of deployments that have seen soldiers in combat zones one year out of every two, no mention had been made of any problems within military units.

"What I hear from commanders is that the place where there is concern is with the family members," Bush said. "Our troops who have volunteered to serve the country are willing to go into combat multiple times, but [their] concern is with the people on the home front."

Asked whether those who opposed his buildup of troops were undermining morale, Bush said he did not believe so.

"I think you can be against my decision and support the troops, absolutely," Bush said. "Somebody who doesn't agree with my policy is just as patriotic a person as I am."

GOP Looks Beyond War Measure To Fight On Funding (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

With Republicans speaking out against President Bush's war policy on the House floor yesterday, GOP leaders and the White House conceded defeat on a resolution opposing sending additional U.S. troops to Iraq and began looking toward the coming battle over the war's funding.

On the second day of a four-day showdown over the nonbinding resolution, Democrats looked on as Republican dissidents denounced what they called Bush's ill-conceived plan to put 21,500 more combat troops in the middle of a sectarian civil war.

Some of the 11 Republicans who publicly broke with Bush were long-time opponents of the war, such as Reps. Walter B. Jones (N.C.) and Ron Paul (Tex.). But others, such as Reps. Fred Upton (Mich.) and Jim Ramstad (Minn.), had never sought the limelight and were almost apologetic in their speeches.

Rep. Ric Keller (Fla.), a reliable conservative vote, prefaced his statement with an affirmation of support for Bush personally. But, he said, a "surge" of troops had already been attempted in Baghdad. "The benefits were temporary," he said. "The body bags were permanent."

Those 11 could be just the tip of the iceberg. One Republican lawmaker close to the leadership, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said GOP leaders have 50 to 60 Republicans on their watch list, with between 40 and 60 expected to break with the White House tomorrow.

Even the president conceded yesterday that the House will deliver a bipartisan rebuke tomorrow, when it votes on a resolution opposing the deployment of additional troops to Iraq, while affirming Congress's support for "the members of the United States Armed Forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq." But, he warned, Congress must not meddle with the funds needed to support those troops.

"I think you can be against my decision and support the troops, absolutely. But the proof will be whether or not you provide them the money necessary to do the mission," he said at a White House news conference.

Republicans think the funding debate will unite their party and expose deep fissures among the Democrats, some of whom want immediate action to deny funding to the war effort. But Democratic leaders have rallied around a strategy that would fully fund the president's $100 billion request for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan but would limit his ability to use the money.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, will formally outline the Democrats' plan today to antiwar groups agitating for binding action against the war. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a subcommittee member who helped arrange the Internet event, said the plan is aimed at tamping down calls from the Democrats' liberal wing for Congress to simply end funding for the war.

The Murtha plan, based on existing military guidelines, includes a stipulation that Army troops who have already served in Iraq must be granted two years at home before an additional deployment, Marines must be given 14 months at home, and any troops sent to Iraq must be those deemed fully trained and equipped under existing military standards. The idea is to slowly choke off the war by stopping the deployment of troops from units that have been badly degraded by four years of combat.

"They won't be able to deploy troops unless they extend troops overseas. And if we limit the extension, then it'll be very difficult for them to continue this surge, which the American people are against and the Iraqis don't want," Murtha said yesterday on National Public Radio.

The Democrats also intend to shut down the military prisons at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and at Abu Ghraib near Baghdad by denying them funds, and to bar funds that would be used to establish permanent military bases in Iraq.

That is a fight Republicans appear to relish. Republicans continued to argue yesterday that the Democrats' nonbinding resolution would demoralize U.S. troops and embolden the enemy, and virtually every Republican speaking against the resolution added a warning that Democrats intend to "defund" the war.

"There is going to be a real battle some time in March over defunding our troops that are in harm's way or somehow shackling the military's ability to fight," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

When Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) charged that the resolution offers no support for troops not yet deployed to the battlefield, House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) showed just how sensitive Democrats are to the charge.

"No one ought to hide behind the troops. No one ought to come to this floor and say that this Congress, 435 of us, will not support whatever soldier or sailor or Marine is deployed to Iraq," Hoyer said angrily. "Whether it is today or tomorrow, they will have our support."

Republicans have been less successful at ruffling Democratic feathers over the issue at hand -- the deployment of additional troops. Republican leaders have put up an energetic rapid-response center to try to debunk Democratic arguments against Bush's war plan. Rank-and-file Republicans have met with national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, as well as representatives from the embassies of Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia. But GOP efforts to hold their lawmakers off the Democratic resolution appeared to falter yesterday.

As Bush conducted his news conference, the House floor was turning into a fratricidal showdown in a split-screen visual that even Republicans had to admire. "It was a good strategic move," one GOP lawmaker said.

"The resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq that we passed in fall of 2002 was never intended to authorize the use of American troops to police a civil war," Ramstad said.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) lamented that "these are purely political statements, and the debate we should be having is the most apolitical subject of all -- national security in a time of peril." He then announced that he will vote for the resolution.

In the Senate, meanwhile, Republicans Olympia J. Snowe (Maine) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.) threatened to block a planned week-long recess unless Democratic and Republican leaders first agree on terms for bringing to a vote a bipartisan resolution opposing the troop buildup.

11 More Republicans Get Behind Iraq Rebuke (LAT)

By Richard Simon And James Gerstenzang
The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a striking display of dissension, a group of Republican lawmakers broke ranks with the White House on Wednesday and embraced a resolution opposing more U.S. troops in Iraq — airing their criticism even as President Bush publicly defended his plan.

Bush questioned the message that expected House approval of the nonbinding resolution would send, saying at a news conference: "People are watching what happens here in America. The enemy listens to what's happening. The Iraqi people listen to the words…. They're wondering about our commitment to this cause."

Undaunted, 11 GOP lawmakers, including normally staunch Bush allies who represent districts he carried in his presidential campaigns, took to the House floor to express their support for a Democratic-sponsored resolution renouncing Bush's decision to add 21,500 troops to the roughly 135,000 already in Iraq.

The Republicans complained that the U.S. military finds itself in the middle of a civil war, that the Iraqis haven't done enough to make their country safe and that a "surge" in diplomacy — not troops — is needed.

"The Iraqis don't want us there," said Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.). "We're viewed as part of the problem, not the solution."

Rep. Ric Keller (R-Fla.) likened the U.S. mission in Iraq to dealing with a neighbor who refuses to mow his lawn.

"You mow his lawn for him every single week. The neighbor never says thank you, he hates you, and sometimes he takes out a gun and shoots at you," he said. "Under these circumstances, would you keep mowing his lawn forever?"

The House is scheduled to vote Friday on the resolution, which is likely to pass with virtually unanimous support from the chamber's 233 Democrats and backing from 20 to 30 — and perhaps more — of its 201 Republicans. What remains unclear is how many GOP war critics will get behind the next step in the debate — Democratic efforts to go beyond symbolic opposition to Bush's pursuit of his Iraq policy.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) is set today to announce a strategy for imposing limits on Bush's ability to carry out the troop increase.

Murtha, chairman of the appropriations defense subcommittee, is expected to propose tying funding for the deployment to requiring that every unit sent to Iraq meet strict readiness standards of training and equipment — standards often sidestepped now, at a time when the military has been stretched thin.

Murtha's proposal is aimed at countering Bush's build-up plan without exposing Democrats to accusations of undercutting troops in the field.

Also, Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) served notice that the administration's request for an additional $93 billion to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan would face tough scrutiny before his panel.

With the lion's share of the money slated for Iraq, Byrd said he feared the request "cements a policy of more of the same — more hunkering down, more forcing our troops to stay pinned in the middle of a civil war."

Bush has made little effort to influence the House's consideration of its nonbinding resolution, saying he planned to ignore it. But at his White House news conference, the president made clear he would more aggressively fight efforts to stymie his troop-increase plan.

"People are prejudging the outcome" of the new strategy, he complained. And Bush said he hoped the House's symbolic measure would not "turn into a binding policy that prevents our troops from doing what I have asked them to do."

As he has done continually in the face of growing U.S. discontent with the situation in Iraq, Bush warned that stepping back from the fight "would have disastrous consequences for our people in America."

"The Iraqi government would collapse; chaos would spread," he said. "There would be a vacuum. Into the vacuum would flow more extremists, more radicals, people who have stated intent to hurt our people."

But even as Bush spoke, the fractures within his own party over Iraq were spotlighted as the House engaged in a second, full day of debate on the resolution opposing his troop increase.

Unlike the first day, which featured Democrats pressing the case for the measure and Republicans decrying it, part of Wednesday's discussion featured GOP lawmakers arguing with one another. Although those lining up behind the measure represented a small fraction of the House's GOP caucus, their willingness to make their speeches reflected the rising anxiety within the party over the nearly 4-year-old war. It is a conflict that many GOP politicians single out as the main reason the party lost its majorities on Capitol Hill in November's election.

Nine of the 11 Republicans who criticized Bush's troop-buildup plan voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of military force against Iraq; the two dissenters were Reps. John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr. of Tennessee and Ron Paul of Texas.

Other Republican supporters of the resolution included Reps. Wayne T. Gilchrest of Maryland, a decorated Vietnam veteran, and Howard Coble of North Carolina, who represents a district Bush won with 69% of the vote in 2004.

"I am personally very high on President Bush, but on the matter of troop escalation, I am not in agreement," Coble said.

He added that mail and calls to his office are running 10 to 1 in support of his position.

DOJ_NMG_0132567

Rep. Upton said he decided to oppose Bush's plan after e-mailing soldiers he had met during visits to Iraq who told him that sending more troops would increase the threats to U.S. personnel.

The president's allies, while refraining from attacking their fellow Republicans, were just as passionate in their support for the new Iraq strategy. And they assailed the Democratic resolution for offering no alternative.

The measure "says only what some members are against; nothing about what we are for," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.).

Some Republicans who plan to vote against the resolution acknowledged mounting frustration over the situation in Iraq.

"Even those of us like me who will oppose [the measure] need to see results," Rep. Mary Bono of Palm Springs said.

The 53-member California delegation is expected to split along party lines on the resolution, with its 33 Democrats voting "yes" and its 19 Republicans voting "no."

Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for House Republican leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, said that regardless of the number of GOP lawmakers who support the resolution, the caucus "will stand firm" against any Democratic efforts to deny Bush troop funding.

"That's where you'll see a line drawn," Kennedy said.

As Wednesday's session wrapped up about midnight, roughly 200 House members had participated in the debate; each has been allotted five minutes to give their views.

Democrats Try To Stifle Calls To 'Defund' War (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Democratic leadership yesterday sought to quell voices within their own party who want to "defund" the war in Iraq, while Republicans said that is exactly what the majority party intends to do.

The House continued its three-day, 36-hour debate on a nonbinding resolution to oppose President Bush's plan to send more than 21,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq.

"Some assert that this resolution is a first step to defunding our troops in the field. This is categorically false," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat. "While the new majority will explore other opportunities to affect Iraq policy, our commitment to our men and women in harm's way is unwavering."

House Republicans accused Democrats of providing encouragement to the nation's terrorist enemies and emphasized statements from the more liberal anti-war wing of the Democratic Party that are at odds with the leadership's position.

Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, sent reporters a video montage of nine Democrats who, in various forms on Tuesday, called for a cutoff of funds for the war in Iraq.

"Congress must deny any more funds for the war," said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio.

"The real test for this Congress will be whether or not we continue to fund this war," said Rep. Maxine Waters of California, the founder and chairman of the Out of Iraq Congressional Caucus.

The Republican-produced video, available publicly at YouTube.com, ended with a warning: "Does anyone really believe Democrats don't plan to cut off funding for America's troops?"

Boehner spokesman Kevin Smith said Republicans will win the public opinion battle if Democrats cut off funds.

"The American people will not tolerate Democrats who attempt to undermine our troops when they are in harm's way," Mr. Smith said.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Mr. Hoyer reportedly are working with Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, on a plan to attach restrictions to supplemental appropriations for the Defense Department.

Mr. Murtha, chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, is exploring ways to restrict the use of funds allocated for troop increases. One measure would require combat training certification for all troops; another would require adequate equipment. Anti-war Democrats hope these criteria will hamstring deployment of more troops.

Mr. Murtha is set to announce his strategy in an interview with former Rep. Tom Andrews, Maine Democrat, at 11 a.m. today on MoveCongress.org, an anti-war Web site started by Mr. Andrews.

Mrs. Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, sent a letter to Mr. Bush yesterday demanding adequate equipment for U.S. troops.

"Mr. President, it is wrong to deploy troops to the Iraqi theater until they have the up-armored Humvees, equipment, lodging, training and other support required to carry out their mission. We hope you will work with us to make sure that they do," the letter said.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee plans to run ads against Republicans -- starting with Sens. John E. Sununu of New Hampshire and Gordon H. Smith of Oregon -- who have supported Mr. Bush and are vulnerable in the 2008 elections. The goal is to put indirect pressure on the White House to withdraw from Iraq.

Congress Has No Choice But To Act On Iraq (RC)

By Reps. Lynn Woolsey, Barbara Lee And Maxine Waters

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

As leaders of the Congressional Progressive Caucus and Out of Iraq Caucus, we are proud that the House has begun to take up the moral dilemma of our times — our continued military occupation of Iraq. Congress finally will have the opportunity to express its disapproval of President Bush's escalation plan, a flawed strategy piled on a 4-year-old failed policy.

By deepening our engagement, escalation will further stoke the fires of civil war in Iraq while increasing the cost to Americans in lives, limbs and treasure.

The political battle lines are clear: On one side we have a bipartisan Congressional majority, roughly two-thirds of the American people, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Iraq Study Group and former military leaders such as Colin Powell. On the other: an unpopular, lame-duck president; too many Congressional Republicans; and the editors of The Weekly Standard — all of whom are willing to accept more American casualties in the name of a policy that is making us less secure and damages our standing in the world.

Last month, in announcing his decision to raise the ante in Iraq, the president announced that "America's commitment is not open-ended." So we hold out hope that Friday's vote of no confidence will compel him to re-evaluate his Iraq policy and heed the calls of the American people. But if not, Congress must be prepared to go beyond nonbinding resolutions. We will not be content with a statement of disapproval that is limited to the escalation gambit. Continuing the current policy is unacceptable, as is escalating the war. Maintaining more than 130,000 brave Americans in Iraq as it plunges deeper into chaos and mayhem is simply unconscionable. If the president will not take steps to end this war, Congress must take responsible action.

Contrary to Republican claims that Democrats have no alternative plan for Iraq, there are in fact several on the table. Our own comprehensive bill, the Bring Our Troops Home and Sovereignty of Iraq Restoration Act, would complete a fully funded military withdrawal from Iraq within six months while ensuring that our troops and contractors leave safely and accelerate the training of Iraqi security forces.

In addition, our bill would remove the specter of an endless occupation by preventing the establishment of permanent military bases and reiterate our commitment, at the invitation of the Iraqi government, to working with the international community to assist Iraq in its reconstruction and reconciliation efforts. We also would stand ready, if asked by the Iraqis, to participate in an international stabilization force. Our bill also ensures health benefits for all of our military personnel.

House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) has indicated that he will hold hearings on various legislative proposals on Iraq, including our bill, next month. The nation certainly will benefit from a robust debate on alternatives to the president's failed stay-the-course policy.

It has been a long road from marginalization to the mainstream for those of us who oppose this war and always have. While the temptation of an extended "we told you so" is there, it is suffice to say that the anti-war position turned out to be the correct one. We are focused solely on bringing our troops home.

If the president doesn't change course, if he persists in his contempt for the electoral verdict rendered in November, then this week's resolution will be just the beginning. A bloody military entanglement that does not enjoy popular support is ultimately unsustainable, and Congress would be derelict if it did not assert its legitimate war powers as a coequal branch of government. Using our authority to challenge and even forestall the Iraq occupation is not only constitutionally appropriate; it is a moral imperative.

Reps. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.) and Barbara Lee (D-Calif.) co-chair the Congressional Progressive Caucus. Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.) chairs the Out of Iraq Caucus.

GOP Opposition To Bush Plan Forms (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 15, 2007

Breaking ranks, a small band of House Republicans declared their opposition to a troop buildup in Iraq on Wednesday, and President Bush appeared resigned to passage of a nonbinding measure disapproving of his decision.

"I'm going to make it very clear to the members of Congress, starting now, that they need to fund our troops," the president said, looking past this week's debate toward congressional action next month on his request for nearly $100 billion for the military.

Bush spoke at a White House news conference timed — coincidentally or not — for the hour that Republican critics of his war policies took their turn in a marathon debate on the House floor.

"I am personally very high on President Bush, but on the matter of troop escalation, I am not in agreement," said Republican Rep. Howard Coble of North Carolina.

"I insist that we do not maintain an eternal presence in Iraq, if for no other reason than the cost to the taxpayers, which has been astronomically unbelievable," he said. He also noted the war has cost more than 3,100 U.S. troops their lives.

Coble was one of fewer than a dozen Republicans to swing behind the measure. It declares that Congress "disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush ... to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

The 95-word measure adds that "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect the members of the United States armed forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq."

By early evening, only one Democrat, Rep. Jim Marshall of Georgia, had announced he would vote in opposition.

Approval is expected on Friday. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has announced plans to try for a vote on an identical bill in the next few weeks. Prospects there are uncertain because Republicans have said they will also demand a vote on an alternative measure that says Congress should neither cut nor eliminate funds for troops in the field.

Democrats took control of Congress after elections last fall that were shaped in large measure by public opposition to the war. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has described the nonbinding measure as the first step in a longer campaign to end U.S. participation in the nearly four-year-old conflict.

Several Democrats have said they favor cutting off money as a way to accomplish that, and Bush was eager to lay down a marker on that issue.

"They have every right to express their opinion, and it is a nonbinding resolution," he said of the measure before the House. But looking ahead, he added that Congress soon "is going to be able to vote on a piece of legislation that is binding, a bill providing emergency funding for our troops. ... We have a responsibility , all of us here in Washington, to make sure that our men and women in uniform have the resources and flexibility they need to prevail."

Pelosi and Reid sent Bush a letter citing reports the Army lacks enough advanced armored kits to protect all Humvees from roadside bombs. "In addition, we understand that existing shortages of trucks and other crucial equipment such as jamming devices, radios and other gear will only be exacerbated by the surge," they wrote.

The lawmakers raised the issue later with the president at a White House meeting. One aide suggested afterward that Bush's spending request could be rewritten to require that any troops deployed to Iraq be fully equipped.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who heads a House subcommittee that controls defense spending, has said he intends to require that any units headed to Iraq meet the Army's highest readiness level. Congress also could try to slow the deployment of additional troops by curtailing the Pentagon's practice of extending the duty tours of personnel who have reached the end of their scheduled time in the war zone.

Republican leaders predict that as many as two dozen or so GOP member could vote for the nonbinding repudiation of the troop increase. Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina led the GOP rebels during debate on the House floor.

Jones, a seventh-term lawmaker whose district includes the Marines' Camp Lejeune, said he had spoken out four years ago against the plan to invade Iraq. "I now regret that I did not more openly challenge those who were determined to invade a country whose actions were peripheral to the real threat, al-Qaida," he said.

"For young men and women who are brave enough to go into Iraq and Afghanistan, then we as members of Congress must be brave enough and informed to start a dialogue in Damascus, in Tehran, in the entire region to hasten peace," said Rep. Wayne Gilchrist, R-Md., calling for a diplomatic effort along the lines recommended by the Iraq Study Group that recently issued a gloomy report on the state of affairs in Iraq.

"I will support this resolution because I believe that the surge will be unsuccessful without a comprehensive, diplomatic strategy to engage the international community and turn responsibility over to the Iraqi government," added Rep. Mike Castle, R-Del.

In a criticism of House Democratic leaders, though, Castle quickly added he was disappointed they had denied lawmakers a chance to vote on an alternative measure drafted by Republicans.

The GOP leadership had sought a vote on a measure opposing any efforts to cut off money for the war. Democratic leaders initially said they would allow them to proceed. They changed their minds, though, in what Republicans said was an attempt to hide a deep divide on the money issue among Democrats.

Democrats did not deny that would have been the case. But they said Republicans will be able to put all lawmakers on record on the issue when the $100 billion military spending bill comes to the House in March.

DOJ_NMG_0132570

Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., provoked a sharp response from Democrats when she said she opposes the increase in troops but would not support the measure criticizing it. She said that while it pledges to protect the troops in Iraq and those who have gone, it makes no mention of the thousands yet to be deployed.

"What about the five brigades of young Americans who are now preparing their families and packing their gear to deploy? What about them? What are you saying to them? Will we buy body armor for them? Will we have armored Humvees for them?" she asked.

"If the commander in chief has sent them there, we will support them," he said.

GOP Vs. GOP In House Iraq Debate (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Usa Today

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Democrats now control the House, but for two hours Wednesday, they took a back seat as Republicans argued amongst themselves over President Bush's Iraq policy.

Rep. Walter Jones, a Republican whose North Carolina district includes the Marine Corps' Camp Lejeune, led a dozen GOP lawmakers who spoke against the president's plan to commit 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Several said they were doing so despite their personal affection and admiration for the president.

"I am personally very high on President Bush, but on the matter of the troop escalation, I am not in agreement," said Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C. "The Iraqi people were given a choice between freedom and civil war. Unfortunately, they chose the latter."

At the same time, the president took to the airwaves to try to sell his policy at a televised news conference.

The extent of the Republican opposition to Bush's plan is the only suspense left in the debate. Drafted by Jones and two senior Democrats, the resolution states support for the soldiers, but opposition to a troop increase. The resolution is all but certain to win approval on Friday.

"We will lose some," conceded House Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio.

Rep. Wayne Gilchrest, a Maryland Republican who spoke against Bush's policy Wednesday, predicted in an interview that there will be between 20 and 40 Republican defectors when the roll is called. In 2002, six Republicans (along with 126 Democrats) voted against giving the president the power to go to war.

The Republican critiques of the Bush policy were at times pointed. "More of the same on steroids," is how Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., described it. They demonstrated how deeply disillusionment has set in since the heady days when lawmakers celebrated the massive turnout for Iraq's first free elections.

"Unfortunately, it seems that the Americans want a unified and secure Iraq more than the Iraqis do," said Rep. Ric Keller, R-Fla.

The Republican opposition also prompted sharp retorts from colleagues who support the president's policy.

"Whose side are you on?" said Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn. "Are you on the side of freedom or are you on the side of allowing the terrorists to get the upper hand?"

Rep. Zach Wamp, R-Tenn., said the troop increase is necessary to "the defense of liberty and our way of life."

The Republicans favoring the resolution run the political gamut. Centrists argued that diplomatic and political initiatives would be a better alternative to a troop increase.

"I believe that surges will continue to be unsuccessful without a comprehensive diplomatic strategy," said Rep. Mike Castle, R-Del.

Fiscal conservatives questioned how the nation will pay its bills "if we keep trying to run the whole world," as Rep. John Duncan, R-Tenn., said.

Some Republicans who oppose the troop increase, including Rep. Phil English, R-Pa., expressed frustration that Democratic congressional leaders did not allow them to offer amendments. "I will vote in favor of the resolution as offered as narrow and inadequate as it is; but I can't help but express my frustration that the Democrat leadership has squandered an opportunity to allow a full and fair debate with real amendments," English said.

That may cost the resolution some Republican support. Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., a former Air Force captain and the only female veteran in Congress, said Wednesday that even though she is "skeptical of the Baghdad mission" she will vote against the resolution because it "leave unanswered the question of whether we will fund the bullets and body armor for troops who are not there yet but are going."

Wilson's comments prompted an unscheduled appearance on the House floor by an agitated Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md. He insisted that soldiers in battle will have funds and armaments available.

"No one in this Congress will not support them," Hoyer said.

Some House Republicans Break Ranks On Bush's Troop Buildup (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Republican divisions over the Iraq war broke into the open on the House floor Wednesday as Democrats stepped aside for two hours and let the minority air its differences over President Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops over the coming months.

The remarkable situation developed after North Carolina Rep. Walter Jones was given an hour's debate time to control as the lead Republican cosponsor of a nonbinding resolution disapproving of the troop surge. Mr. Jones, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, then yielded to a succession of like-minded Republicans whose speeches against the troop increase were interspersed with remarks by Republicans supportive of administration's policy.

The result was a two-hour snapshot of a growing party split that poses the most serious threat to the White House as it tries to sustain long-term support for the war. Those opposing the president included Reps. Phil English (R., Pa.) and Fred Upton (R., Mich.) with coveted seats on leadership committees such as Ways and Means and Energy and Commerce. Mr. Jones later predicted that 30 Republicans may yet support the resolution of disapproval when it comes to a House vote, most likely on Friday.

It's a very different landscape from last June, when only three House Republicans broke with the party leadership on a 256-153 vote supportive of the administration's war policy. Intervening setbacks in Iraq and the November elections have changed the tone.

"If you oppose the surge, the troops will be demoralized, we're told," said Rep. Howard Coble (R., N.C.) "I think not. I believe they would more readily be demoralized if we were willy-nilly, rubber stamping every issue confronting us."

"We need a massive diplomatic initiative that brings together the parties in the region," said Mr. English in a later interview, and the same theme was sounded by Mr. Upton, a former Ronald Reagan aide who said he had emailed soldiers he has met to solicit their views on the support for the surge.

"Bringing in more Americans will force us into more confrontational roles. This is not the way to win,'" Mr. Upton said, reading from an answer he received from an Army captain in Iraq.

Most of the Republican dissenters pledged to oppose any effort to cut funding for the war, but the huge costs have clearly begun to take a toll. "There is nothing fiscally conservative about this war," said Rep. John Duncan (R., Tenn.). "Our Constitution does not give us the authority to run another country as we have been doing in Iraq with a [U.S.] national debt of $9 trillion."

House Democrats have their own dissenters. "It is akin to sitting in the stands and booing while the team is out there executing the play," said Rep. Jim Marshall (D., Ga.), who will vote against the resolution. But it is a measure of the Democratic confidence that the leadership gave Mr. Marshall time to speak and didn't make him go the Republican side.

Mr. Marshall, a Vietnam veteran and former law professor, ended his remarks with a touching message to troops in Iraq, urging them not to be worried about the debate.

"When I was fighting insurgents in Vietnam, our country was torn by antiwar protests and debate," Mr. Marshall said, speaking to the House cameras. "I didn't worry about that. You shouldn't either."

"I didn't let it discourage me. You shouldn't let it discourage you. You should simply do your duty and be proud of the fact that you've done it…Let others, the president and Congress debate of what that duty actually is. There are legitimate differences of opinion in the United States among the leadership concerning the best way forward in Iraq, how to get the best possible result."

For Republicans, Bush Bashing Is Not An Appealing Option (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

For months now, President Bush's poll ratings have been in the toilet. His performance is the single most important reason why Republicans lost the House and Senate, and the president's standing shows no sign of turning around between now and Election Day 2008.

So shouldn't Republican officeholders simply do whatever they have to in order to distance themselves from the president? And shouldn't they go even further in establishing their independence by piling on Bush to show how much they disagree with him, as much as Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel (R) has been doing for months on Iraq?

Well, as the November elections demonstrated, it isn't that simple.

Bush defines what his party stands for as long as he is in office, and efforts by individual Republican Members of Congress to separate themselves from their party weren't very effective in 2006.

I still remember something that a Democratic consultant told me more than a half-dozen years ago, during then-President Bill Clinton's problems: The lower the president's poll numbers fall, the worse things are for Democrats, including those Democrats who were intent on distancing themselves from the occupant of the Oval Office.

In beating up on Clinton, the astute student of politics said back then, Democrats only would be adding to their own headaches by highlighting his problems, conveying a sense of chaos within the Democratic Party and diminishing the leader of their party. The same holds true for Republicans who would like to criticize Bush now.

Bush remains in office for another two years, and unfortunately for him and his party, the public appears to have permanently soured on him.

A mid-January CNN/Opinion Research Corp. survey found that a mere 32 percent of those polled said policies proposed by Bush would move the country in the right direction, while 61 percent said those policies would move the country in the "wrong direction."

Those numbers mirrored the president's job performance numbers, which will need to improve if he is going to help his party and his party's candidates in 2008. But if the Republicans beat up on Bush to distance themselves from him, they guarantee that his ratings will remain low. (They may remain low in any case, of course.)

The problem for Republicans is that, while they would like to act as if the president is now largely irrelevant, there simply is no way that they can move past him. He is still the president, and he's still making policy. And that means that he's still an easy target for Democrats.

The Iraq War remains the top issue of the day, and it is inextricably linked to Bush. It is almost impossible for GOP Members of Congress to talk about Iraq — about what is happening on the ground and about what to do about it — without being drawn into a discussion of the president and his policies.

Even more than that, Republicans will have to figure out what they'll do about — and with — the president when their national convention rolls around 18 months from now.

Does anybody really believe that Republicans will be able to put together a convention that ignores the president of the United States? And no matter what kind of role Bush gets at the 2008 GOP convention in Minnesota, unless the public's perception of the president changes between now and August 2008, can his presence do anything but aid a Democratic argument for change?

Clinton, who had his share of problems during his second term in the White House, but who had much better job approval numbers than Bush now does, spoke to the 2000 Democratic convention on Monday night, Aug. 14, the first day of the convention. Bush likely will do the same thing, but he won't be able to avoid the elephant in the room.

"Mr. Clinton made no allusions to the personal scandals he has weathered," wrote Rick Berke of The New York Times about the president's 3,888-word speech on that opening night. Can anyone imagine Bush not mentioning his albatross, the Iraq War, during his speech to the GOP convention?

Obviously, a lot can happen over the next year and a half. But unless things change dramatically, Republicans will find themselves stuck between a rock and a hard place. If they criticize their president, they add to their own party's woes. And if they try to defend him, they also add to their party's woes.

No wonder many Democrats think they'll have an edge in the 2008 race, even against a Republican nominee who tries to separate himself from Bush and the current administration's policies. "Time for a change" may not work as well in 2008 as it did in 2006, but it still figures to be an effective message for the next Democratic presidential nominee.

Awaiting The Dishonor Roll (WSJ)

Congress has rarely been distinguished by its moral courage. But even grading on a curve, we can only describe this week's House debate on a vote of no-confidence in the mission in Iraq as one of the most shameful moments in the institution's history.

On present course, the Members will vote on Friday to approve a resolution that does nothing to remove American troops from harm's way in Iraq but that will do substantial damage to their morale and that of their Iraqi allies while emboldening the enemy. The only real question is how many Republicans will also participate in this disgrace in the mistaken belief that their votes will put some distance between themselves and the war most of them voted to authorize in 2002.

The motion at issue is plainly dishonest, in that exquisitely Congressional way of trying to have it both ways. (We reprint the text nearby.) The resolution purports to "support" the troops even as it disapproves of their mission. It praises their "bravery," while opposing the additional forces that both President Bush and General David Petreaus, the new commanding general in Iraq, say are vital to accomplishing that mission. And it claims to want to "protect" the troops even as its practical impact will be to encourage Iraqi insurgents to believe that every roadside bomb brings them closer to their goal.

As for how "the troops" themselves feel, we refer readers to Richard Engel's recent story on NBC News quoting Specialist Tyler Johnson in Iraq: "People are dying here. You know what I'm saying . . . You may [say] 'oh we support the troops.' So you're not supporting what they do. What they's (sic) here to sweat for, what we bleed for and we die for." Added another soldier: "If they don't think we're doing a good job, everything we've done here is all in vain." In other words, the troops themselves realize that the first part of the resolution is empty posturing, while the second is deeply immoral.

All the more so because if Congress feels so strongly about the troops, it arguably has the power to start removing them from harm's way by voting to cut off the funds they need to operate in Iraq. But that would make Congress responsible for what followed -- whether those consequences are Americans killed in retreat, or ethnic cleansing in Baghdad, or the toppling of the elected Maliki government by radical Shiite or military forces. The one result Congress fears above all is being accountable.

We aren't prone to quoting the young John Kerry, but this week's vote reminds us of the comment the antiwar veteran told another cut-and-run Congress in the early 1970s: "How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?" The difference this time is that Speaker Nancy Pelosi and John Murtha expect men and women to keep dying for something they say is a mistake but also don't have the political courage to help end.

Instead, they'll pass this "non-binding resolution," to be followed soon by attempts at micromanagement that would make the war all but impossible to prosecute -- and once again without taking responsibility. Mr. Murtha is already broadcasting his strategy, which the new Politico Web site described yesterday as "a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options."

In concert with antiwar groups, the story reported, Mr. Murtha's "goal is crafted to circumvent the biggest political vulnerability of the antiwar movement -- the accusation that it is willing to abandon troops in the field." So instead of cutting off funds, Mr. Murtha will "slow-bleed" the troops with "readiness" restrictions or limits on National Guard forces that will make them all but impossible to deploy. These will be attached to appropriations bills that will also purport to "support the troops."

"There's a D-Day coming in here, and it's going to start with the supplemental and finish with the '08 [defense] budget," Congressman Neil Abercrombie (D., Hawaii) told the Web site. He must mean D-Day as in Dunkirk.

All of this is something that House Republicans should keep in mind as they consider whether to follow this retreat. The GOP leadership has been stalwart, even eloquent, this week in opposing the resolution. But some Republicans figure they can use this vote to distance themselves from Mr. Bush and the war while not doing any real harm. They should understand that the Democratic willingness to follow the Murtha "slow-bleed" strategy will depend in part on how many Republicans follow them in this vote. The Democrats are themselves divided on how to proceed, and they want a big GOP vote to give them political cover. However "non-binding," this is a vote that Republican partisans will long remember.

History is likely to remember the roll as well. A newly confirmed commander is about to lead 20,000 American soldiers on a dangerous and difficult mission to secure Baghdad, risking their lives for their country. And the message their elected Representatives will send them off to battle with is a vote declaring their inevitable defeat.

Not Supporting Our Troops (NYT)

How do you explain to the thousands of American troops now being poured into Baghdad that they will have to wait until the summer for the protective armor that could easily mean the difference between life and death?

It's bad enough that these soldiers are being asked to risk their lives without President Bush demanding that Iraq's leaders take any political risks that might give the military mission at least an outside chance of success. But according to an article in The Washington Post this week, at least some of the troops will be sent out in Humvees not yet equipped with FRAG Kit 5 armor. That's an advanced version designed to reduce deaths from roadside bombs, which now account for about 70 percent of United States casualties in Iraq.

The more flexible materials used in the FRAG Kit 5 make it particularly helpful in containing the damage done by the especially deadly weapon the Bush administration is now most concerned about: those explosively formed penetrators that Washington accuses Iran of supplying to Shiite militias for use against American troops.

Older versions of Humvee armor are shattered by these penetrators, showering additional shrapnel in the direction of a Humvee's occupants. The FRAG Kit 5 helps slow the incoming projectile and contains some of the shrapnel, giving the soldiers a better chance of survival.

Armor upgrades like this have become a feature of the Iraq war, as the Pentagon struggles to keep up with the constantly more powerful weapons and sophisticated tactics of the various militia and insurgent forces attacking American troops. But the Army, the National Guard and the Marine Corps have been caught constantly behind the curve.

Unglamorous and relatively inexpensive staples of ground combat, like armor, have never really captured the imagination and attention of military contractors and Pentagon budget-makers the way that "Top Gun" fighter jets, stealthy warships and "Star Wars" missile interceptors generally do.

The Army says it is now accelerating its production of FRAG Kit 5 armor and handing it out to Baghdad-bound units on a priority basis. But it acknowledges that the armor upgrading project will not be completed until summer. Right now, it's February, and the new American drive in Baghdad has already begun.

That's a shame, if not an outright scandal, because up-to-date armor is essential for saving American lives.

The House Debates Iraq (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

It's not likely that Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama, John McCain or Rudy Giuliani took time this week from the rigors of presidential trajectory to watch the House floor debate on Iraq. Too bad. They would have learned something useful.

Whatever its gerrymandered imperfections, the Founders' "house of the people" is born biannually from 435 congressional districts. The House leadership scheduled time for debate on the Democrats' famous "97-word" resolution unto midnight on Tuesday and Wednesday and into evening today, with a vote scheduled for tonight or tomorrow.

That debate -- seen mainly by beat reporters and C-Span's hyperpartisans -- spread before us a political inkblot on Iraq and the war on terror that is at least as accurate as the opinion polls that substitute for actual views of the electorate. Each member stood amid the chamber's polished wood and gave the nation the sum of his or her political calculation and personal belief.

The most striking impression from the debate is the most obvious: The nation is polarized. Of what I saw, there was no common ground between the two parties, none. Mainly, it was Blue America (Massachusetts, New York, cities, blue California) versus Red America (Florida, Texas, suburbs, red California).

The conventional wisdom now is that the "independent" vote is ascendant. But if Iraq is hot next year, the presidential runners will have to turn the trick of surviving the cauldrons of their boiling blue and red primaries and then purporting in the general election that they've emerged from them a lovely, independent pink. On foreign policy, that won't be easy, especially for Hillary and Barack.

Both need to find a worldview somewhere, because their party doesn't have one that extends beyond the suburbs of Baghdad.

In the House debate, it was the calculation of Speaker Pelosi and her leadership to keep the focus on the poll-proven unpopularity of the Iraq war and the 21st century's most famous bogeyman, "George Bush." The GOP calculation was to move the debate off Iraq and onto the broader war on terror.

Politics aside, the result on public view was a Democratic side that looked small, mired in talk of American "failure," while a number of senior Republicans -- John Boehner, Pete Hoekstra, Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, even Peter King -- produced almost stirring speeches on the substance and meaning of the global threat.

Pete Hoekstra, recently chairman of the intelligence committee, gave what must be the severest attack on radical Islam ever by a U.S. public figure. Forget Pope Benedict; there was nary a genuflection to Muslim sensibilities in Mr. Hoekstra's argument that the enemy is not some vague thing called terrorism: "We are not at war with a tactic. We are at war with a group of militant Islamists who hate us and who hate much of the rest of the world."

John Boehner reviewed each Islamic terrorist act directed at the U.S. dating to the Iran hostage-taking of 1979. "Too bad it took so long to open our eyes," he said, "but they are open now." Ileana Ros-Lehtinen quoted the famous blueprint of al Qaeda No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahiri: "The first stage: expel the Americans from Iraq." Rep. Charles Boustany said plausibly that other Arab nations could never help with a political settlement if the region is engulfed in violence after a U.S. exit.

So one may ask: Where were you guys when we needed you? Republicans lost the election because most of them foxholed the past two years when the going got tough. Instead of this Kissingerian geopolitical vision, they let one guy carry the burden (they would reply that the "one guy" never asked for their help).

Sens. Clinton and Obama should take a long look at Tuesday's videotape of the Democratic House now shaping the party's foreign policy. Is this where they'll want to be next year?

Even allowing for the politics of the Iraq-only script, it got a little weird watching speaker after speaker (excepting freshman and former Navy admiral Joe Sestak) pretend that the world and all its troubles can be telescoped down to the Sunni Triangle.

Rep. Tom Lantos, chairman of the foreign affairs committee and nominally responsible for a larger view, simply wrote off Iraq's government -- "They have made minimal and cosmetic efforts" -- and the entire Iraqi people: "Iraqis themselves don't seem to want it."

The more difficult political problem, though, is still Vietnam. All the while the Democratic members were withdrawing support for the U.S. commitment in Iraq, they were at pains to inoculate themselves against their toxic experience with Vietnam. So horrifying are the famous images in the 1970s of what presumably were not evangelicals spitting on GIs coming home from Vietnam, that House Democrats, with every second intake of breath, spoke of the troops and their families ("their wonderful families" -- Rep. Ike Skelton). History may view this as progress.

Then there is the matter of the also-famous 1975 decision to withhold appropriations for the war in Vietnam. Democrats insist they won't pull the plug on the troops in Iraq, preferring what they call, with no apparent irony, a "fully funded withdrawal." Still, several invoked the "power of the purse" (Messrs. Conyers and McGovern), referring to next month's vote on an appropriations supplemental. And Rep. Jim McDermott said he'd duplicate the 1971 Hatfield-McGovern amendment to bring the troops home.

It will be the job of Speaker Pelosi and candidates Clinton and Obama to convince the wider world that these hell-no, we'll-never-go compulsions aren't simply bred into the party's genetic code after 30 years. Starting with why so many House Democrats, led by Ms. Pelosi, called the Bush surge an "escalation," from the hallowed anti-Vietnam lexicon.

The debate offered the inevitable amusements of politicians in full throat. Both sides (Rep. Gregory Meeks of New York on the left, Pete Sessions of Texas on the right) claimed that the Iraq Study Group proved their positions, driving the final stake into the corpse of "bipartisanship." Colin Powell and Gen. John Abizaid were raised up more than once as heroes of the Democratic opposition (still not too late to disown the honor). And after the House chamber had filled with learned references to Robert Frost, Douglas MacArthur and John Stuart Mill, came Rep. Jim Pascrell (D., N.J.) that "Iranians are ethnically of Indo-European descent; their language is similar in structure to classical Latin." Over this, I believe, there was bipartisan head-scratching.

By Francis X. Clines

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

What the House is calling a three-day “debate” over the Iraq war is decisively settling at least two points. It’s nowhere close to a real debate. And Speaker Nancy Pelosi missed a good bet when she rejected cable television’s plea to open the floor to roving cameras that could reach beyond wooden shots of stationary orators.

A freer C-Span perspective could have helped the nation see what a nondebate is at the heart of this spectacle of serial talking heads, Ping-Ponged in partisan time calibrations and slotted in 12-hour slabs over three days.

At times, the scene seems as much a symptom of the disconnect in Washington about the war’s tragedy that voters underlined last November, rather than an antidote for it. Steady viewers find no evidence that the speakers actually bother to listen to one another after recording their apportioned sound bites.

What is clearly occurring is a postelection freeing up of vital but fiercely repressed rhetoric, which was not allowed to escape in the previous Congress, which was controlled by the Republicans and intent on protecting President Bush from criticism of his war’s failure.

The polemics are tinged with passion, especially from Democrats who are finally unbottled to rail against the administration’s downward spiral in Baghdad: “Chaos, not democracy, has taken root!” And from the Republican side, where President Bush’s name is rarely being uttered, there’s the insistent message that American troops should be outraged by the policy criticism finally being voiced in the people’s debating chamber: “Fortunately for us and the free world, [the troops] don’t sit around and watch C-Span and what silly politicians do.”

There’s nothing silly, though, about the points made in this nondebate, wherever the nation’s attention may wander. As a Bush critic in the House tried to put the war in human terms for cable watchers (“There’s 16,000 single moms serving in Iraq — 16,000!”), a prime-time surfer found news channels consumed with stories of sex shows in Amsterdam, the looming “nightmare” of a winter storm and rich servings of Anna Nicole Smith. Back to C-Span, where a Bush defender insisted that the war was moral: “It represents the goodness of the American people.”

Some House soliloquies bordered on haiku: “The coalition of the willing no longer is.” Others on Prufrockian wonder: “Are we going to leave this mess for the next president?” And bromides: “Time was when politics stopped at the water’s edge.” A groping for metaphor: “Iraq is a hall of mirrors.” And regretful allusions to history: “We haven’t really won a war since World War II.”

Republicans complain that the new majority, after years in the polemical wilderness, foiled their wish for a real debate by allowing no topic but the up-or-down question of the president’s sending in more troops.

Democrats counter that the House's nonbinding resolution is a mere prelude to concrete things to come: "We're not done!"

President Bush picked up on that theme across town at a news conference yesterday, certifying the bipartisan rising of critics as absolutely "patriotic people who care about our country." But the proof of their patriotism, Mr. Bush suggested, will be whether his critics vote for a mandatory resolution "that prevents our troops from doing that which I have asked them to do."

C-Span viewers are onto that, and whatever else comes next in the Democrats' initiative to vent the public's war frustrations. A visiting congressman, prepping for the second 12-hour marathon, could only agree with C-Span callers that America at large has long been at the water cooler debating the war: "The only place it wasn't happening was on the floor of Congress."

On the floor, few members were present to hear a pro-Bush nondebater channel Robert Frost: "The best way out is always through." On the other hand, not many heard the caution of that earlier authority on the Middle East, Omar Khayyam:

"The Moving Finger writes; and, having writ,
Moves on: nor all your Piety nor Wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line."

Troops Increase Checkpoints In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Bushra Juhi

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. and Iraqi troops yesterday stepped up patrols in Baghdad, establishing new checkpoints and randomly searching cars to stop the violence in the capital.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the sweep, part of a new security crackdown code-named Operation Imposing Law, would target those "who want to continue with rebellion."

There were conflicting reports, meanwhile, about the whereabouts of Muqtada al-Sadr, whose militia has been blamed for some of the worst sectarian killings in the past year, after a U.S. official said the radical Shi'ite cleric had fled to Iran ahead of the security operation.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. military spokesman, insisted that Sheik al-Sadr had left the country, although he declined to comment on the reasons or give other details.

"We will acknowledge that he is not in the country and all indications are in fact that he is in Iran," Gen. Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad.

But several of the cleric's supporters denied the reports, with one official saying the cleric had met with government officials late Tuesday in the Shi'ite holy city of Najaf, where he has his headquarters.

Lawmaker Nassar al-Rubaie, the head of Sadrist bloc in parliament, also insisted that Sheik al-Sadr had not left the country.

"The news is not accurate because Muqtada al-Sadr is still in Iraq and he did not visit any country," Mr. al-Rubaie said.

Also yesterday, CNN reported that a Shi'ite militant group had issued a video of Iraqi-born U.S. Army translator Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a 41-year-old reserve soldier from Ann Arbor, Mich., who was abducted by gunmen on Oct. 23.

Gen. Caldwell said officials were aware of the video and were analyzing a copy of it.

A U.S. soldier died yesterday after coming under small arms fire a day earlier from insurgents while on patrol north of Baghdad, the military said. Separately, another soldier died Tuesday in a non-combat-related incident that is under investigation, it said.

The U.S. military announced last week that the security clampdown in Baghdad had begun, but Iraqis had seen little evidence of that before yesterday.

As the new checkpoints were set up in the city of 6 million people, huge traffic jams developed and cars were forced to zigzag through soldiers' positions and barricades.

Mr. al-Maliki discussed the security plan during a meeting with officials in the Shi'ite holy city of Karbala, 50 miles south of Baghdad.

"We have started today the new security plan. And we warn everyone who runs against it: Now we are ready to impose law on all those who want to continue with rebellion," he said. "Baghdad operations started today under code name 'Imposing Law.' "

He gave the pep talk a day after the Iraqi commander of the Baghdad security crackdown, Lt. Gen. Abboud Qanbar, announced that Iraq will close its borders with Syria and Iran and ordered the return of unlawfully seized homes as part of the drive to end the violence that has threatened to divide the capital along sectarian lines.

Despite the stepped-up security, a parked car bomb exploded in a predominantly Shi'ite district elsewhere in central Baghdad, killing four civilians and wounding 10, police said.

In the western city of Ramadi, a suicide car bomber struck a police station, killing at least eight policemen and wounding seven, police said. A suicide car bomber also targeted an Iraqi army patrol in the northern city of Mosul, killing one soldier and four civilians, police said.

Armed Iraqis Wary Of Security Plan (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 14 -- At least once a week inside his stationery shop, Ali al-Yousef stacks up old notebooks in the back room and fires his pistol at them.

"Target practice," Yousef said. "We don't like guns, but we have to have them. I think every house should have a gun."

As the contours of the Baghdad security plan start to solidify, Yousef, 55, like millions of other Iraqis, is trying to assess whether measures such as the newly announced ban on civilians carrying weapons are more likely to keep him safe than the 9mm pistol he carries on the seat between his legs, safety off, for the drive home.

The U.S. military announced Wednesday the formal start of the security plan, dubbed Operation Law and Order, saying in a statement that troops cleared several areas of the capital in "intelligence-focused searches."

But the security plan is nowhere near full throttle, officials said, and results should not be expected overnight. The 21,500 Americans that constitute the troop surge are not all expected until at least late May, a military spokesman said Wednesday. And the training and equipping of Iraq's security forces will be a long-term endeavor.

"The Iraqi forces still suffer from deficiencies of leadership, logistics, intelligence and, in some cases, loyalty," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a military spokesman, said Wednesday. "It will take more than two months to solve these problems."

Government officials also must grapple with numerous variables -- including the reported departure of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, the leader of the powerful Mahdi Army militia, and relentless attacks on U.S. forces -- as they attempt to restore order in Iraq.

But signs of tighter security began to emerge this week in Iraq's largely lawless capital. Fighter jets circled over Baghdad on Wednesday as more, and more thorough, checkpoints clogged already saturated streets.

Officials are planning to beef up security along the Iranian and Syrian borders, which will be sealed soon for 72 hours while authorities upgrade security measures. And the countless squatters who have reshaped the city have been put on notice: Abandon illegally occupied homes within two weeks or face eviction.

Meanwhile, in shops and homes and on street corners, the debate raged: Will it work this time? Can this government be trusted?

Behind the counter, Yousef's daughter, Ruqiyah, 25, carries a tiny Italian-made Tanfoglio Giuseppe 5mm pistol. "For girls," he explained.

In shops in the Karrada neighborhood, owners defended their need for weapons to protect themselves from Baghdad's violence. As part of the security plan, the government said it will limit the use of weapons in public places to official forces and licensed security guards.

Caldwell said Wednesday that U.S. officials believe that Sadr is in Iran, which Sadr's supporters have denied. A U.S. military intelligence official who specializes in the Middle East and spoke on condition of anonymity said Sadr is likely regrouping with Iraqi and Iranian supporters.

"I believe that he went to Iran for a strategic session" with the Revolutionary Guard "and Iran's other proxies in Iraq to determine actually how they will undermine America's plans," the official said. Another source, an intelligence official in Washington, said Sadr is believed to have been in Iran for several weeks. The source, who also spoke on condition of anonymity, said speculation about the timing of his reported departure on the eve of the security plan might be overblown. "There could be any number of reasons for a trip there," the source said, noting that Sadr has traveled to Iran before. "He's got contacts and family in Iran."

Also Wednesday, Caldwell said a transport helicopter that crashed near Baghdad on Feb. 7 was apparently downed by a "sophisticated piece of weaponry." Military officials previously said the CH-46 Sea Knight experienced mechanical difficulties before crashing.

A militant Shiite group posted a brief video on a Web site that purported to show an American soldier kidnapped in Baghdad in October. U.S. Army interpreter Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, 41, was abducted Oct. 23 while visiting his wife's relatives in Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood. Caldwell said U.S. officials are reviewing the video.

The military also disclosed the deaths of four Task Force Lightning soldiers attacked Wednesday in Diyala province, north of Baghdad. Three died "following explosions near their vehicles," the military said in a statement. A fourth soldier died later at a medical facility.

Also Wednesday, the military disclosed that a U.S. soldier was fatally shot Tuesday in Baghdad.

Al-Sadr's Supporters Deny U.S. Claims He Is In Iran (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, February 15, 2007

BAGHDAD — Supporters of Muqtada al-Sadr insisted the Shiite militia leader was still in Iraq on Wednesday, denying U.S. claims that he is in Iran.

Al-Sadr "would never leave his people in this difficult time, as the Americans want to make people think," said Abdul Razaq al-Nidawi, a spokesman for al-Sadr. He said al-Sadr was in the city of Najaf, where he lives, but declined to provide further details.

An Iraqi-U.S. security plan that was launched this month focuses on disarming the radical Shiite cleric's Mahdi Army. The U.S. military accuses the militia of setting roadside bombs, infiltrating government ministries and conducting mass kidnappings and murders. Several Mahdi Army leaders have been arrested in recent weeks.

"Our reporting shows that al-Sadr is out of the country and is in Iran," said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad.

Nasser al-Rubaie, head of the group of legislators loyal to al-Sadr in the parliament, called the claim "fabrications and lies."

Al-Sadr became a national figure in the weeks after the U.S. invasion in March 2003. His anti-American rhetoric and emphasis on his Arab ancestry — he claims to be a descendant of the prophet Mohammed — have earned him the support of young and underprivileged Shiites across Iraq.

The cleric often drops out of sight for weeks or even months at a time. His last public appearance was on Jan. 3 at a mosque in Najaf, about 100 miles south of Baghdad.

In its quarterly report released in December, the Pentagon said al-Sadr's militia has replaced al-Qaeda in Iraq as "the most dangerous accelerant of potentially self-sustaining sectarian violence in Iraq."

Al-Sadr led two uprisings against U.S. forces in 2004. He is a major influence of the United Iraqi Alliance, the largest bloc in the parliament, which was key to appointing fellow Shiite Nouri al-Maliki as prime minister.

Meanwhile, U.S. and Iraqi forces intensified their security crackdown in Baghdad, setting up new checkpoints and conducting door-to-door searches of homes.

Huge traffic jams developed in Baghdad and cars were forced to zigzag through soldiers' positions and barricades. Dozens of people left their buses to cross the central Sinak Bridge on foot rather than wait for the vehicles to move through the jams. At one checkpoint, Iraqi troops stopped a convoy of three white SUVs, which are commonly used by Iraqi government officials, and checked the occupants' identification.

Also Wednesday:

·Four U.S. soldiers were killed and two others were wounded during fighting northeast of Baghdad, the military said. The soldiers were attacked while conducting combat operations in Diyala province, where U.S. and Iraqi forces have been battling insurgents for months. A fifth U.S. soldier died after coming under small-arms fire from insurgents north of Baghdad.

·Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. military spokesman, said a U.S. Marine transport helicopter that crashed last week northwest of Baghdad "was probably brought down by some sophisticated piece of weaponry." He did not give further details.

Pentagon officials initially had blamed mechanical problems for the crash of the CH-46 Sea Knight, which went down Feb. 7, killing all seven servicemembers aboard. On Tuesday, the Marines said further investigation confirmed the helicopter was brought down by hostile fire.

·A Shiite militant group released a video of a kidnapped Iraqi-American soldier, the first time he has been seen alive since he was abducted four months ago in Baghdad, said the soldier's uncle, Entifadh Qanbar.

U.S. Army translator Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a 41-year-old reservist who was born in Iraq and who lives in Ann Arbor, Mich., was seized by gunmen on Oct. 23 while visiting his Iraqi wife's family in Baghdad.

A previously unknown Shiite militant group called Ahl al-Bayt Brigades posted a 10-second video on the Internet on Tuesday showing al-Taayie in front of a greenish, flat surface. He had dark, cropped hair and was wearing a dark green shirt, said the SITE Institute, a U.S. group that monitors extremist messages. The video had no sound.

A Prewar Slide Show Cast Iraq In Rosy Hues (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — When Gen. Tommy R. Franks and his top officers gathered in August 2002 to review an invasion plan for Iraq, it reflected a decidedly upbeat vision of what the country would look like four years after Saddam Hussein was ousted from power.

A broadly representative Iraqi government would be in place. The Iraqi Army would be working to keep the peace. And the United States would have as few as 5,000 troops in the country.

Military slides obtained by the National Security Archive under the Freedom of Information Act outline the command's PowerPoint projection of the stable, pro-American and democratic Iraq that was to be.

The general optimism and some details of General Franks's planning session have been disclosed in the copious postwar literature. But the slides from the once classified briefing provide a firsthand look at how far the violent reality of Iraq today has deviated from assumptions that once laid the basis for an exercise in pre-emptive war.

The archive, an independent research institute at George Washington University, has posted the slides on its Web site, www.nsarchive.org.

August 2002 was an important time for developing the strategy. President Bush had yet to go to the United Nations to declare Saddam Hussein's supposed weapons programs a menace to international security, but the war planning was well under way. The tumultuous upheaval that would follow the toppling of the Hussein government was known antiseptically in planning sessions as "Phase IV." As is clear from the slides, it was the least defined part of the strategy.

General Franks had told his officers that it was his supposition that the State Department would have the primary responsibility for rebuilding Iraq's political institutions.

"D.O.S. will promote creation of a broad-based, credible provisional government — prior to D-Day," noted a slide on "key planning assumptions." That was military jargon for the notion that the Department of State would assemble a viable Iraqi governing coalition before the invasion even began.

"It was a way of forcing the discussion, to get clarity of how we and State were going to deal with the governance issue," Col. John Agoglia, a Central Command planner at the time, said in an interview.

As it turned out, it was months before the command's planners began to receive some of the clarification they were hoping for. The Bush administration put aside the idea of establishing a prewar provisional government for fear it would marginalize Iraqi leaders who had not gone into exile. Colonel Agoglia said he did not begin to get a sense of what the postwar arrangements would be until Jay Garner, a retired three-star general, was tapped by the Bush administration in January 2003 to serve as the first civilian administrator in postwar Iraq.

Another assumption spelled out in the PowerPoint presentation was that "co-opted" Iraqi Army units would heed the American appeals to stay in their garrisons and later help United States to secure the country.

Based on this and other hopeful suppositions, the command's planners projected what the American occupation of Iraq might look like. After the main fighting was over, there was to be a two- to three-month "stabilization" phase, then an 18- to 24-month "recovery" phase.

That was to be followed by a 12- to 18-month "transition" phase. At the end of this stage — 32 to 45 months after the invasion began — it was projected that the United States would have only 5,000 troops in Iraq.

Now, those projections seem startlingly unrealistic given the current troop buildup, in which the United States currently has about 132,000 troops in Iraq and is adding about 20,000 more. But the projections, former military planners say, were intended to send the message to civilian policy makers that the invasion of Iraq would be a multiyear proposition, not an easy in-and-out war.

As it turned out, the assumptions on Iraqi and American forces were quickly overturned, partly as a result of new American policy decisions. Instead of staying in garrisons, many of the Iraqi soldiers fled after the war began. Senior American commanders hoped to quickly recall the Iraqi troops to duty anyway, but that option vanished in May 2003 when L. Paul Bremer III, Mr. Garner's successor, issued an edict formally disbanding the Iraqi Army.

The message that the United States should gird itself for a substantial multiyear occupation seemed to be superseded when General Franks issued new guidance to his commanders a week after the fall of Baghdad on April 9 that they should be prepared to reduce the American troops in Iraq to a little more than a division by September 2003 — some 30,000 troops.

A series of ad hoc decisions and strategy changes followed as the insurgency grew and security deteriorated. A new military plan is now being put into effect, which the White House asserts may yet salvage a positive outcome. Almost four years after the invasion, however, the "stable democratic Iraqi government" the United States once hoped for seems to exist only in the command's old planning slides.

Iraq War Planner Was Hired By Military University, Briefly (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — Last June, Douglas J. Feith, a former top Pentagon official involved in planning the Iraq war, was hired by a Defense Department graduate school for military officers and diplomats, with a four-year contract that was to pay him half a million dollars, Pentagon records show.

His duties as a "distinguished professor" at the National Defense University, a 30-year-old institution on the Washington waterfront financed by the Pentagon, included team-teaching a course and producing a report on ways to "organize the United States better for the long war on terrorism," according to the documents.

The hiring of Mr. Feith, whose role in helping to make the case for the Iraq invasion is still a matter of intense scrutiny a year and a half after he left the Pentagon, had never been announced.

And the job did not last long; the contract was terminated about a month later, records show.

Mr. Feith said in an interview that university officials asked him to reconsider the contract after a new president took over last summer and began a budget review.

"I said, 'Fine, we'll put this thing off,' " Mr. Feith said Tuesday, adding that he agreed to the cancellation because he was still working on a book that was taking up much of his time.

David Thomas, a university spokesman, said the contract was canceled by "mutual decision" on Aug. 28 last year. That was three days after a reporter for The New York Times contacted Mr. Thomas with questions about the university's ties to Mr. Feith.

Mr. Thomas declined to comment further on why the contract was terminated, which occurred soon after Lt. Gen. Frances C. Wilson of the Marine Corps took over as president, replacing Lt. Gen. Michael M. Dunn of the Air Force.

Mr. Feith left the Pentagon in August 2005 and took a job teaching at Georgetown, where he had graduated from law school. The offer to join the National Defense University came nearly a year later. The New York Times obtained the contract documents in December after filing a Freedom of Information Act request.

The university has become a popular place with former Pentagon officials who served under former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Gen. Richard B. Myers, who is retired from the Air Force and was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under Mr. Rumsfeld, holds an endowed chair at the university. Former Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz and Mr. Feith have deposited copies of their official papers there, and Mr. Rumsfeld is considering doing the same, according to two Pentagon aides.

Some of Mr. Feith's former colleagues at the Pentagon said they were puzzled by the university's decision to consider hiring him to lecture military officers on strategy for the fight against terrorism.

Just last week, the acting inspector general of the Pentagon, Thomas F. Gimble, said that while Mr. Feith was under secretary of defense for policy, his office had inappropriately asserted that there were links between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda, conclusions that differed from formal findings of the Central Intelligence Agency and other agencies.

Thomas White, who was secretary of the Army during President Bush's first term, said, "I find it bizarre that they would pick a guy whose performance has been generally maligned and ask him to teach the subject." He added that the decision to terminate the contract "shows somebody has some sense over there."

The way the contract was put out for bid, though, made it difficult for the university to choose anyone other than Mr. Feith.

The "distinguished professor" had to have been a senior policymaker or consultant in the government in the past four years and to have worked on revamping America's global defense posture, its security relationships in Central Asia and South Asia, its strategy for the campaign against terrorism, and several other major issues, the contract solicitation said.

In a June 2006 application for the job labeled "Proposal of Douglas J. Feith," Mr. Feith explained that his work as the top policy official in the Pentagon had covered all the required areas.

"I was the principal author of the briefings that became the foundation for the National Military Strategic Plan for the War on Terrorism," he noted in a five-page résumé summarizing his accomplishments over four years at the Pentagon.

Responding to a requirement that candidates have experience with the "NATO Response Force," Mr. Feith wrote that he had worked with Mr. Rumsfeld to "develop the concept."

Likewise, on the defense posture item, he noted that he had advised Mr. Rumsfeld on "realigning our global defense posture" as well as on relations with "Central Asia and Asia."

With respect to the need to have worked on training and equipping foreign forces, he said he "had helped create the Defense Department programs for training and equipping armies in Afghanistan, Colombia, Georgia, Iraq, Pakistan, Philippines and Yemen."

He concluded, "I have the experience to meet and perform the government's statement of work," and he listed his salary requirement for an initial year and three option years as $501,774.

A month later, he was awarded the contract for the precise amount, according to Defense Department documents, which give no indication that anyone else had been considered. The initial payment, covering July to September of last year, was specified at $37,375. Mr. Thomas, the university spokesman, said he received no payments.

Some of Mr. Feith's accomplishments at the Pentagon were assessed differently by Mr. Gimble at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing last week.

Mr. Gimble said that while Mr. Feith's intelligence activities had not violated the law, they were "inappropriate" because senior officials, including Mr. Rumsfeld and Stephen J. Hadley, then deputy national security adviser, were briefed on the findings without being told that intelligence agencies disagreed with many of the conclusions about a relationship between Al Qaeda and Iraq.

Assertions similar to those made in the briefings by Mr. Feith were later made publicly by Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and other top officials.

Democrats Criticize Lack Of Alternatives In Intelligence Estimate (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Democrats on the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence have questioned whether the recent National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq gave political advantage to the Bush administration by making "rapid withdrawal" of U.S. troops the only alternative military option the NIE explored.

The estimate judged that rapid withdrawal of coalition forces from Iraq would "almost certainly" increase sectarian violence, intensify Sunni resistance, possibly cause the Iraqi Security Forces to dissolve and allow al-Qaeda to seek a sanctuary to plan attacks inside and outside the country. That assessment came just days before the Senate and House prepared to debate nonbinding resolutions opposing increased troop levels in Iraq.

On Feb. 2, the day the estimate was released, President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, told reporters that the document showed that "an American withdrawal or stepping back now would be a prescription for fast failure and a chaos that would envelop not only Iraq, but also the region, and could potentially, by giving al-Qaeda a safe haven in Iraq, result in risk and threats to the United States."

And in the House debate on the Iraq resolution Tuesday, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) cited the NIE judgment on the effects of rapid withdrawal and said, "Iraq would become, as one of my Democratic colleagues said in December of 2005, a 'snakepit for terrorists.' "

At a closed briefing about the NIE on Feb. 7, several committee Democrats asked why the key judgments laid out many adverse results of rapid withdrawal while other military options -- such as the redeployment of forces discussed by the Iraq Study Group or even a buildup of U.S. troops -- were not considered. They were told at the briefing that Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte had requested that the NIE include a discussion of consequences of a coalition withdrawal.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), a panel member, wrote Negroponte on Feb. 8: "Setting up a false choice between indefinite military involvement and a rapid, unplanned withdrawal distorts the current debate in Congress and in the country about how best to defend our national security interests in Iraq." He added that such an approach "does, however, closely align with the administration's efforts to justify an unsustainable military involvement as the only option."

Sen. John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the intelligence panel's chairman, said last week that he, too, was concerned because there was no definition for "rapid" and it was unclear why the topic had been included in the estimate. In a July 26, 2006, letter from Rockefeller and others to Negroponte, setting out questions for an NIE, the closest item was listed as: "U.S. Force Posture: In what ways is the large-scale presence of multi-national forces helping or hindering Iraqis' chances of success?"

"Nowhere did anyone ask about sudden withdrawal," Rockefeller said in an interview last week. He said he worried the new NIE "took us back to days we are trying to get away from," when the White House was accused of misusing intelligence.

Feingold was so exercised over the issue that last week he put a hold on the Senate confirmation vote on Negroponte's appointment as deputy secretary of state. But in a rapid reply to Feingold's concerns, Negroponte on Friday explained that intelligence estimates do not "evaluate policy options or alternative military strategies." Instead, he said, the goal "is to identify the most likely course of events and variables that might change" them.

The decision to look at rapid withdrawal, Negroponte wrote in a letter to Feingold, was not his own. Instead it came from analysts developing the questions to be explored through the NIE, including whether the presence of coalition troops was a major cause of violence in Iraq. "What happens if you remove this factor -- coalition troops -- from the equation?" he wrote. He explained that the analysts were not evaluating a policy option; instead they were "examining the effect of removing what some had hypothesized to be a critical variable."

Noting that Democratic senators who had requested the NIE had wanted to know if the large number of U.S. and coalition forces help or hurt prospects for success in Iraq, Negroponte said the estimate found that current forces provide some stability and that the situation could deteriorate if they were removed. In that way, Negroponte wrote Feingold, the NIE answered both questions, "indicating the specific contributions coalition forces make . . . and what would happen if they were withdrawn."

These answers satisfied Feingold. He released his hold on Negroponte's nomination, and it was later approved by the Senate. Feingold said he appreciated the NIE's "critically important assessment of the conditions in Iraq," but emphasized that the document did evaluate policy approaches. "Framing the analysis in terms of 'rapid withdrawal,' " he wrote, "presented an oversimplified assessment of one course of action without considering any elements of a redeployment strategy, including shifts in mission, stay-behind counterterrorism or training capabilities or regional diplomatic initiatives."

The Other Brave Volunteers In Iraq: The Envoys (NYT)

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

To the Editor:

Re "You Want Me to Go Where? Few Veteran Diplomats Accept Mission to Iraq" (Diplomatic Memo, Feb. 8):

I take exception to your characterization of the attitude of State Department personnel toward our mission in Iraq and the experience level of the officers serving there.

As Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice testified to Congress, midlevel Foreign Service officers make up a substantial number of our personnel in Iraq. Of the 57 generalist Foreign Service officers assigned there, 16 are entry-level officers, 6 are senior Foreign Service and the remaining 35 are midlevel — about the average distribution in other large posts.

The senior officers in this group include five former ambassadors who have led embassies in trouble spots like Sudan, Syria and Guinea. Over all, 85 percent of our Foreign Service personnel in Iraq have eight years or more experience in the department.

We have staffed the existing Provincial Reconstruction Teams with capable, qualified officers, and as Secretary Rice said on Capitol Hill, senior-level officers will be leaving in the next 60 days to lead the nine new Provincial Reconstruction Teams in Baghdad and Anbar Province as part of the president's "New Way Forward."

Over all, volunteers have already been assigned to almost 90 percent of the Iraq positions that open this summer. We expect to decide assignments for the remaining jobs soon.

Since 2003, more than 11 percent of our Foreign Service personnel have served in Iraq, as well as more than 200 of our Civil Service employees. It is unfortunate that your article did not acknowledge the considerable experience of our brave volunteers serving in Iraq. They deserve better.

U.S. Considers Broader Visa Plan For Iraqis (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — The Bush administration is considering legislation that would allow Iraqis who have been singled out as collaborators for working or associating with American officials to come to the United States on special immigrant visas or through other programs, officials said Wednesday.

The program would be broader than the current special visa for translators, which now provides 50 visas each year for translators who have worked for the American military in Iraq and Afghanistan. That program already has a six-year waiting list, according to Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat, who convened a hearing on Iraqi refugees last month.

Under the legislation being considered, Iraqis who have worked for the United States government in various capacities or have associated with American officials would be eligible for a special immigrant visa or a form of humanitarian parole that would include the benefits typically provided to refugees.

State Department officials, who described the program at a news conference on Wednesday, said they hoped to finalize work on the legislation soon. Ellen Sauerbrey, an assistant secretary of state, said that several thousand Iraqis had worked for the United States in Iraq, but added that it was unclear how many would be interested in resettling here.

She said the United States Embassy in Baghdad would be working with the United Nations to identify such individuals, who may now be living in Syria or Jordan, so that they can be given priority for refugee status.

Also at the news conference, Paula J. Dobriansky, the under secretary of state for democracy and global affairs, announced that the United States planned to resettle 7,000 Iraqi refugees. Officials say they hope that half of them will arrive by Sept. 30, the end of the fiscal year, and that more will arrive by the end of 2007.

U.S. Agrees To Resettle Refugees From Iraq (WP)

By Nora Boustany And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

The United States will accelerate the resettlement of about 7,000 Iraqis referred by the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees and will contribute $18 million to the agency's appeal for Iraq, about one-third of the total, Undersecretary of State Paula J. Dobriansky said Wednesday.

Plans call for the paperwork allowing the Iraqis to enter the United States to be completed by the end of September, said Dobriansky, appearing at a news conference in Washington with U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees Ant?nio Guterres, and Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey.

The 7,000 have left Iraq and are waiting in third countries, such as Jordan and Syria. A U.S. team is scheduled to go to Amman, Jordan, on Feb. 26 to begin processing them. Department of Homeland Security officials will conduct interviews, followed by health screenings.

Dobriansky said the Bush administration is working with Congress to develop legislation to allow in other Iraqis who are at special risk in Iraq because of their close association with the U.S. government. As violence there continues unabated, about 2 million Iraqis have fled the country, mostly to Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, while 1.7 million are displaced inside Iraq, according to the United Nations. Refugees International, a Washington-based advocacy group, has called the swelling migration "the fastest-growing humanitarian crisis in the world."

In an interview, Sauerbrey said that from 2003 to last September, a total of 466 Iraqis were resettled in the United States as refugees, 202 of them in the last fiscal year. "People ask, 'Why weren't there more?' " she said. "Until last year, we were resettling people back to Iraq. People wanted to go home."

In the briefing, she said it was not until after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra last February that sectarian violence triggered "a significant outward movement."

In Baghdad, Iraq's immigration minister, Abdul-Samad Sultan, called on neighboring countries to end "oppressive measures" restricting entry and services to Iraqis fleeing violence.

In a recent interview, Sultan criticized Iraq's neighbors for issuing only brief residency visas to Iraqi refugees, if allowing entrance at all, and for preventing Iraqi students from attending public schools and subjecting refugees to repeated searches and denigrating treatment. Sultan did not identify the countries, but other officials said Syria and Jordan, with the largest number of displaced Iraqis, were the biggest concern.

Jordan now bars Iraqi men ages 17 to 35 from entering, U.S. officials have said. Many Iraqis have trouble placing their children in public or private schools in neighboring countries. Syria has begun to issue 15-day residency permits to Iraqis and after that is treating them as illegal immigrants, Iraqi officials said.

"They are getting more strict," said Bill Frelick, refugee policy director for Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group. "I think that given the situation inside Iraq, it's clear that people are fleeing because their lives are in danger, they are therefore refugees, and they should be protected as such."

An Iraqi government official said Denmark is considering deporting about 600 of the 25,000 Iraqi refugees living there. The British government also has considered sending Iraqis home, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

In Washington, Dobriansky said the United States is committed to help the Baghdad government create a safe environment so Iraqis can return home. "At the same time, we have a responsibility to respond to the immediate needs of Iraqis who have fled violence and persecution."

Dobriansky said she has been asked by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to lead a task force to respond to the situation.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary subcommittee on immigration, last week welcomed the creation of the task force to deal with "this massive humanitarian crisis in Iraq and neighboring countries."

Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), who traveled to the Middle East in December, said at a recent briefing at the Council on Foreign Relations that he had told Syrian President Bashar al-Assad that it was in his best interest to help stabilize Iraq and curb insurgent activity to stem the flow of Iraqi refugees into Syria.

An official of an Arab government, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Syria is allowing insurgents to slip across its borders into Iraq while ignoring the transfer of funds to Iraqi insurgents through its territory from Iran and from radical Sunni individuals in Saudi Arabia.

Guterres, who has visited the region, told reporters Wednesday that Syria and Jordan, though not signatories to the 1951 U.N. convention on refugees, were bearing the brunt of Iraq's refugee crisis "based on their own Arab hospitality tradition." He suggested that the generosity of the past few years was taking a toll on those countries.

The influx of hundreds of thousands of refugees is burdening their infrastructures, education and health systems and raising concerns about security, Guterres added.

He visited Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Syria and Jordan before coming to Washington to discuss how protection and assistance can be provided to Iraqi refugees.

Dobriansky said Washington would fully support a conference by the U.N. refugee agency to be held in Geneva in April to secure pledges from international donors. The $18 million U.S. pledge to the agency will be in addition to more than $76 million it has provided for worldwide operations over the last four years.

Guterres said that the 7,000 refugees to be resettled in the United States would be the first of 20,000 who will eventually be resettled in third countries.

U.S. To Take More Iraqi Refugees (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration said it would allow about 7,000 Iraqi refugees into the U.S., following bipartisan complaints in Congress that the administration wasn't doing enough to help them.

But while the White House tried to tamp down criticism of one aspect of its Iraq policy, new political troubles emerged over plans to add 21,500 troops to the effort, as Republican fissures appeared in the House yesterday during floor debate on the conflict.

According to the United Nations, more than two million Iraqis -- many of whom worked with U.S. efforts there -- have fled the country. Most have found their way to camps in Jordan and Syria; both countries have taken steps to curb the influx.

Initially, the Bush administration did little to welcome Iraqi refugees, in part to avoid acknowledging that instability in the country had become a long-term phenomenon. Fewer than 500 Iraqis have been admitted to the U.S. as refugees since 2003, officials said at a recent Senate hearing.

U.S. lawmakers and even some military leaders say more should be done to help Iraqi refugees, especially those who have assisted the U.S. war effort. Of particular concern are the Iraqi interpreters whom soldiers and Marines often depend on for information. About 5,000 have served; more than 250 have been killed and many others injured. They often wind up with refugees who have headed to Jordan, among other countries. Seeing themselves as combat veterans, most would like to emigrate to the U.S., but often must return to Iraq, where they and their families face heightened risk because of their American affiliation.

The U.S. plan also envisions giving special treatment to Iraqis still in the country whose cooperation with the U.S. puts them at risk of reprisal. The U.S. plans to contribute about $18 million for a world-wide resettlement and relief program.

The refugee announcement came as the House continued a nonbinding debate on Iraq, in which Democrats stepped aside for two hours, while the minority aired its differences with the White House.

The remarkable situation developed after North Carolina Rep. Walter Jones was given an hour's debate time to control as the lead Republican co-sponsor of a nonbinding resolution of disapproval challenging the troop surge. Mr. Jones, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, then yielded to a succession of like-minded Republicans whose speeches against the troop increase were interspersed with remarks by Republicans supporting the administration's policy.

The result was a two-hour snapshot of a growing party split that poses the most serious threat to the White House as it tries to sustain long-term support for the war. Those opposing the president include Reps. Phil English (R., Pa.) and Fred Upton (R., Mich.) with coveted seats on leadership committees such as Ways and Means, and Energy and Commerce. Mr. Jones later predicted 30 Republicans may yet support the resolution of disapproval when it comes to a House vote, most likely tomorrow.

The landscape has changed significantly from June, when only three House Republicans broke with the party leadership on a 256-153 vote supportive of the administration's war policy. "If you oppose the surge, the troops will be demoralized, we're told," said Rep. Howard Coble (R., N.C.) "I think not. I believe they would more readily be demoralized if we were willy-nilly, rubber stamping every issue confronting us."

At a news conference earlier in the day, Mr. Bush played down the significance of the House debate, saying "they have every right to express their opinion, and it is a nonbinding resolution." But he warned Congress against trying to cut funds in future votes, saying: "We have a responsibility, all of us here in Washington, to make sure that our men and women in uniform have the resources and flexibility they need to prevail."

7,000 Iraqi Refugees Allowed To Enter U.S. (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The United States agreed yesterday to allow up to 7,000 Iraqi refugees to enter the country, greatly expanding the number allowed until now. It also agreed to pay more to help Iraq's Arab neighbors cope with the human tide fleeing increasing violence and economic hardship in their country.

The decision for this fiscal year came after mounting political and diplomatic pressure on the Bush administration to do more to remedy the consequences of a war it largely started. Only 202 Iraqis were allowed in last year.

The administration also said it will immediately contribute $18 million for a worldwide resettlement and relief program. The United Nations has asked for $60 million from nations around the world.

Although the United Nations estimates that 3.8 million Iraqis have fled their homes since the war began nearly four years ago, Washington has allowed only about 600 to settle in the United States.

The U.S. proposal also includes plans to offer special treatment for Iraqis still in their country whose cooperation with the U.S. puts them at risk. Expanding visa programs for those Iraqis would require legislation in Congress, State Department Undersecretary Paula J. Dobriansky said yesterday.

Some 2 million Iraqis have left their country, and an additional 1.8 million are thought to have relocated inside Iraq. The refugee flow has increased sharply as sectarian violence has increased over the past year. The numbers have overwhelmed the hospitality of Arab neighbors such as Syria and Jordan.

The United Nations says most of those who have been uprooted have no desire to come to the United States, and want to return to their homes in Iraq when fighting stops.

But allies, U.N. diplomats and lawmakers of both parties have recently told the administration that the small number of Iraqis the U.S. has allowed in looks bad.

Sen. Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at a hearing last week that the United States could bring in 7,000 Iraqis this year -- exactly the number announced yesterday.

The move is a step in the right direction, considering the United States is a "chief cause" of the refugee problem, said Carolyn Saour, an Iraqi-American Christian living in Houston. Still, 7,000 "is severely low for the amount of damage that's been done over the years," she said.

The United Nations wants to resettle 20,000 of the most vulnerable refugees this year. U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees Antonio Guterres called the U.S. pledge "a relevant contribution."

Mr. Guterres has implicitly criticized the United States in the past for allowing other nations to shoulder so much of the burden. He met with Miss Rice yesterday, and afterward described the session as a "very frank and very positive discussion on how to work better."

Asked if the U.S. contribution was, in essence, too little too late, Mr. Guterres said "the dimension of the problem is so large" that no effort could really be enough.

The U.N. estimates that 40,000 to 50,000 people flee Iraq each month with dwindling options of where to go. Most have fled to Syria and Jordan, both of which have recently tried to restrict the influx.

Other Iraqis relocate inside their country, with some leaving neighborhoods that were once mixed among Sunnis and Shi'ites and resettling where their sect is more concentrated. Unlike most of the movement to other countries, some of the internal relocations will probably be permanent.

The U.N. says some 500,000 fled their homes to other parts of Iraq in 2006 alone and the number could reach 2.3 million -- nearly one in 10 Iraqis -- by the end of 2007.

This month, Mr. Guterres' Geneva-based agency made an emergency appeal for $60 million to help fleeing Iraqis.

"Unremitting violence in Iraq will likely mean continued mass internal and external displacement affecting much of the surrounding region," it said.

U.S. diplomats have discussed the refugee problem directly with the Jordanian and Syrian governments in recent days, Mrs. Dobriansky said. That is notable because of the administration's reluctance to engage Syria in high-level discussions about security in Iraq.

Syria has taken in an estimated 1 million Iraqis. It was the last Arab country to take in large numbers.

Nasser Judeh said 7,000 is still a small number compared with the 700,000 Jordan has had to accommodate. The U.S. number "is just 1 percent of the number we have," Mr. Judeh said.

Iraq's Other Surge (WSJ)

By Bill Frelick

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Najah worked as an interpreter for the U.S. military at the Falcon base in Baghdad. One day as he left base, a car sprayed him with bullets, hitting him in both legs and his abdomen. Najah left the hospital after two days, fearing insurgents would find him there and kill him: "After the shooting, everyone knew I was working for the Americans." After recovering sufficiently, he fled to Jordan, where he is stuck without papers, and could be deported at any time.

While Washington debates the surge of troops to Iraq, it has only recently begun to acknowledge the surge in refugees leaving Iraq. The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that 50,000 per month are fleeing Iraq and that their numbers in neighboring countries may soon reach two million. Yet last year the U.S. admitted only 202 Iraqi refugees, and has done next to nothing since the war began to assist neighboring countries to bear the refugee burden. Condoleezza Rice unveiled a new plan on Wednesday to resettle 7,000 Iraqi refugees. After three years of ignoring the refugee fallout from the war, this is a welcome first step. But will it be enough to convince Syria and Jordan to keep doors open?

While America has a special obligation to rescue Iraqis who have been specifically persecuted because they helped U.S. troops or Americans working in Iraq, it is central to U.S. interests to address the destabilizing effects and humanitarian needs in the region of a much larger group of refugees -- Sunnis and Shiites fleeing mixed areas, members of the professional classes, religious minorities, and people perceived as Western in orientation.

This week the crisis worsened when Syria tightened residency rules for a million Iraqi refugees there, raising fears that mass deportations will begin. Jordan has started barring single men between 17 and 35 at the border and is unwilling to recognize 700,000 Iraqis living there as refugees. Neither country has received more than token assistance from the international community that might convince them to keep their doors open. International donors provided only $14 million of UNHCR's $29 million request last year for refugees in the region. The U.S. provided 27%.

First, the U.S. needs to make sure that neighboring countries have resources to provide for the refugees' basic needs. The total UNHCR request of $60 million for this year is what the U.S. spends every five hours to fight the war. The U.S. shouldn't waste precious weeks quibbling with the Europeans on their contributions. The sum is modest, part of the price of the war: Just pay it. Second, assistance should have strings attached. Jordan and Syria must keep their doors open to refugees. They must allow Iraqi children to go to school. Humanitarian aid should enable refugees to stay in the region in conditions of safety and dignity until it is safe for them to go home.

Finally, the U.S. needs to move quickly to resettle significant numbers of Iraqi refugees, particularly those who risked their lives to help Americans, who cannot go home. Resettlement not only fulfills a moral responsibility with deep roots -- Hungary, the Bay of Pigs, Vietnam. It also shows the Middle East that the U.S. is committed to helping with the most difficult part of any refugee emergency -- where to put the people themselves. Resettlement ultimately shows solidarity both with the people who put their lives on the line in the U.S. war effort and with the countries who need to be convinced that they will not be left to bear the burden alone.

Mr. Frelick is the refugee policy director for Human Rights Watch.

Translator Who Faked Identity Pleads Guilty To Having Secret Data (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

An Arabic translator who used an assumed identity to get work as a contractor for the U.S. Army in Iraq pleaded guilty yesterday to federal charges of possessing classified national defense documents, including sensitive material about the insurgency that he took from an 82nd Airborne Division intelligence group in 2004.

The translator obtained U.S. citizenship under a false identity before securing a job in August 2003 with Titan Corp., which supplied translators to the U.S. military to aid in fighting the war in Iraq. The man then used his false identity to get secret and top-secret clearances -- access to extremely sensitive material that is supposed to be given only after thorough background checks -- Justice Department officials said.

Authorities said yesterday in a news release that they do not even know the translator's real name and that they refer to him in court documents under several of his aliases, including "Abu Hakim" and "Abdulhakeem Nour."

The man pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court in New York to having several documents in his Brooklyn apartment after two deployments to Iraq. He earlier pleaded guilty to charges of using a false identity to obtain U.S. citizenship and to gain access to classified military material.

U.S. District Judge Edward R. Korman could sentence him to up to 60 years in prison.

The man's federal public defender did not return calls to her office yesterday.

According to court papers, the translator illegally downloaded classified documents that "detail the 82nd Airborne's mission in Iraq in regard to insurgent activity, such as coordinates of insurgent locations upon which the U.S. Army was preparing to fire in January 2004," as well as plans for protecting Sunnis on their pilgrimage to Mecca that same month. Government lawyers also said that he photographed a classified battle map at a base near Najaf.

Officials did not say what the translator hoped to do with the information, but officials considered his efforts a dangerous breach.

Mark J. Mershon, assistant director in charge of the FBI's New York field office, said in a statement yesterday that the man has been consistent in his lies.

"Through serial deception, an eminently untrustworthy person inveigled his way into a position of trust, and he abused that trust," Mershon said.

The man had worked for Titan Corp., which in late summer 2005 became L-3 Titan Group, a subsidiary of New York-based L-3 Communications. The company has held a significant contract for linguistic services in Iraq and company officials say they have more than 5,000 linguists under contract in Iraq until mid-March. A Washington-area consortium unseated L-3 in December when it was awarded a five-year Army contract worth up to $4.6 billion to provide the linguists beginning in March.

Evan Goetz, a spokesman for L-3, declined to discuss the case involving the translator, saying, "The company doesn't comment on legal matters."

British Court-Martial Drops Charges In Iraq Abuse Case (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 14 — A court-martial on Wednesday dropped charges against four of seven soldiers accused of mistreating Iraqi civilians, an unexpected twist in a politically charged trial that jeopardized the reputation of the British military. It also dropped the remaining charges against a fifth soldier who had already pleaded guilty.

The four soldiers included Col. Jorge Mendonca, 43, who had been the highest-ranking British officer to face prosecution related to the accusations against the British soldiers involved in the American-led military effort in Iraq.

While the abuse charges against British troops have not been as graphic or as sweeping as those leveled, for example, against American forces at the Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad, they have nonetheless played into the deeply divisive debate here about whether Britain should have joined an unpopular war as the United States' main ally.

The court-martial revolves around events in Basra, in southern Iraq, during a period of high tension in September 2003, when, prosecutors said, nine Iraqi detainees were hooded, handcuffed, deprived of sleep and beaten for a 36-hour period before interrogation. One of the nine Iraqi men, a hotel receptionist named Baha Musa, died of multiple injuries in a British Army barracks. The other eight were released without being charged. They had been rounded up as British troops looked for Iraqis said to be responsible for killing British military personnel.

The case has had a high profile from its beginning last September when one defendant, Cpl. Donald Payne, 35, pleaded guilty to treating the detainees inhumanely, the first British soldier to admit to an offense defined under international law as a war crime. He has not yet been sentenced.

But on Wednesday, Judge Stuart McKinnon ruled that prosecutors had produced insufficient evidence to bring charges against four of the seven men, as well as two additional charges against Corporal Payne. The judge said he made his decision in part because the Iraqi civilians were hooded and could not physically identify the soldiers who beat them.

Judge McKinnon dropped charges that Colonel Mendonca, a highly decorated officer, had performed his duties negligently. Assault charges against Sgt. Kelvin Stacey, 30, were dropped, while Lance Cpl. Wayne Crowcroft, 22, and Private Darren Fallon, 23, were cleared of treating Iraqis inhumanely.

The judge did not drop charges of negligence against Maj. Michael Peebles, 35, and Warrant Officer Mark Davies, 37, and their trial is set to continue on Monday. Judge McKinnon did not give any reasons for his action. He had spent a week considering his decision and then instructed the panel of seven army officers hearing the case to acquit the five soldiers, The Press Association news agency reported.

Some opposition politicians said the judge's action showed that the government had been overzealous in seeking to appease Iraqi public opinion by putting a high-ranking officer on trial.

"A whiff of political correctness hangs heavy over the case against Colonel Mendonca, with law officers determined to have military officers prosecuted," said Liam Fox, the opposition Conservative Party's spokesman on defense issues. "There is no doubt that episodes like this have caused deep resentment and a loss of confidence across the British Army."

But the judge's decision was also likely to inspire criticism by the families of the Iraqis whose treatment in custody led to the charges. In a statement, the Ministry of Defense said, "Where evidence is found to support prosecutions, as in this case, those involved will face appropriate actions."

The prosecution in the case had said the soldiers suspected that the Iraqis they had detained had been implicated in killing six British military police officers and a British soldier. The defendants, it said, found weapons and ammunition at a hotel they raided.

Ahmad Taha Musa al-Matari, a part-owner of the hotel, was the only Iraq detainee to testify at the court-martial. He testified that the men were held in baking temperatures and that the accused soldiers had laughed and taken bets as they beat a prisoner.

Quest To Heal Iraqi Boy Became A Final Mission (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Hours before getting killed the way he feared most, Capt. Brian S. Freeman looked up and smiled when Abu Ali dropped by his office.

After nearly six months of overcoming financial and bureaucratic hurdles in a war zone, Freeman told the Iraqi man, there were promising signs that a pair of U.S. visas -- the last big step in getting Abu Ali's 11-year-old son to the United States for lifesaving heart surgery -- would be issued soon.

The Iraqi was speechless. He asked an interpreter to express his gratitude to the tall American soldier who had made saving the child's life an unofficial mission. Then he pulled out his camera, swung his arm around Freeman's broad shoulders and posed for three photographs.

Hours later, shortly before sunset Jan. 20, armed men in GMC trucks stormed into the government building in Karbala, in southern Iraq. They killed an American soldier, handcuffed Freeman and three other U.S. soldiers, hauled them into the vehicles and drove off. Freeman and the other abducted soldiers were later slain by the attackers.

He was unenthusiastic about the war, but once his uniform was on, friends said, Freeman embarked on his mission with the optimism and stamina that defined him.

"Most of us here understand the politics of war," said Capt. Matthew Lawton, one of Freeman's close friends in Iraq. "Brian didn't really agree with the war, I think. But he understood, going to West Point, going to the military -- that was the right thing to do."

The local police chief pulled Freeman aside one day in late April and told him about the ailing boy.

The second of five children, Ali Abdulameer was born with a debilitating heart condition that gradually restricted his blood flow. Barring surgery, his father said, the boy's chances of making it to adulthood were slim. Physicians in Karbala and Baghdad offered bleak prognoses.

"Baghdad doctors always gave me promises, but nothing ever happened," Abu Ali said.

After hearing about the case, Freeman got online and typed the words "Iraqi kids heart surgery" into the Google search query. The name of a fellow civil affairs soldier he didn't know popped up. He sent her a note asking for help.

Staff Sgt. Marikay Satryano, an Army Reservist from Tarrytown, N.Y., had become something of an expert in cutting through red tape to get Iraqi children abroad for critical medical care. Stationed at the U.S. Embassy in Amman, Jordan, Satryano wrote back outlining how to get the process started.

"Here's the hard part: funding," she wrote. "We are penniless here. No budget, no pot of gold." As soldiers, they were barred from soliciting money directly, she explained. "But we CAN make people aware of this child, SO if you know persons that are interested in saving this child, the magic number is $8,000 USD. Yup. That'll do it."

Freeman spent the next few months collecting medical records and contacting charity organizations. His wife, Charlotte, helped out, making calls and sending e-mails.

Freeman e-mailed the chairman of Gift of Life International, a New York-based nonprofit organization that connects low-income children suffering from serious heart ailments with top-notch hospitals. Cases that originate in Iraq are among the toughest the foundation tackles because errands that are complicated anywhere have become an odyssey in Iraq.

Freeman had to get Ali Abdulameer's medical records to doctors in New York and apply for U.S. visas at the consulate in Amman. The Iraqis had to obtain new passports with enhanced security features now required for visa applicants from the Middle East. And they had to provide documentation to prove that the child was stable enough for the 13-hour flight to New York.

Gradually, the pieces began coming together. Schneider Children's Hospital in New York agreed to perform the operation at a reduced fee and Gift of Life took the case.

"A child is a common dominator between all of us," said Robert Donno, Gift of Life chairman. "The person in Iraq and the person in Amman and the person in New Jersey understand what this child means to his father."

Freeman sent a flurry of e-mails each week to get status reports and answer questions. He mailed medical records, set up appointments and helped with passport and visa errands.

Before heading to California for a vacation in December, Freeman stopped by the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, left his home phone number and personal e-mail and asked the embassy officials who had been tracking the case to keep him updated.

He returned to Karbala in January. Near the end of the week of Jan. 14, he checked in with Satryano. He always was positive and polite, she said, but they both worried that a problem with the visa application that might set them back several weeks, while Ali Abdulameer's condition deteriorated.

"We had been touching base all week," Satryano said. "How's it going, how's it going? You know how bugs in the summer call to each other."

Freeman's time in Iraq made him reexamine what he wanted to do with his life, friends said. He thought about going to graduate school after finishing his tour and talked of starting a nonprofit organization to get Iraqi children medical care abroad. "Vets for Kids," they could call it, he told a fellow soldier. His eagerness to help Ali Abdulameer, a boy he never met, was an effort to make meaningful contributions in a devastated country.

"It may have started with a program we saw on Doctors Without Borders," his wife, Charlotte, said in a telephone interview. "He was very moved by the fact that these people went to dangerous situations and helped out, and their philosophy was that's how you let people around the world know there are good people who will help. That was his vision."

On Jan. 20, Freeman went online and tried to get a new case off the ground. He had come across the medical file of a critically ill girl younger than Ali Abdulameer. Again, he set out to beat the odds.

"These are very poor and do not have a G-Series passport," Freeman wrote in an e-mail to a colleague at the military's National Iraqi Assistance Center in Baghdad, referring to passports with enhanced security features. "A trip to Baghdad might be out of their reach financially. If we get close to something happening on this, I can raise the money."

That evening a group of English-speaking armed men wearing what looked like American military uniforms and badges drove up to the building in a convoy of at least six GMC trucks.

The men stormed into the building and detonated sound bombs and grenades. Freeman was in his office and didn't get to his weapon in time. He and three of the soldiers who reported to him were abducted at gunpoint.

It was among his biggest fears. The conventional wisdom among soldiers had it that they'd save their last bullet for themselves rather than fall into the hands the enemy alive.

"We all talked about that," said Capt. Henry Domeracki, one of Freeman's close friends in Iraq. "You know what they do -- cut off our heads, burn us."

The attackers drove into neighboring Babil province, several miles away.

"That is the hardest thing when I think about Brian," Domeracki said. "We know that he was in the car with the cuffs on. We know he was praying, asking God to look after his kids."

The gunmen abandoned five of the vehicles. Iraqi soldiers later found the bodies of two soldiers handcuffed together in the back of one of the vehicles. Freeman's body was left on the ground. All three had been fatally shot. The fourth soldier was found alive, but died en route to the hospital.

Abu Ali was notified the following day by an interpreter who worked with the soldier. He was crushed, but understood he needed to mourn in silence.

"I could not express myself openly," said Abu Ali, who asked that his full name not be published out of concern for his safety. "If I were to express myself openly they'd know I deal with Americans and if they knew I deal with Americans they'd call me a traitor."

Freeman's group of close friends in Iraq -- "The Dirty Dozen," they called themselves -- were inconsolable.

"The first three days, all of us cried," Domeracki said. "All of us cried for three days."

The following night, Satryano was working late. She dropped by the consulate, where the woman tracking the pair's visas was still at her desk.

"Actually, that came in today," the consulate official told her, referring to the approval notices.

"We lost a civil affairs soldier," he told her.

"I heard," she responded. "Do you know who it was?"

"Captain Freeman," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0132590

"No way!" she said. "This is his kid! I just talked to him yesterday, like at 12."

He was one of the good guys, she thought to herself that night. Why did they have to kill one of the good guys?

Freeman was buried Feb. 1. He left behind two children, Gunnar, who will turn 3 next month, and Ingrid, a 1-year-old who began taking her first steps while he was home for Christmas.

Ali Abdulameer and his father are expected to arrive in New York this week. After the surgery, they hope to meet Freeman's widow.

"I want to be there for the father," Charlotte said. "I'm sure he has a need to meet me just as I feel the need to meet him."

Where US Is Helping To Make Gains Against Terrorism (CSM)

By Simon Montlake

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2007

It's the kind of item that doesn't show up in defense budget audits: A $200 tin-roofed communal outhouse, or "comfort room," tucked behind the village market. To US Army Capt. Steve Battle, who split the construction cost with his Philippine counterparts, it's money well spent.

Gaining the trust of residents in Panamao, a stricken village on the edge of a combat zone, is why US and Philippine troops are dug in here. In counterterrorism jargon, this Muslim community is a "center of gravity" that can be swayed with targeted projects – a new well, a school classroom, or a toilet. "It's not the amount of people that you affect. It's who you affect," says Captain Battle, a civil-affairs officer.

At a time when success stories in the US-led war on terror have been all but eclipsed by failures in Iraq, recent developments in the southern Philippines offer a degree of hope to Pentagon planners. But they also show the complexity of waging war in a contested, chaotic area, as well as the long slog needed to stand up a national army equal to sure-footed militants.

Five years after Philippine troops, supplied and advised by US soldiers, drove Islamic militants from the island of Basilan, a major offensive is under way on Jolo Island, where the militants regrouped. The goal is to deny sanctuary to the remaining members of Abu Sayyaf, one of several insurgent groups who have been fighting for a separate Islamist state. Since August, elite Philippine units have killed or captured as many as half of an estimated 400 Abu Sayyaf on Jolo Island, including their slain leader Khadaffy Janjalani and several other senior operatives.

Philippine commanders on Jolo say they are confident their 7,000-strong troops can finish the job. "They lack ammunition, they're on the run, and we're continually pressuring them. They are in a position to be neutralized," says Army Gen. Ruperto Pabustan of the local militia.

If so, the Philippine military would end a reign of terror by a group that was founded by Osama bin Laden's brother-in-law in the early 1990s. Abu Sayyaf later morphed into a kidnapping racket that became almost indistinguishable from the criminal gangs that plague the Philippines' remote regions. While that makes Abu Sayyaf something of a footnote to the global war on terror, it is no less a spoiler in the Philippine government's efforts to build a lasting peace on troubled Mindanao.

Shortly after 9/11, the southern Philippines was widely considered to be the global war on terror's "second front" after Afghanistan. Philippine President Gloria Arroyo, a staunch US ally, invited American troops to assist in the fight against Abu Sayyaf, but ruled out any combat role for them. A joint US military taskforce was created to equip and train Philippine troops deploying on Basilan Island, where Abu Sayyaf then held sway.

At the same time, US and Philippine Army engineers fanned out across Basilan to build roads and bridges, trying to drive a wedge between Abu Sayyaf and local sympathizers. It largely worked, but tactical blunders allowed militant leaders to escape and regroup.

Today, the US military is using the same formula on Jolo, a kidney-shaped island convulsed by decades of Muslim rebellion against the Christian-dominated Philippine government. Advised by US Special Forces, Philippine troops have closed in on Abu Sayyaf, while naval patrols have cut off escape routes to other islands.

Even after five years of substantial military aid, US officers are quick to give credit to their allies for the victories.

"It's a Philippines success story. They're the one doing the heavy lifting and doing the fighting and helping the people and we're providing support," says Col. David Maxwell, commander of the joint taskforce, who led the 2002 Basilan operation.

Frontline troops have also won plaudits from their political masters in Manila, as well as pledges of more money and equipment. But similar promises have in the past failed to reach soldiers in the field, fuelling complaints of embezzlement by top brass. In 2003, junior officers serving in Mindanao staged a brief mutiny in Manila to protest such graft. Troops have also been accused of selling weapons and colluding with kidnappers and rebels, undermining trust among local residents.

Perhaps most acute is the need to channel funds into poor communities like Panamao, where schoolteachers say they haven't been paid for over a year. Analysts argue that without a strong focus on social development and civic leadership, any military victory on Jolo could be short-lived.

"Once the money and the Americans go, how far will the Philippines be able to keep up the community development?" says Scott Harrison, a security consultant and a former CIA officer.

"You can wipe out the entire leadership of Abu Sayyaf and [Jemaah Islamiyah], but unless you solve the underlying root problems like poverty and corruption, you've still got a witch's brew to create another generation of fanatics," he says.

Experts Fear Afghanistan Could Become The Next Iraq (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON - While President Bush and Congress argue over Iraq, experts warn that Afghanistan could slip back into chaos.

U.S. commanders are bracing for a spring offensive by Taliban insurgents that'll test the staying power of the fragile U.S.-backed Afghan government.

In a sign of the administration's concern, President Bush will deliver a speech Thursday highlighting plans for a dramatic increase in military and economic aid, but skeptics fear that the renewed focus on Afghanistan may be too little and too late.

"We have our finger in the dike because our resources and attention were turned toward Iraq," said Rep. Joe Sestak, D-Pa., a former Navy admiral who served in both conflicts. "This is the real front in the war on terrorism. It's a daunting task, more daunting than it had to be because we let the opportunity almost slip away."

Administration officials and U.S. military commanders agree that Afghanistan is grappling with potentially crippling challenges. Five years after U.S. troops ousted the Taliban regime and its al-Qaida allies in retaliation for the Sept. 11 attacks, Afghanistan is still embroiled in war, terrorism, drug trafficking and instability.

The government of President Hamid Karzai has a shaky hold on power; the Taliban and al-Qaida continue to launch attacks from their haven along the Afghan-Pakistan border; and opium production has increased dramatically. Attacks by Islamic extremists spiked last year, making 2006 the deadliest year since the U.S. invasion.

"A point could be reached at which the government of Afghanistan becomes irrelevant to its people, and the goal of establishing a democratic, moderate, self-sustaining state could be lost forever," Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the former top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, told the House Armed Services Committee on Tuesday.

Government officials and outside experts agree that the biggest threat isn't a Taliban military takeover, it's the possibility that the Karzai government could collapse and leave a void for Islamic extremists.

"The Taliban are not going to roll on a tank column into Kabul. They are weak militarily. But the government is very weak politically. Even some small symbolic victories by the Taliban could lead to a political crisis," said Barnett Rubin, an Afghanistan expert at New York University.

The crucial test could come this spring as the thaw opens snow-packed mountain passes. This year, U.S. officials want to meet the annual Taliban offensive with their own, to shore up Karzai's government.

Bush has asked Congress for $6.7 billion in emergency funding to help train Afghan security forces and rebuild the country, the first installment in a $10.6 billion package for Afghanistan over the next two years.

Until now, U.S. aid to Afghanistan has averaged less than $3 billion a year.

The Pentagon also plans to add about 3,200 more troops by delaying the planned departure of units that had been scheduled to come home. Administration officials are also pressuring NATO allies and Pakistan to do more to help protect the fledgling Afghan government.

The United States has about 27,000 troops in Afghanistan, with about 16,000 assigned to a multinational NATO force. U.S. allies have contributed about 20,000 troops, but many of them are under restrictions that prevent combat operations.

The president will promote his plans Thursday to the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank.

"We're taking a comprehensive approach. It's a question of building the security, but also building the government and building the economy," said Richard Boucher, the assistant secretary of state for the region.

Afghanistan Officials Question Drug-eradication, Nomination (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 15, 2007

Afghan officials in Washington are redoubling their advocacy efforts to capitalize on Congress and the Bush administration's renewed focus on their country — and to prevent their country from slipping back into Taliban hands.

DOJ_NMG_0132592

Embassy officials are calling the Bush administration's drug-eradication policy in Afghanistan a flawed solution to the problem and are speculating on how a new U.S. ambassador to their country will influence the struggle against the narcotics trade and how the U.S. will change the management of foreign aid there.

"It is a mistake to think that you will solve the drug issue through spraying" the poppy cultures, a counselor at the embassy, Masood Aziz, said. "If you start spraying you lose the hearts and minds of the population. Spraying has devastating effects on the poor."

Similarly, a London-based drug-policy research group, the Senlis Council, has reported that drug eradication by itself ruins small farmers and drives them toward the Taliban who, in turn, provide loans and protection.

While rushing to counter such policies, the embassy is watching closely William Wood's nomination to become the new U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan. Wood previously served as U.S. ambassador to Colombia.

"We hope that with the new ambassador the focus won't be the wrong focus," Aziz said, implying that the strategies of the Colombian war on drugs would fail in Afghanistan.

Poppies, which have been a more lucrative cash crop than wheat or other alternatives, sustain about 2 million small farmers and their families, in a country with a population of about 31 million.

Without offering alternative sources of income and long-term assistance to poppy growers, Afghanistan could be hard-pressed to kick its drug problem. Some estimate that nearly 50 percent of Afghanistan's GDP comes from poppy cultures.

Afghan officials want to influence how the narcotics trade is fought, and seek to ensure that international aid is spent effectively, which so far has proved a challenge.

Attaining, or even defining, success in Afghanistan is a tall order, acknowledged Ashraf Haidari, a political counselor at the Embassy of Afghanistan.

"We need time and resources," he said. "We do not want 70 percent of Afghan people to be farmers. It may take up to 30 years to rid Afghanistan of its drug problem and institute alternative livelihood," he explained.

Assistance has to be spread across all regions, not only given to those who rely on narcotics for their livelihood. Already, citizens of regions that did not grow poppy in other years have started to do so because they had no other support, Haidari said.

Afghanistan also considers developing government capacity critical to quashing the narcotics trade and building up the country.

To that end, officials are eyeing the reauthorization of the Afghanistan Freedom Support Act of 2002 in hopes that aid can be channeled to build up the Afghanistan's now-minimal governmental capacity. The country has no effective judicial establishment and weak law enforcement, Haidari said.

"The face of the government is the judicial system," he added.

House Foreign Affairs chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) has expressed keen interest in reauthorizing titles I and II of the Afghanistan Freedom Support Act, which address assistance and security for the country. The reauthorization could increase focus on drug interdiction and destruction, according to sources.

"Counter-narcotics is absolutely an issue that is fundamental to change the society in Afghanistan," a congressional source said.

The House and the Senate Foreign Relations Committees together soon will discuss a comprehensive strategy for Afghanistan, the aide added.

The source said Congress will consider a much more "holistic" approach on Afghanistan, but ultimately it is the administration's call to implement it.

"We are sensitive to over-legislating and over-prescribing because that would encumber the administration, but we want to pressure the administration," the source said.

While the Bush administration has a five-tier plan for Afghanistan, partly focused on fostering alternative livelihoods, it has primarily concentrated on building roads and infrastructure, the congressional source said.

The rationale is "we are building roads because where the road ends the Taliban begins," the source said. "But that is not to say that if you build infrastructure the Taliban will go away."

Haidari takes a similar view. "Afghanistan is singular in all its problem and needs a singular solution," he said. "Afghanistan is a country that we need to start building from scratch."

But to do that officials there want to ensure funds are spent on the right priorities.

"We are certainly extremely appreciative of the money allocated and committed, but the issue of the money not being effectively spent is a tremendous problem," Aziz said, adding that Afghanistan will need about $30 billion in aid over the next seven to 10 years. The United States alone has given $14 billion to Afghanistan since 2001.

While the disbursement rate of the money has been steady, if often has not reached the targeted beneficiaries through the Afghani government and other institutions.

Channeled instead through non-governmental organizations and contractors, overhead absorbed most of the money. Only a fraction actually reached the country, Haidari said.

"We want to see results," Haidari said. "We want action not just words. The problems in Iraq make Afghanistan look like a success, but Afghan lives have not changed."

Afghanistan's pitch to Capitol Hill may come at a critical time. The embassy's priorities, which could shore up support for the government, fall against the backdrop of the possibility of a renewed Taliban offensive this spring. U.S. and international forces are expanding in preparation for potential attacks.

Poverty has helped to boost Taliban ranks. The radical Islamic movement lately has been able to recruit new fighters — including those who do not believe in its mission, according to Haidari — by offering to pay about $300 a month to support their families versus a per capita income of roughly $300 per year.

Senators Oppose Effort To Replace Federal Prosecutors (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON - Congressional Democrats and some Republicans are trying to change part of the USA Patriot Act that allows the Bush administration to fire and replace federal prosecutors indefinitely without Senate confirmation.

Freshly briefed by the Justice Department on the forced resignations of some of the seven U.S. attorneys since the act took effect, Senate Democrats planned to bring a bill to the floor Thursday that would impose a 120-day deadline on the amount of time a replacement could serve without Senate confirmation.

After that, an interim replacement would be named by a U.S. District Court, a policy Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and some Republicans say could lead to the appointments of prosecutors for reasons other than their qualifications.

Democrats say that's just the problem with the policy under the terror-fighting law that went into effect in March.

Since then, seven U.S. attorneys have been fired, some without cause, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee. Democrats contend that prosecutors were forced to resign to make way for Republican political allies, and that the White House slipped the provision into the Patriot Act to permit such indefinite appointments.

Congress passed the reauthorization with overwhelming bipartisan support, but many lawmakers say they were unaware of the provision. The president appoints federal prosecutors, who are subject to Senate confirmation.

Gonzales has said he intends to submit every newly appointed interim prosecutor to the Senate confirmation process and denied that his choices were politically motivated. He also has pointed out that U.S. attorneys serve at the president's pleasure and can be fired for any reason or no reason at all.

Nonetheless, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada is expected to try to bring the bill up for a vote Thursday, which also is the last day on the job of one of the fired prosecutors, Carol Lam of San Diego.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said last week he would try to block the bill unless Reid agreed to strip out the appointment power of the U.S. District Court.

McNulty briefed senators behind closed doors Wednesday night on the cases of the seven fired prosecutors. Attending the meeting were Republicans Kyl and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Democrats Chuck Schumer of New York, Dianne Feinstein of California and Patty Murray of Washington.

Afterward, Murray said she heard nothing to suggest that the U.S. attorney in her state, John McKay, deserved to be fired. She and other participants refused to comment further.

Earlier this month, McNulty told the committee that most of the seven had been fired for "performance-related" reasons, and that one in Arkansas, Bud Cummins, had been cleared out to make way for a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove.

However, McKay and others had received glowing performance reviews and were not told of performance issues before they were fired, prompting further investigation by the committee.

Murray Not Satisfied With Answers About U.S. Attorney's Firing (AP)

By Gene Johnson

AP, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132594

SEATTLE - Sen. Patty Murray said after sitting in on a closed-door Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Wednesday she heard nothing to suggest that John McKay deserved to be fired as U.S. attorney.

"I heard nothing from Department of Justice officials that changed my mind about John McKay's performance," Murray, D-Wash., said in a telephone interview from Washington, D.C.

She said she was not at liberty to comment further.

McKay, a Republican appointed by President Bush in 2001, was forced to resign as Western Washington's top federal prosecutor last month. He was one of seven U.S. attorneys fired around the country.

Earlier this month, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the committee that most of the seven had been fired for "performance-related" reasons, and that one in Arkansas had been cleared out to make way for a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove.

But McKay and others had received glowing performance reviews and were not told of performance issues before they were fired, prompting further investigation by the committee.

McNulty briefed the committee privately Wednesday.

Lawyers, judges and public officials - Republican and Democratic - have objected to McKay's firing, speculating that it was done because he was not conservative enough for the Bush administration.

U.S. District Judge Robert Lasnik in Seattle said McKay was a "superb U.S. attorney. For the Justice Department to suggest otherwise is just not fair."

A 90-page review of McKay's office, completed by Justice Department staff last April, found him to be "an effective, well-regarded and capable leader," according to a copy obtained by The Associated Press. Though overwhelmingly complimentary, the report raised a few areas of concern, such as making sure prosecutors in the office document all of their overtime and keep records of any cases where they seek sentences below guideline ranges.

U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be fired at any time. A provision in the reauthorization of the Patriot Act allows the attorney general to appoint U.S. attorneys indefinitely without Senate confirmation; several senators are seeking to revoke that provision.

Former Prosecutor Charged With Misconduct In Gang Cases (LAW)

By Brendan Smith, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 15, 2007

Before last week, former federal prosecutor G. Paul Howes had only suffered blows to his reputation for his misconduct in a witness-payment scandal.

But now, Howes, a former Assistant U.S. Attorney in the District, faces serious ethics charges from the D.C. Bar Counsel that could trigger sanctions -- including disbarment.

The charges stem from Howes' improper disbursement of more than $140,000 in federal witness vouchers to 132 people during several high-profile drug trials while he was a prosecutor at the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District in the 1990s. The misconduct, which wasn't noticed until a tip came from one of Howes' informants, resulted in dramatically reduced prison sentences for nine defendants convicted in those trials.

On Feb. 1, the D.C. Bar Counsel filed eight charges against Howes after a four-year investigation, accusing him of violating bar ethics rules by committing criminal acts, making false statements in court, offering prohibited payments to witnesses, and interfering with the administration of justice.

"Prosecuting a [former] U.S. Attorney is not something we do very often. It is pretty, pretty rare," D.C. Bar Counsel Wallace "Gene" Shipp Jr. says. "Charges that include dishonesty are always serious. They are very serious allegations."

Howes, now a partner in the San Diego office of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, didn't return telephone calls seeking comment. His attorney, D.C. defense lawyer Plato Cacheris, also did not return calls.

The Bar Counsel investigation mirrors many of the findings of an internal Justice Department probe completed in 1998, but the Bar Counsel goes beyond that investigation's report in its charge of criminal acts by Howes, including false statements and false certifications.

The Justice Department began a two-year investigation of Howes in 1996, a year after he resigned from the U.S. Attorney's Office, where he spent 11 years as a prosecutor. The report found that Howes used witness vouchers as a personal slush fund that "went so far beyond the limits of appropriate conduct as to constitute flagrant abuse of the system."

Both the Justice and Bar Counsel investigations found that Howes made improper witness-voucher payments to witnesses, friends and relatives of witnesses, incarcerated government witnesses, and former police officers.

Howes authorized the payments -- apparently without oversight from the U.S. Attorney's Office, which, at the time, was headed by Eric Holder Jr. -- in the 1994 federal trial of Newton Street Crew members on drug, murder and racketeering charges and in another D.C. Superior Court homicide trial stemming from the District's crack-cocaine wars.

The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility found intentional misconduct by Howes but decided not to press criminal charges of making false statements, false claims and false certifications because of doubts about convincing a jury of Howes' guilt.

"He undoubtedly would portray himself to a jury, as he has to us, as a beleaguered lone wolf battling a stifling and uncomprehending bureaucracy," the report states.

The U.S. Attorney's Office fought for years to keep the Justice Department report confidential, but ultimately, it was released by a federal judge in 2003.

The Justice Department completed its investigation of Howes in February 1998, but did not refer its findings to the D.C. Bar Counsel until October 2002. Shipp would not comment on why it took the Bar Counsel another four years to investigate and charge Howes.

The Bar Counsel will make disciplinary recommendations after a hearing committee reviews Howes' case, which is scheduled for April 11.

If the committee finds ethics violations, the case will be referred to the Board on Professional Responsibility, and ultimately to the D.C. Court of Appeals if the board recommends censure, suspension or disbarment of Howes.

A QUESTION OF RECIPROCITY

The Justice report was forwarded to attorney-discipline boards in New Mexico and California, where Howes is also licensed. Those bodies have not reported any disciplinary action against Howes from the witness-voucher investigation and are likely awaiting the outcome of the D.C. case, Shipp says. Under reciprocal discipline rules, both states could take action against Howes' law licenses based on any discipline imposed in the District.

Howes, who joined the D.C. federal prosecutor's office in 1984, did not receive his D.C. law license until 1992. Under federal law, he was allowed to practice as a federal prosecutor in the District for more than eight years under his New Mexico law license.

In 1997, the New Mexico Supreme Court publicly censured Howes in a case referred from the District for communicating directly with a defendant without the defense attorney's consent during a murder case in D.C. Superior Court in 1988. Howes also induced a D.C. police detective to talk with the defendant.

After leaving the U.S. Attorney's Office, Howes was licensed in California in 1997, and he has not been publicly disciplined there in any ethics cases, according to California Bar records.

In a 2004 interview with Legal Times about the D.C. Bar Counsel case, Cacheris laid out his strategy for defending Howes, which hinges on two findings of the Justice Department report. The report found no evidence of witness testimony that was altered because of Howes' misconduct and no clear witness-voucher policy at that time in the U.S. Attorney's Office. Cacheris said Howes also cooperated with Justice investigators and "went and bared his soul for three days, as far as I was told."

Howes, who received his law degree from the University of Virginia, has had a long and varied career, including Marine Corps service during the Vietnam War and a stint as tympanist for the New Mexico Symphony Orchestra. Howes later worked as a special assistant to former FBI Director William Webster and as a Washington correspondent for ABC News before being hired by the U.S. Attorney's Office, according to his biography at Lerach Coughlin.

At Lerach Coughlin, Howes has represented the University of California as the lead plaintiff in a federal class action against Enron Corp. in Texas over lost investments.

After the Justice report on Howes' misconduct was made public, the U.S. Attorney's Office instituted new controls and training about witness-voucher payments in 2004. Office spokesman Channing Phillips said last week he is not aware of any witness-voucher abuse after those changes.

Phillips wouldn't comment on the Bar Counsel charges or whether Howes was disciplined by the U.S. Attorney's Office before his resignation.

Fallout from the Howes incident is still being felt, with the U.S. Attorney's Office using him last year to shore up another D.C. murder conviction being challenged over allegations of misconduct by Howes. As part of a government brief asking that the conviction be upheld, Howes filed an affidavit last November in D.C. Superior Court, stating that there were "no undisclosed side agreements or secret promises to any witness" in that 1989 trial.

But Howes' reputation isn't so highly regarded within the U.S. Attorney's Office, according to Amy Jeffress, deputy chief of the office's Organized Crime and Narcotics Trafficking Section. She referred to Howes -- though not by name -- during a Jan. 31 debate on the power of prosecutors at American University, Washington College of Law.

"He actually left the office and moved all the way across the country to San Diego to escape his shame and his bad reputation," Jeffress said, according to a recording of the debate. "He basically became a pariah in our office. His name is a synonym around our office for no-no. You don't want to do what he did."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monster Of A Case: New Wave Of Corporate Indictments Expected (ABC)

By Brian Ross And Richard Esposito

ABC News, February 15, 2007

The former top lawyer for the Internet job search site Monster.com is expected to enter a guilty plea tomorrow growing out of his role in backdating stock options at the company, federal officials involved in the case tell ABC News.

Officials say Myron Olesnyckyj, the former general counsel of Monster, has agreed to plead guilty to charges of securities fraud in federal court in New York city, as part of a deal to cooperate with prosecutors.

Olesnyckyj is expected to provide testimony about his former boss, Andrew McKelvey, the founder and former CEO of Monster.com, the officials say.

Olesnyckyj's attorneys Lisa Caldwell and Robert Romano told ABC News, "We have no comment," on their client's expected guilty plea.

A spokesman for Monster.com said the company was also cooperating but would not comment further.

The plea deal comes as dozens of former CEOs and other corporate officials face possible indictment as the Department of Justice presses its investigation of the backdating of billions of dollars of stock options.

The FBI, IRS and U.S. Postal Inspectors are working on at least 60 active criminal investigations, and federal officials tell ABC News at least a half dozen are now in the final phases of investigation.

"This is a major initiative of the President's Corporate Fraud Task Force," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Sierra.

Dozens of CEOs and other top officials have already resigned over the practice of "stealth compensation," in which executive pay packages have been enhanced by granting executives the right to buy stock at favorably low "strike prices" set by acting as if the options were granted earlier than they were, resulting in a larger potential profit.

Prosecutors say the failure to disclose the backdating can constitute securities fraud.

More than 140 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and federal prosecutors are known to be considering criminal indictments in a number of the SEC cases.

The chairman of Apple Computer, Steve Jobs, has also been questioned by federal investigators in San Francisco about the backdating of stock options at the company. Apple says an internal investigation by its board cleared Jobs and all members of the company's current management of any wrongdoing and says there has been no indication that Jobs is considered a target of any criminal investigation.

"We've given all this information to the SEC," Jobs told ABC News last month. "And I think things are gonna be just fine," he said.

Jobs' role in granting stock options at a second company, Pixar, is also under investigation, according to published reports.

"The Wall Street Journal" reported last week that prosecutors are investigating stock options granted in 2001 by the animated film company Pixar, Inc., to its top film director, John Lasseter, as part of a new 10-year contract.

According to the paper, Lasseter, the director of "Toy Story," received one million stock options at the lowest share price of the year, a date that was three months before his new contract was signed. The backdating resulted in a potential gain for Lasseter of $6.4 million, the paper said.

Pixar was bought last year by Walt Disney Co., the parent company of ABC. Disney officials say the value of Lasseter's options was fully disclosed, although not the fact that they were back dated.

Disney says its board began an independent review of the transaction last November, but Disney CEO Robert Iger says the issue will not likely have any effect on Disney.

"We aren't aware of any basis under which stock options issued by Pixar would have a material impact on our financial statement," Iger said in a statement. Jobs is Disney's single largest shareholder.

"The Wall Street Journal" reported that prosecutors are awaiting the outcome of the Disney board's review before making any decisions on the case.

Two criminal case are already in the federal court system. One involves Comverse Technology of New York, where one executive fled the country and another has entered a guilty plea.

DOJ_NMG_0132597

The chief financial officer of Comverse, David Kreinberg, entered a plea in October to charges of securities fraud. He now faces up to 15 years in prison.

His former boss, Comverse CEO Kobi Alexander, fled to the African country of Namibia, where he is currently fighting U.S. extradition efforts.

Prosecutors Advance In Stock-Option Cases (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle, James Bandler And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Prosecutors are moving forward with more criminal charges over stock-option manipulation.

Yesterday, the founder of video-game maker Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. pleaded guilty to a state felony charge in connection with an options-backdating scheme. Today, federal prosecutors in New York are expected to announce a plea deal with a former executive of Monster Worldwide Inc. in another options case, according to people familiar with the matter.

Ryan A. Brant, founder and former chief executive officer of Take-Two, entered a guilty plea in state court in New York City, striking a deal that requires millions in payments but will likely spare him prison time. It was the first criminal case brought over backdating since last August, when federal prosecutors charged executives of another New York company, Comverse Technology Inc.

In the Monster case, the company's former general counsel, Myron Olesnyckyj, has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors in Manhattan and is expected to describe the role of founder Andrew McKelvey and others in stock-options practices at Monster.

Mr. Olesnyckyj was fired by the company last year. Mr. McKelvey quit rather than be interviewed by company lawyers examining Monster's options problems.

According to people familiar with Monster's email traffic, Mr. Olesnyckyj was the author of several damaging messages, including one in which he advised an executive not to discuss the company's practice of backdating grants to new employees in writing because it might be seen by auditors. The Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to file civil charges against Mr. Olesnyckyj as soon as today, people familiar with the matter say. A separate agreement between Mr. Olesnyckyj and the SEC could come later.

Robert Romano, a lawyer for Mr. Olesnyckyj, didn't respond to a request for comment. Mr. McKelvey's lawyer, Andrew DeVore, declined to comment.

Mr. Brant, 35, the impresario behind Take-Two's catalog of violently controversial games, which includes the Grand Theft Auto series, is the first CEO to be convicted of a crime in the options-backdating scandal and the ninth individual charged by authorities. All told, about 140 companies are under investigation.

Federal prosecutors have charged two former CEOs in the backdating scandal: Gregory Reyes, of Brocade Communications Systems Inc.; and Kobi Alexander, of Comverse. Mr. Reyes has pleaded not guilty, and Mr. Alexander, who decamped to the African nation of Namibia before being charged, is free on bail there while fighting extradition to the U.S.

Under his plea deal with prosecutors and a parallel settlement of civil charges with the SEC, Mr. Brant will pay $7.3 million in disgorgement, fines and other penalties. He could face a prison term of up to four years for the charge of filing false records, but New York prosecutors agreed to recommend that he serve probation.

In a statement, Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau said "CEOs and other executives who deliberately skew their books to hide the full extent of their compensation are engaged in a fraud on their stockholders and creditors."

It isn't Mr. Brant's first experience with the SEC. In 2005, the agency charged him and others with an accounting fraud. He paid more than $3 million in disgorgement and other penalties in that case. He left the company last October after several months on disability leave.

United's Legal Woes May Last Into 2008 (MINNST)

By David Phelps, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 15, 2007

Months of uncertainty lie ahead with shareholder lawsuits against UnitedHealth Group.

It became clear Wednesday that the legal woes of UnitedHealth Group will not be resolved anytime soon.

Lawyers for the Minnetonka company said in federal court it will take up to five months to determine whether shareholder lawsuits against it are valid. The suits are over the purported backdating of stock options for senior executives, which led to the ouster last year of longtime Chief Executive William McGuire.

Also unknown is when federal regulators will complete their investigation into the issue, a pace referred to by U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum as "glacial."

Rosenbaum said he has no intention to dismiss the shareholder lawsuits, as sought by UnitedHealth, "at least not yet."

And should the shareholder lawsuits eventually go to trial, Rosenbaum said he can't fit them in his calendar until late autumn or after the first of the year.

"There's a lot of brush to be hacked through here," Rosenbaum told lawyers for the company and the shareholders during a hearing Wednesday.

Rosenbaum said he would rule later on the company's motion to dismiss the lawsuits on the basis that the board of directors formed a "Special Litigation Committee" to review lawsuits against the company or to stay the proceedings in the case until the committee completes its work.

Barbara Berens, a lawyer representing the special litigation committee, said the two-member panel -- consisting of retired Minnesota Supreme Court justices Kathleen Blatz and Edward Stringer -- hoped to meet a court-imposed July 30 deadline for determining the validity of shareholder lawsuits.

Berens said the committee needs the time partly because the company is in the process of restating 11 years of financial reports to account for backdated options and partly because of ongoing inquiries by the Internal Revenue Service, Justice Department, Securities and Exchange Commission and Minnesota attorney general's office.

Peter Carter, UnitedHealth's lead attorney, agreed with Rosenbaum that the company is legally stuck in neutral until the special committee makes its decision on the shareholder lawsuits.

Karl Cambronne, lead counsel for the shareholders, told Rosenbaum that the investors would be "marginalized" if the case were stayed and the plaintiffs could not proceed with discovery and see the documents that regulators are reviewing.

"If we're put on ice, we'll be perceived as not having anything to add to the discussion," Cambronne said. "Our hands are tied."

SEC Declines To Bring Charges After Probe Of Gradient Analytics (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission has ended an investigation into Gradient Analytics Inc. without bringing any charges against the stock-research firm.

Regulators were investigating charges of market manipulation and collusion between the Scottsdale, Ariz., independent research firm and its hedge-fund clients. Marc Fagel, associate district administrator in the SEC's San Francisco office, said no charges were recommended and that the case is now closed.

Gradient Analytics President and Chief Executive Brad Forst said the company cooperated fully with the SEC and wasn't surprised by its decision. "We believe our business conduct has always been conducted with integrity," he said.

Canadian pharmaceutical company Biovail Corp. last year brought a $4.6 billion lawsuit alleging that Gradient and others, including hedge fund SAC Capital Management, schemed to manipulate Biovail's stock. Gradient and SAC denied the allegations.

Overstock.com Inc., a Salt Lake City online discount retailer, also is suing Gradient and other defendants in California for alleged stock manipulation. Overstock's charges were aired at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing last summer when a former Gradient employee, Demetrios Anifantis, testified that he was fired for questioning company practices and management's ties to hedge funds.

Mr. Anifantis said the firm, then known as Camelback Research, would issue negative research reports on companies such as Overstock at the request of hedge-fund clients who had short positions in those companies. Short sellers sell borrowed shares that they replace later, profiting if stock prices decline.

Overstock itself is under SEC investigation for its accounting practices, and Biovail faces a similar probe by U.S. and Canadian securities regulators.

Perrie Weiner, a partner at the law firm DLA Piper in Los Angeles who represented Gradient in the SEC investigation, said he believes the SEC "reached the right conclusion" in not bringing charges. "We look at it as the SEC giving a clean bill of health to Gradient."

SEC Blamed For Delay In Indictment Of Former McAfee General Counsel (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 15, 2007

Thanks to cross-country coordination efforts between two federal agencies, the first Silicon Valley lawyer to come under government scrutiny for stock options problems is getting one more reprieve before being indicted.

While it has been clear for nine months that Kent Roberts, the former general counsel of McAfee Inc., is in trouble, there's been a string of delays in his case. The latest, said people with knowledge of the case, is because the Washington, D.C.-based SEC lawyers want to file civil charges at the same time -- and they're not ready yet.

Roberts was fired by the company in May after its own investigation found options improprieties. Since then, he has become the focus of a federal criminal inquiry, and press reports over the past two months -- including several this week -- have said an indictment is imminent for actions relating to a stock options grant he received in 2000.

Stephen Neal, the Cooley Godward Kronish partner representing Roberts, wouldn't say whether he expects his client to be charged.

The SEC typically seeks to coordinate its charges with those filed by criminal prosecutors, said attorneys working on options investigations.

Speaking generally about options cases -- but not about McAfee specifically -- ex-federal prosecutor Jeffrey Bornstein said the government "is in part motivated by how things are perceived publicly. So there is this motivation to have a joint press conference."

Bornstein, who left the San Francisco U.S. attorney's office in 2005 to join Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Preston Gates Ellis, said there's often concern within the SEC that, if its civil charges follow on the tail of the indictment, they'll be ignored by the public.

"From the defense perspective, it's so they get the maximum prejudicial publicity that they can," he said.

McAfee has a rich history of legal problems.

The company's former CFO was charged in 2004 with scheming to inflate revenues, and faces a criminal trial in March. And early last year, McAfee agreed to pay a $50 million fine to the SEC for manipulating its books.

The latter case was investigated by a team of SEC lawyers based in Washington, D.C. -- a sore point for local SEC lawyers, said people familiar with the situation -- and they continued to probe the company when its options problems came to light. Reached Wednesday, one of the D.C. lawyers, Paul Lane, said he's not permitted to speak to the press.

But others familiar with the case said the D.C. team coordinated closely with the San Francisco U.S. attorney's office in the early stages of the investigation. And -- as The Recorder first reported in December -- they concluded last fall that there was enough evidence to move forward with an indictment of Roberts, even as they continued their investigation of other aspects of the company's options issues.

Soon after, the U.S. attorney's office experienced a first delay: Christopher Steskal, the lawyer who had been handling the case, announced that he'd be leaving for private practice.

Reached Tuesday, Steskal wouldn't comment on any options probes, including McAfee, nor would the spokesman for the office.

After assigning another prosecutor to the case, the office continued its investigation of Roberts, and earlier this month they seemed ready to charge Roberts.

It's unclear exactly why the SEC isn't ready. Kathleen Bisaccia, the former enforcement chief for the agency's San Francisco office -- and now a private investigator at Kroll -- said several aspects of joint investigations can lead to delays.

For example, she said, the SEC can't file charges without a vote by its commissioners, and that can take time.

But, Bisaccia added, it's not always the SEC that is lagging. "The usual scenario is the other way around," she said, with prosecutors being forced to ask the SEC to wait for them.

So far, the only options backdating case to move through the courts has been the prosecution of two former Brocade Communications executives. And the fireworks there have been a direct result of the SEC-DOJ coordination.

In that case, San Francisco federal Judge Charles Breyer has refused to take the common step of staying the SEC civil case until the criminal prosecution is done.

That created a frazzle of legal issues straddling both proceedings, including a recent blowup over witnesses who gave testimony to the SEC and prosecutors under a temporary immunity agreement but, when subpoenaed by defense lawyers, invoked the Fifth Amendment.

Richard Marmaro, the Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom partner representing ex-Brocade CEO Gregory Reyes, says the close coordination abuses the government's immunity power, and argues that the agencies should act more independently.

But he doesn't expect that to happen. "They can turn these things for maximum publicity, and that's what they do," he said.

Score One For Dissent (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Aflac said yesterday that it would become the first major U.S. company to give shareholders an advisory vote on executive compensation packages, bolstering investor groups that have vowed to push companies to change their governance practices at annual shareholder meetings this spring.

Aflac, the world's largest seller of supplemental health insurance, said it would allow shareholders a nonbinding vote on its corporate pay practices beginning in 2009 -- the first year that the company's proxy statement will contain the three years of compensation data required by the Securities and Exchange Commission's new disclosure rules. Aflac made its announcement after a proposal last year by one shareholder, Boston Common Asset Management.

"They're an early adopter," said Richard Ferlauto, director of investment policy at the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, which supports the so-called say-on-pay resolutions. "We expect others will follow."

Such proposals are among the most controversial of the hundreds this year by major shareholders, who are emboldened by public furor over outsized executive compensation. Proponents say that even though the votes would be nonbinding, they would pressure companies to change compensation policy.

At least 50 companies will have votes on say-on-pay at shareholder meetings, up from seven last year, according to Institutional Shareholder Services, a proxy advisory firm in Rockville.

Other closely watched resolutions include a proposal to allow shareholders to run opposing board candidates and another to tie executive pay more directly to corporate performance. Many of the companies targeted are in the hot seat over executives' salaries or the practice of back-dating options.

Home Depot, still smarting from controversy surrounding the lucrative exit package given to its former chief executive, last week invited an activist shareholder to join its board, helping to avert a potentially nasty proxy fight. And dozens of prominent companies, including Lehman Brothers, Honeywell and Wells Fargo, have agreed to change how directors are elected.

ISS said that since 2003, when investors began pushing for election by a majority of shareholder votes, about 200 companies have adopted some form of majority voting.

"I think 2007 represents something of a tipping point," said Stephen M. Davis, a fellow at the Yale University's center for corporate governance. "Smart companies see the writing on the wall."

Still, some corporations remain unyielding. So far this year, companies have successfully sought the SEC's approval to keep at least 40 of the 630 corporate governance-related proposals submitted by shareholders from coming to votes, according to ISS. Dozens more are trying.

Companies say though they have worked with investor groups to ensure best corporate governance practices, some proposals focus on narrow agendas that are costly and distracting to board members.

"It goes counter to what should be the fundamental question: What are the systems of governance in place that assure companies can grow and create more jobs and create greater shareholder value?" said John J. Castellani, president of Business Roundtable, an association in the District of chief executives of major U.S. companies. "We would rather have shareholders focus on shareholder value."

Hewlett-Packard, the computer maker under investigation for using private investigators to obtain personal phone records, has satisfied shareholder concerns about disclosure of political contributions but tried to exclude a proposal that would allow dissident shareholders to run board candidates. The SEC recently declined to act on HP's request to keep the measure off the ballot, and shareholders are scheduled to vote on it at a March 14 meeting.

An HP spokesman declined to comment. In the company's proxy statement, the board of directors recommends a vote against the proposal, in part because its approval could lead to "the election of 'special interest directors' who represent the interests of the stockholders who nominated them, not the interests of all HP stockholders."

AT&T has sought guidance from the SEC about omitting from its proxy ballot a proposal to allow an advisory vote on corporate compensation practices. The SEC has not yet responded, said spokeswoman McCall Butler, who said that the company planned to keep the resolution off the ballot. Butler said the company is having dialogue with shareholders, and that a "blanket 'yes' or 'no' " vote on compensation would not provide useful feedback for the board.

Nonetheless, as the negotiations reach their peak before the annual shareholder meetings, compensation consultants and investor groups say the shift in the climate has altered the dynamic between boardrooms and shareholders.

One reason activist shareholder groups -- mainly pension funds and labor groups -- will walk into the meetings with a bit more swagger this year is that new SEC rules require companies to offer more information about pay. Such disclosures would give shareholders a better idea of the total compensation granted to senior management, and could show that $200 million packages such as the one former Home Depot chairman and chief executive Robert L. Nardelli got last month are in place at dozens of companies, some corporate governance experts said.

"Boards are realizing that they need to step up and change their standards," said Ed Durkin, director of corporate affairs for the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners. "The way people may express their anger at some of those numbers is to vote on resolutions that relate to compensation."

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Committee on Financial Services, said yesterday that he will hold a hearing March 8 on strengthening the role of shareholders in setting executive compensation.

Maryland state Sens. Paul Pinsky and Richard S. Madaleno Jr. last week introduced a bill that would prohibit a company from deducting executive compensation as a business expense if it was more than 30 times the pay of its lowest-paid employee. President Bush told a group of business executives on Wall Street recently that they "need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve."

All this, investor groups say, could motivate companies to avoid public votes on controversial proposals by cutting deals with investors before the meetings.

Durkin's group has made more than 120 proposals, 72 of them on majority voting. He expects to have settled more than half by the start of proxy season, up from the 25 percent settlement rate on the issue last year.

"There's significant engagement with companies now," said Ferlauto, the AFSCME official. "Companies are realizing the disclosures that they'll be making and are meeting with shareholders early on to try to explain away the outsize compensation payments of CEOs."

Germany Battling Rising Tide Of Corporate Corruption (NYT)

By Carter Dougherty

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

FRANKFURT, Feb. 14 — Wolfgang Schaupensteiner has never been so busy.

From an office in downtown Frankfurt that is decorated with cartoons about corruption, Mr. Schaupensteiner has headed the tiny financial crime unit for this city, Germany's financial capital, since 1993. These days, his backlog of bribery, fraud and other white-collar crime cases runs into the hundreds, and he says he has a simple explanation as to why.

Corporate profits have surged across sectors ranging from finance to autos to energy, as German executives have turned the country into one of the world's largest exporters over the last five years. Illicit dealings helped create their success, he asserts, and that in turn has encouraged many executives to believe that crime does pay.

On Wednesday, prosecutors in the southern city of Nuremburg raided multiple locations of the offices of Siemens, one of the country's most prominent companies, on suspicion that certain bribes may have been concealed as payments for services that were never provided.

In recent months, DaimlerChrysler, BMW and Volkswagen have also been raided, put under investigation or even had employees taken into custody.

"Globalization has become a motor for corruption in Germany," asserted Mr. Schaupensteiner, 58. "It creates dangerous potential if you do not control it." Exports drove the German trade surplus to record levels in 2006, helping push up the country's benchmark stock index, the DAX, almost 20 percent over the last year. Rising corporate profits have meant higher tax receipts for a money-starved government in Berlin, but little of that money is helping Mr. Schaupensteiner tackle the corruption he says is also increasing with all this financial success.

Mr. Schaupensteiner and anticorruption activists argue that as profits earned abroad have increased, employees of German companies may have become more tempted to accept bribes and also to give bribes to win business. Europe only recently banned such practices.

This is in contrast to the foreign bribery laws in the United States, which, for 30 years, have restricted all American employees, regardless of where they conduct business.

At the very least, there has been a marked rise in the number of high-profile cases being prosecuted recently, and some of those have reached into the executive offices at the most prominent German companies.

In the fall, an employee of the luxury automaker BMW was jailed for accepting bribes from an auto parts supplier. And American authorities are investigating whether DaimlerChrysler employees made improper payments in Africa and Asia.

Germany's federal police service, BKA, registered nearly 90,000 cases of such crime in 2005, a 10 percent increase over the previous year, and a survey by the auditing giant KPMG concluded that 80 percent of all crimes in Germany go unreported.

Siemens, the engineering conglomerate based in Munich, is facing one of the worst bribery scandals in its history. Marc Langendorf, a Siemens spokesman in Munich, said the raid Wednesday involved "a new case" beyond the Munich investigation, but declined to provide further details.

But German prosecutors in Munich, along with the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department in the United States, are investigating a number of Siemens employees for possible crimes that include the suspected creation of about 400 million euros ($520 million) in slush funds for bribes to secure commercial contracts abroad.

"Corruption between buyers and sellers in Germany and bribery abroad is probably on the rise," said Hansjörg Elshorst, director of the German chapter of Transparency International, the anticorruption group.

It is not clear, though, that Germany is markedly different from its European peers, experts say. On a 2006 index compiled by Transparency International that measures perceptions of how corrupt countries are, Germany ranks 16th, suggesting it is more corrupt than Austria, Sweden or Britain.

Another index showed that those surveyed — principally business executives — see German companies as less likely to pay bribes than their colleagues in France or Spain.

But anticorruption activists and prosecutors also say that this recent wave of corruption cases may reflect lax legal compliance rules at the companies. Others say that the rising number of cases may simply reflect more aggressive prosecution.

"The number of cases is bound to go up the closer you look," said Mark Pieth, a professor of criminology at the University of Basel who specializes in bribery prevention, and runs a study group on the subject for the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. "There has to be a phase until you get over the hill, a phase in which you are constantly finding new cases."

Since the creation of the 1997 treaty against foreign bribery by private companies, the Paris-based O.E.C.D. has monitored investigations in this specific area. The United States alone has about 50 cases running, reflecting the fact that it has had such rules for 30 years in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

All of Europe, by contrast, has only about 100 cases under way, according to the O.E.C.D.

Only in 1997 did Germany pass laws giving prosecutors discretion to bring cases themselves. A few years later, with the negotiation of the O.E.C.D. convention on acts of bribery abroad, Mr. Schaupensteiner and his team obtained a new legal means to prosecute such cases of bribery conducted abroad by German companies similar to the longstanding American law.

That rule change made all the difference for Mr. Schaupensteiner, who had never touched a dossier on economic crime until he founded the Frankfurt office in 1993. Previously, he had been a judge specializing in antitrust cases. But even then his four-member team was not allowed to prosecute a case until the company itself referred it to them.

That was a "rare event," he notes, wryly.

Now, German prosecutors and judges agree that they have enough resources to highlight individual cases, but not enough resources to prosecute all the cases fully. The German attorney general recently surveyed prosecutors and found the response overwhelming: they need more hands on deck.

Law enforcement officials hope the current spate of scandals will prompt a serious, systematic effort by German companies to impose more stringent internal controls and systems of legal compliance to stop corruption from happening in the first place.

"Experience tells us that after the headlines go away and the excitement dies down, it's back to business," Mr. Schaupensteiner said.

There are some precedents for success, though. The chemical giant BASF was caught participating in a huge conspiracy to fix the prices of vitamins — a reaction to cheap competition from Asia — and paid half a billion dollars in fines to governments on both sides of the Atlantic.

"It generated some very serious thoughts about how to do compliance," said Michael Grabicki, a BASF spokesman. "That led to a serious program."

Now, BASF has a compliance program that Transparency International has praised. In 2003, it appointed one of the first chief compliance officers in Germany, and now trains certain employees about a range of legal issues that include money laundering and bribery.

Still, anticorruption experts say that throughout Europe, BASF stands out as more the exception than the rule.

"The giants have to understand they have to rewrite their compliance systems and train people," Mr. Pieth, the Basel professor, said, "but many of them are very slow to realize this."

The publicity, however, helps the campaign against corruption because it could prompt companies to increase internal scrutiny and prosecutors to be vigilant. Hansjörg Elshorst, director of the German chapter of Transparency International, says the discussion about new laws to fight corruption, and a few examples of it, might be just what the country needs.

"In the last five years, the notion that we need to prosecute economic criminality took on an entirely new dynamic," Mr. Elshorst said. "Every society has moments in time where they wake up to the presence of corruption. That has happened here, too."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Ends Abbreviated Defense Testimony (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, February 15, 2007

Libby's attorneys rested a trimmed down defense Wednesday after the judge barred much of their classified evidence because Libby decided not to testify in his perjury trial.

That clears the way for the jury to hear closing arguments next Tuesday over whether the former chief of staff to Cheney lied to the FBI and a grand jury about whether he leaked to reporters in 2003 that Valerie Plame, the wife of prominent Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, worked for the CIA.

In 14 days of testimony, the trial never filled an overflow courtroom, with a video hookup, to handle the crowds expected -- particularly for the cross-examination of Libby and Cheney.

Nevertheless, testimony showed that Cheney was intimately involved on a daily basis in July 2003 in rebutting Wilson's allegations that President Bush had lied about intelligence to push the nation into war with Iraq.

Cheney was described by his own aides as particularly upset that Wilson suggested the vice president knew one key justification -- that Iraq was seeking uranium in Africa for nuclear weapons -- had been debunked by Wilson in 2002.

The defense put in a handwritten note in which Cheney told the White House press secretary to exonerate Libby in the leak and not sacrifice him to protect Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

The trial also brought top-level Washington reporters, including five Pulitzer Prize winners, and some of their usually unidentified government sources into the courtroom. The defense, with limited direct evidence to rebut the government's case, used these witnesses to raise questions about the memory, techniques and ethics of reporters who had testified against Libby.

In the process, they illuminated the interactions between top reporters and officials.

The government case marched chronologically through the tumultuous spring and summer of 2003, when the administration was embarrassed that U.S. forces in Iraq had not found any of the weapons of mass destruction that Bush had used to justify the war.

Fitzgerald's goal was to render Libby's statements to the FBI and the grand jury unbelievable.

Libby acknowledged that he was first told of Plame's CIA job by Cheney on June 12, 2003, but he claims that he forgot it amid the many national security issues he dealt with. Libby told investigators that he thought he was hearing about her job for the first time on July 10 from NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert and thereafter only told reporters he had heard about the job from other journalists.

Russert testified he and Libby never talked about Plame at all.

An undersecretary of state, a CIA official and Cheney's own top press aide all testified they told Libby about Plame's job between June 11 and July 6. Another CIA official said Libby discussed her job with him before the Russert call.

Former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer testified that Libby told him about Plame's job just three days before the Russert conversation.

Then former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and former Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper testified Libby told them that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and had the idea for sending Wilson on a trip to Africa to investigate the uranium report. Wilson had suggested Cheney's questions were the reason for his trip.

Finally the prosecution called an FBI agent to testify about Libby's denials of leaking and played eight hours of his grand jury testimony denying he leaked.

The defense called six reporters who talked to Libby in that period but didn't recall hearing anything about Plame from him. None, however, could recall specifically asking about her.

They introduced evidence of memory flaws on the part of Miller and Russert, and questioned whether Russert had it in for Libby because the case got Russert subpoenaed to discuss confidential sources. One defense witness, Washington Post reporter Walter Pincus, testified Fleischer leaked Plame's job to him, directly contradicting Fleischer's denial of that under oath. An FBI agent recalled that Russert wasn't able to completely rule out that he and Libby discussed Plame.

Judge Deals Setbacks To Libby Defense (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132604

WASHINGTON — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's decision not to testify in his perjury case backfired today when a federal judge ruled that his lawyers could not introduce once-classified details of his workload without Libby taking the witness stand.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton was one of two setbacks for the defense as it finished presenting evidence in the case without calling any additional witnesses. Walton set closing arguments for Tuesday, and said the jury would likely start deliberating next Wednesday.

Offering barely two days of testimony, the defense strategy appeared to reflect a hope and belief among Libby's lawyers that the government had failed to meet its burden of proving their client's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Libby is charged with covering up his role in leaking information about the wife of a Bush Administration critic to journalists in summer 2003. He has conceded he may have misspoken to authorities but says that is because he was consumed with more important duties as the chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

During the trial, his lawyers have shown that some government witnesses had memory problems of their own, and that information about CIA operative Valerie Plame, the wife of former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, was known to other journalists, who got the information from sources other than Libby.

But the so-called busy-man defense suffered a blow today when Walton rejected a defense bid to have admitted into evidence summaries of classified materials by CIA employees who had regularly briefed Libby on intelligence matters.

The summaries were meant to buttress the argument that the weighty issues Libby was handling fogged his ability to recall details about Wilson and Plame. The materials were prepared before the trial after months of sensitive negotiations between Walton and the lawyers and intelligence authorities about what could become public.

Walton said today that he always understood that the information could become public only if Libby testified. The judge said it would be unfair to the government to now allow the jury to hear the evidence without giving prosecutors the opportunity to cross-examine Libby.

Libby's lawyer, Theodore Wells Jr., who announced Tuesday that neither Libby nor Cheney would be called as witnesses in the trial, said in court today that the information should still be permitted. He asserted that, by requiring Libby to take the stand in his own behalf as a condition for introducing the evidence, the judge was putting an "impermissible burden" on the client's right under the Constitution to a fair defense.

But Walton said to allow that would encourage gamesmanship.

"If the court of appeals wants to tell me that this kind of process can occur ... I think we turn this whole process into a game. It's too much of a game now," the judge said.

"If I get reversed on that one, maybe I need to hang up my spurs," Walton added. "I am convinced that is not a winning position."

The defense rested today without calling the CIA witnesses but with a lawyer reading a list of some of the matters that Libby was dealing with at a time when the government says he was focused on rebutting Wilson.

The lawyers also introduced articles from the Wall Street Journal and National Review, which included criticism of the three-year federal probe that led to Libby being charged.

Wilson wrote an op-ed in the New York Times on July 6, 2003, which accused the Bush Administration of twisting pre-war intelligence in Iraq. Plame was identified eight days later in a newspaper column by syndicated columnist Robert Novak.

The trial has turned up new details of the involvement of both Cheney and Libby in discrediting Wilson, which likely would have subjected them to tough questions by prosecutors had they testified.

Walton also rejected a defense request to raise further questions about the credibility of "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert. Russert is one of three journalists who had conversations with Libby that authorities say Libby subsequently lied about when speaking to investigators. Libby has asserted that it was Russert who first gave him information about Plame, an assertion that Russert denied in court last week.

The defense has claimed that Russert received special treatment from the government because he was allowed to give a statement under oath in his lawyer's office rather than appear before the grand jury.

Wells asked Russert last week about whether he knew whether lawyers were permitted to accompany their clients into the grand jury room. Russert responded that he did not know.

Wells said this week that he had uncovered three videotapes of Russert appearing to know full well that lawyers were barred from the grand jury, including a television appearance he made relating to the Monica Lewinsky case during the Clinton Administration. Wells said he wanted to show them to the jury to discredit Russert.

Walton declined to permit it, saying that the apparent contradiction did not go to the heart of the testimony that Russert offered, including discussions he had with Libby.

Saying He Was Misled By Defense, Judge In Libby Case Puts Some Evidence Off-Limits (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

The lawyers defending I. Lewis Libby Jr. against perjury charges rested their case on Wednesday, but not before suffering a series of defeats in rulings by the presiding judge.

The judge, Reggie B. Walton, expressed in the strongest terms yet that he had been misled by the defense team about whether Mr. Libby would take the stand in his own defense.

Judge Walton said he "believed all along in the process that Mr. Libby was going to testify" and that his lawyers were now "playing games with the process."

He made his remarks out with the jury out of the courtroom as he ruled that the defense would no longer be able to use some evidence, including something the jury had already heard: a statement the government agreed to saying Mr. Libby, as chief of staff and national security adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney, "worked long hours, received daily intelligence briefings and attended many meetings concerning important matters of national security."

Mr. Libby faces five felony charges that he lied to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents investigating the leak of the identity of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson, to reporters in the summer of 2003 .

Mr. Libby denied under oath that he had passed information to reporters about Ms. Wilson, and his lawyers have put forward as a part of his defense the assertion that he was too preoccupied with the crush of vital national security issues to have remembered any conversation about Ms. Wilson or her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador.

Judge Walton said his ruling meant that the chief defense lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., would not be able to make that argument to the jury. Mr. Wells will be permitted to tell the jury that Mr. Libby had "a lot on his plate," Judge Walton said. But because Mr. Libby is not testifying, Mr. Wells cannot argue that those issues were of greater importance in Mr. Libby's mind "as compared to the issue of Valerie Plame and Ambassador Wilson."

The identity of Ms. Wilson, who is also known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame, first became public in July 2003 after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by Mr. Wilson saying the White House had distorted intelligence to justify invading Iraq.

The conclusion of the defense case means the jury will hear closing arguments when they return on Tuesday and will probably begin deliberating Wednesday after instructions from the judge.

Before the jurors departed on Wednesday afternoon, they filed into the courtroom, all but one wearing bright red T-shirts with a white valentine heart over their clothes, to the uncertain laughter of many in the courtroom.

But as one juror, a retired North Carolina schoolteacher, rose to speak, Judge Walton became visibly anxious that the juror might say something inappropriate that could threaten the trial. Jurors are not supposed to speak and are supposed to make any concerns known through notes to the bench.

The juror said they were wearing the shirts to express their fondness for the judge and the court staff on Valentine's Day. He then added, to the judge's growing discomfort, that they were unanimous in this sentiment, but they would all be independent in judging the evidence in the Libby case.

The sole juror who apparently declined to wear the shirt was a woman who had been a curator at the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

In their three-day presentation that concluded on Wednesday, defense lawyers offered a spare and indirect attack on the prosecution's case. In addition to keeping Mr. Libby off the stand, they announced they would not present Mr. Cheney as a witness. The possibility of Mr. Cheney's taking the stand was strongly suggested by the Libby team as well and was greatly anticipated as the first time a sitting vice president was to testify in a criminal trial.

The prosecution, beginning three weeks ago, presented testimony from Mr. Cheney's former communications director, a senior state department officials and two C.I.A. officials who said they had told Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson. They also presented the testimony of two reporters who said Mr. Libby had discussed Ms. Wilson with them.

The testimony of a third reporter, Tim Russert of NBC News, was a pivotal part of the prosecution case, and defense lawyers tried in vain on Wednesday to persuade Judge Walton to have him recalled in order to challenge his credibility.

The judge ruled against two motions for Mr. Russert's recall. Mr. Russert, in his testimony, said he had not told Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson, as Mr. Libby had asserted.

Mr. Wells had argued that Mr. Russert may have been biased in favor of the government because of an agreement his lawyer reached with prosecutors. Before Mr. Russert agreed to testify for the government, he challenged the subpoena from Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, arguing that his testimony would violate deeply-held principles that a reporter should not discuss his confidential conversations.

But at the time, Mr. Russert had already talked with the F.B.I. about his conversations with Mr. Libby, and Mr. Wells asserted that Mr. Fitzgerald had agreed not to raise the matter because it would have exposed Mr. Russert as a hypocrite, undercutting his television statements that he was standing up for the First Amendment.

Judge Walton took the unusual step of questioning Mr. Russert's lawyer, Lee Levine, who said he and Mr. Russert had never discussed the agreement with the prosecutor not to raise the conversation with the F.B.I. agent. Judge Walton then ruled it was irrelevant to the case.

Mr. Libby's lawyers vigorously protested Judge Walton's rulings, intent on creating an appeals record if Mr. Libby is convicted.

Judge Walton said he would be shocked if he were reversed on appeal over his rulings about Mr. Libby's not testifying.

If that happens, he said, "I'll hang up my spurs."

Defense Attorneys Rest Libby's Case (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby rested their defense in his perjury trial yesterday after giving jurors a stripped-down version of their case that the vice president's then-chief of staff was too preoccupied with sensitive national security issues in 2003 to remember conversations he had about undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Shortly before testimony ended in the five-week trial, the presiding judge blocked defense attorneys from presenting the testimony of their proposed final witnesses -- CIA employees who briefed Libby each day on crises and terrorist threats around the world.

Defense attorneys wanted the briefers to provide the jury with vivid details of the confidential intelligence on foreign affairs that Libby was juggling. Their testimony, which would have relied on classified information that the judge had approved for admission at the trial, was intended to reinforce the central argument of Libby's defense: that he did not deliberately lie to investigators about his role in the disclosure of Plame's identity to journalists but inaccurately remembered it because it was trivial in comparison with the weighty issues before him.

But U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton sided with prosecutors, who argued that it would be unfair to allow such testimony because Libby had decided not to testify and could not be cross-examined.

"With him not testifying, I think the landscape has changed . . . significantly," Walton said outside the presence of the jury. "I don't think it would be appropriate in any way" for jurors to hear about Libby's briefings unless prosecutors can quiz the defendant about their significance to him, Walton said.

Libby is charged with lying to investigators about his role in the leak of Plame's name. Prosecutors contend that he deliberately obscured his role in a White House campaign to discredit Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, by suggesting that nepotism was the reason the CIA dispatched Wilson to Africa in 2002.

Wilson was sent to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq had tried to buy nuclear material there. He concluded that the reports were false and later accused President Bush of twisting his findings to justify the war in Iraq.

Instead of putting the briefers on the stand, defense attorney John Cline read jurors a lengthy list, approved by both sides, of the issues that CIA briefer Craig Schmall shared with Libby on the morning of June 14, 2003. Schmall testified earlier in the trial that his notes indicate that was the day Libby mentioned Wilson to him.

Cline also read jurors a list of the national security issues confronting Libby between May 2003, when Vice President Cheney first told him about Plame, and March 2004, when Libby appeared before a federal grand jury investigating the leak of her identity.

Another defense attorney read jurors portions of a Wall Street Journal editorial and two National Review articles that were in Libby's files. All three reinforced the defense's contention that Libby did not regard Plame's identity as secret.

A third defense attorney read parts of a report on an interview with Tim Russert, NBC News's Washington bureau chief, conducted by the FBI agent who once headed the leak investigation. The report contained nuances that differed from the testimony last week of Russert, the prosecution's most pivotal witness.

The defense ended its case less than three days after it began. The prosecution completed its rebuttal case within minutes. On Tuesday, Libby's attorneys announced that they would not call the two men they had indicated would be their star witnesses: Libby and Cheney.

Walton told jurors that prosecutors and defense attorneys are scheduled to deliver the closing arguments in the case on Tuesday and that the jury probably will begin its deliberations the next day.

Libby Trial Reveals The Politics Of Reporting (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — In the trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the nation's capital comes across as a landscape dominated by high-ranking government officials trying to leak news and high-profile reporters trying to get news.

They are codependent breeds, each expert at manipulating the other. And yet both sides often fail.

One of the signature moments in the case came this week, when veteran Washington Post reporter Walter Pincus was asked about the difficulty of getting top government officials to talk to him.

"Well, they'll talk to me," Pincus testified. "They just won't give me information."

The 2-week-old Libby trial has provided an unprecedented look into the transactions between reporters and government officials. Jurors have heard detailed testimony on — and sometimes audiotapes of — conversations between reporters and sources that were supposed to have been conducted in secret. They have been given impromptu tutorials on the arcane rules of sourcing, learning the subtle differences between "off the record" and "deep background."

The testimony is supposed to help jurors reach a verdict on whether Libby lied to investigators about his role in leaking the name of a clandestine CIA officer to the media. But in many ways, the trial has shed more light on the ways of Washington, exposing the often messy means by which reporters gather information, and the sometimes ignoble motives of those who provide it.

"I don't think there has ever been a trial in which you had a parade of the most famous journalists in the country basically being put on the stand and told to talk about the way they do their jobs," said Alex Jones, head of the Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy at Harvard University. "What's been described is the way that Washington works."

Or doesn't.

The lament from Pincus was one of dozens of complaints lodged over the last few weeks by reporters and government officials over their inability to get the other side to cooperate.

Syndicated columnist Robert Novak, who triggered the criminal investigation by publishing the identity of a CIA officer married to a critic of the Bush administration, testified about his cozy relationship with such Republican higher-ups as White House advisor Karl Rove.

But at the same time, he said he had spent three fruitless years trying to land a single interview with former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage.

"He had not only declined," Novak said, "but indicated it wasn't because he was too busy. He just didn't want to see me."

Armitage finally came through in 2003 — long after, Novak said, he had given up. Almost out of the blue, Novak said, the top aide to then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell called the conservative columnist to help blunt mounting criticism of the Bush administration's claim that Iraq had sought to purchase uranium in Africa with designs on developing nuclear weapons.

Even Bob Woodward, whose fame and influence in the capital have only grown since he became known for his lead role in uncovering the Watergate scandal for the Washington Post 35 years ago, admitted under oath that sometimes he struck out. While researching a book that was largely complimentary of the White House, Woodward said, he had scheduled an interview with Vice President Dick Cheney in late 2003.

But Cheney backed out at the last minute after Woodward submitted three pages of questions. "I had overplayed my hand and sent him too many," Woodward said.

From the other side, former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer voiced frustration earlier in the trial with his struggles to get reporters to listen.

In particular, Fleischer testified about trying to counter the attacks of Wilson, who had traveled to Africa to investigate claims that Iraq had sought to purchase uranium there. Fleischer said he told reporters that Wilson had been sent on the mission by his wife, who worked at the CIA. The reporters barely raised an eyebrow.

"It was a big 'so what,' " Fleischer said. "It was like a lot of things that I said to the press. It had no impact."

Some experts expressed concern that the trial's repercussions could go beyond damaged reputations. In particular, they worry that the success lawyers in the case have had in compelling testimony from reporters could undermine journalists' ability to cultivate sources and cover important issues.

"This has really devolved into a demonstration that you can put journalists on the stand and force them to testify," Jones said. "That's not in the best interests of this country."

Reporters rarely have been compelled to testify or reveal their sources in criminal trials. But on Monday, six journalists took the stand in rapid succession, each disclosing details of conversations they had had with sources who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Aware of the stakes, almost every reporter who has testified has offered a nuanced explanation seemingly aimed more at potential sources than at sitting jurors. Several dwelt on their efforts to get a "personal waiver" from Libby or other sources, meaning permission to violate the initial terms of the interview.

At one point, Woodward interrupted one of the lawyers in the case so that he could recite his rationale for testifying.

"Mr. Armitage has released me and said I can testify about it," Woodward said. "He's gone so far as to request that I testify and offer information."

In one of the more remarkable moments of the trial, defense attorneys played portions of an audiotape Woodward had made of his interview with Armitage in June 2003, in which the senior State Department official disclosed the identity of Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, during an exchange that was edited for jurors, deleting expletives.

Like most of the encounters described during the trial, the Armitage interview was initially conducted on "background," a term that generally means the reporter is allowed to use the information, but cannot attribute it to the source by name.

Reporters were also frequently asked to explain to jurors other journalistic terms of art, including "off the record" and "deep background." Underscoring the extent to which journalists rely on the ability to grant anonymity to their sources, Washington Post reporter Glenn Kessler testified that his job would be nearly impossible to do under any other circumstances.

"Almost every single conversation I have in Washington is on background," Kessler said.

For Liberal Bloggers, Libby Trial Is Fun And Fodder (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

The perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr., former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, has drawn every major news organization in the country to the federal courthouse in Washington. But none has fielded a bigger team — or was more openly crushed by the defense decision this week not to put Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby on the stand — than Firedoglake.com.

Even the Web-savvy may ask, Fire dog what? A collective of liberal bloggers, fueled by online donations and a fanatical devotion to the intricacies of the Libby case, Firedoglake has offered intensive trial coverage, using some six contributors in rotation. They include a former prosecutor, a current defense lawyer, a Ph.D. business consultant and a movie producer, all of whom lodge at a Washington apartment rented for the duration of the trial.

All day long during the trial, one Firedoglake blogger is on duty to beam to the Web from the courthouse media room a rough, real-time transcript of the testimony. With no audio or video feed permitted, the Firedoglake “live blog” has offered the fullest, fastest public report available. Many mainstream journalists use it to check on the trial.

But the bloggers’ fun is almost over. Mr. Libby’s lawyers rested their case yesterday shortly after the judge said he had been misled about whether Mr. Libby would take the stand. [Page A27.]

For blogs, the Libby trial marks a courthouse coming of age. It is the first federal case for which independent bloggers have been given official credentials along with reporters from the traditional news media, said Robert A. Cox, president of the Media Bloggers Association. Mr. Cox negotiated access for the bloggers.

“My goal is to get judges to think of bloggers as citizen journalists who should get the same protections as other journalists get,” Mr. Cox said.

He acknowledged that the Libby case had vividly illustrated the limits on those protections, as one reporter, Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, went to jail and others were forced to testify about once-confidential sources.

With a yeasty mix of commentary, invective and inside jokes, Fire-doglake has seen its audience grow steadily during the trial, reaching 200,000 visitors and requiring an additional computer server on its busiest days — like Tuesday, with the revelation that Mr. Cheney would not appear.

“After all that, Shooter lets me down,” wrote Jane Hamsher, creator of Firedoglake and organizer of its trial team. Mr. Cheney is nicknamed on the blog for his infamous hunting accident, which handily rhymes with the nickname for his former aide, Scooter.

At Firedoglake and other sites on the left, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the prosecutor, comes across as a righteous avenger, exposing the perfidy of Mr. Libby in particular and the Bush White House in general.

Over on the right, meanwhile, conservative bloggers portray Mr. Fitzgerald’s case against Mr. Libby as a gratuitous exercise that is slowly coming apart. At American Thinker, Clarice Feldman has repeatedly taken aim at the prosecution’s most important witness, the host of NBC’s Meet the Press.

DOJ_NMG_0132609

"Tim Russert has some explaining to do," Ms. Feldman, a lawyer sitting in on the trial this week, wrote of the host in her blog.

Sheldon L. Snook, the court official in charge of the news media, said the decision to admit bloggers — 5 to 10 of about 100 reporters present on busy trial days — has worked out well.

"It seems they can provide legal analysis and a level of detail that might not be of interest to the general public but certainly has an audience," Mr. Snook said.

Even as they exploit the newest technologies, the Libby trial bloggers are a throwback to a journalistic style of decades ago, when many reporters made no pretense of political neutrality. Compared with the sober, neutral drudges of the establishment press, the bloggers are class clowns and crusaders, satirists and scolds.

"They're putting in a lot more opinion and a lot more color than the traditional reporters," said Mr. Cox, adding that the bloggers were challenging "the theory of objective journalism."

Like the newspaper and network reporters, the bloggers have alternated between sitting in on testimony in Courtroom 16 and watching the video feed to the media room, where laptops are allowed.

In the courthouse, the old- and new-media groups have mixed warily at times. Mainstream reporters have shushed the bloggers when their sarcastic comments on the testimony drowned out the audio feed. But traditional reporters have also called on the bloggers on occasion to check a quote or an obscure detail from the investigation.

"It's shown me the degree to which journalists work together to define the story," said Marcy Wheeler, author of a book on the case, "Anatomy of Deceit," and the woman usually in the Firedoglake live-blogger seat.

Ms. Wheeler, a business consultant from Michigan who writes under the nom-de-blog "emptywheel," believes that some trial revelations have been underplayed in the conventional media because "once the narrative is set on a story, there's no deviating from it."

Ms. Hamsher, 47, created Firedoglake on a shoestring — its major expense is a $200-a-month charge for Web hosting. Online donors are paying trial coverage costs, including the travel expenses of the bloggers and the $3,500 a month rent on the Washington apartment, dubbed Plame House after Valerie Plame, the maiden name of the C.I.A. operative whose exposure led to the criminal investigation and Mr. Libby's indictment.

The bloggers, some of whom are taking vacation or have flexible work schedules, are all unpaid. Ms. Hamsher describes the blog as "a collective watering hole" where contributors with diverse expertise "scour every possible source for information and then pool their resources."

Its name is easily explained, she said: "I like lying in front of the fire with my dogs and watching the Lakers."

A movie producer best known for "Natural Born Killers," Ms. Hamsher, who recently moved to Middletown, Conn., from California, arrived at the trial just days after cancer surgery and is scheduled for chemotherapy after the verdict.

"I wasn't going to miss this," she said. Along with bloggers from the likes of Huffington Post and Daily Kos, Ms. Hamsher also does daily trial reports for politicsTV.com.

Last year, while working for the Democratic Senate candidate Ned Lamont in Connecticut, she publicly apologized after posting on the Huffington Post blog a doctored photo of Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, Mr. Lamont's opponent, in blackface. But she said that while she still worked on film projects, blogging was what really engaged her.

"There's a snarky, get-under-the-surface-of-things quality to it that's really me," Ms. Hamsher said.

In New Jersey, A Fight Over Budget Records Is Played Out In Secrecy (NYT)

By Ronald Smothers

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

TRENTON, Feb. 14 — For almost a half-dozen years, Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, has scoured the state, taking on one elected official after another. Now he is wrangling with an arm of the State Legislature, but what he wants and whether he will get it are being argued behind locked doors and cloaked in grand jury secrecy.

On Wednesday, the latest skirmish between Mr. Christie and the Office of Legislative Services, which serves as the Legislature's counsel and administrative arm, over a federal subpoena for records related to budget items was played out in a closed hearing in Federal District Court here.

Lawyers for both sides emerged poker-faced and tight-lipped from the 75-minute session before Judge Mary L. Cooper, saying that they could not comment on the hearing because it involved grand jury secrecy.

What is generally known about the federal investigation is that it revolves around the dealings of State Senator Wayne R. Bryant, a Democrat from Camden who was chairman of the Budget and Appropriations Committee until he stepped down last year under pressure from fellow Democrats.

The investigation, according to lawyers familiar with the case, may involve Mr. Bryant's legislative role as well as a $38,000-a-year job he held with the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey.

It is believed that investigators are trying to determine whether Mr. Bryant improperly steered millions of dollars in state grants to the university in exchange for what a federal monitor says was virtually a nonexistent job.

But the Office of Legislative Services is challenging the subpoena, contending that it violates the attorney-client privilege that it says exists between the office and the lawmakers it serves. The office is run by a bipartisan panel of 16 members, 8 each from the Senate and Assembly, and its professional staff is banned from political activity.

It is the bipartisan nature of the panel that has added a new wrinkle to New Jersey's latest political parlor game. A lawyer for Assembly Republicans, who in recent days have sharply criticized Democrats over what they say is a lack of cooperation with a possible corruption investigation, showed up in court on Wednesday.

The lawyer, Mark Sheridan, said he was there to try to intervene on behalf of Republicans who had not been consulted on the challenge to the subpoena. If attorney-client privilege was at issue, he said, Assembly Republicans should be part of the proceedings.

But Mr. Sheridan, who has represented the Republican Party in disputes over election law and other matters, left the locked courtroom five minutes after the hearing started. He declined to comment on how the judge had ruled on his request.

Democratic lawmakers, who control both houses of the Legislature, continue to insist, at least in private, that they are not generally opposing the subpoena. In fact, some noted that weeks ago legislative leaders complied with requests from the same grand jury for "budget-related" documents.

And one lawmaker, speaking on the condition of anonymity, emphasized that the subpoena issued to the leadership was not aimed at individual legislators or at specific communications from them.

Indeed, trying to put their best possible face forward, Senate President Richard J. Codey and Assembly Speaker Joseph J. Roberts issued a joint statement on Tuesday saying that efforts by Mr. Christie's office "to root out corruption in this state should be applauded." They maintained that the challenge to the subpoena involved a "narrow issue" — which no one wants to talk about — that the office believed to be of constitutional significance.

Jeremy D. Frey, a former assistant United States attorney in New Jersey who is now in private practice in Philadelphia, said that one possible constitutional concern of the office was whether a subpoena from an agency of the executive branch to a legislative body might be a violation of the doctrine establishing separation of powers.

In the past, Mr. Frey said, when the Justice Department has sought documents from the Congressional Budget Office — a somewhat analogous situation — the issues have been worked out between the parties involved.

As for the legal ground that the Democrats in New Jersey are standing on, he said: "There are limits to what a grand jury can seek, but it is generally very broad, and there is a high threshold in challenging them. They can usually get whatever they need to investigate a possible crime or even to reassure themselves that no crime has been committed."

Gov. Jon S. Corzine seems to share that position. In comments on Monday, he said the Office of Legislative Services should waive the attorney-client privilege it was claiming and comply with the subpoena. And on Tuesday he asked Stuart J. Rabner, his attorney general and a former federal prosecutor in Mr. Christie's office, for a legal opinion on the issue.

According to David Wald, Mr. Rabner's spokesman, the attorney general demurred, saying that he had a conflict of interest because his office and Mr. Christie's had worked closely on corruption investigations and therefore was not neutral.

Legal Battle Over Subpoenaed Political Records Plays Out (NSDY/AP)

By Angela Delli Santi, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 15, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. -- Republican lawmakers ramped up pressure on the Legislature to hand over documents subpoenaed in a federal corruption investigation on Wednesday, as the U.S. Attorney's Office went to court to force the material to be released.

During a 75-minute hearing in Federal District Court, Judge Mary L. Cooper heard arguments on whether the Legislature's legal and research arm should be forced to turn over memos, e-mails and other documents that the U.S. Attorney's Office has subpoenaed and the Office of Legislative Services has refused to release.

The hearing was closed to the public and its contents sealed, and those involved in the case are barred from discussing what happened. It was not immediately clear what, if any, ruling the judge had made.

Prosecutors Josh Drew and William Fitzpatrick emerged from the courtroom saying they could not discuss the case, followed by Office of Legislative Services lawyer Edward Dauber, who also refused to talk to reporters.

Mark Sheridan, a lawyer for the Republicans, emerged part-way through the hearing saying he could not comment on what was happening inside the closed courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0132611

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie said Tuesday he could not discuss any case that may be part of a grand jury proceeding.

Republicans, meanwhile, continued to urge Democrats to voluntarily release the documents Christie wants. They also demanded an accounting of the decision to fight the federal subpoena.

In a letter to Christie on Wednesday, Assembly Republican leader Alex DeCroce said all 31 Assembly Republicans oppose the decision to refuse to comply with the federal subpoena.

"After checking with every member of my caucus, I want the U.S. Attorney to know Assembly Republicans are united in the belief that the decision by the Office of Legislative Services to retain special counsel and challenge the federal subpoena in court is a colossal mistake," DeCroce said.

DeCroce also continued to call for an emergency meeting of the Legislative Services Commission, the 16 lawmakers who oversee OLS. Republicans are seeking an accounting of who decided to fight the subpoena rather than comply and who authorized the hiring of outside counsel.

All eight Republican members of the group have called for the meeting, but a ninth member _ a Democrat _ needs to join the call before an emergency session can be called.

The U.S. Attorney is reportedly investigating whether any elected officials improperly directed money to select organizations. The current $30.8 billion state budget contains more than $270 million in "Christmas tree items," last-minute add-ons inserted mostly by members of the controlling Democratic Party.

The issue may have come to prosecutors' attention after a federal monitor accused state Sen. Wayne Bryant of steering millions in grants to the University of Medicine and Dentistry, where he held a no-show job. Bryant was head of the powerful Senate budget panel before stepping down last fall.

GOP Separates Itself From Battle Over Records (NSL)

Newark Star-Ledger, February 15, 2007

Democrats' refusal to comply with subpoena called 'colossal mistake'

Republican Assembly leaders tried to distance themselves yesterday from efforts to keep confidential records out of the hands of the U.S. attorney in an ongoing federal corruption investigation.

The Assembly's GOP caucus at tempted to intervene in a closed- door hearing before a U.S. District Court judge in Trenton, where federal prosecutors were arguing to compel the Legislature to comply with a grand jury subpoena seeking internal documents.

At the same time, Republicans were continuing to push for a special meeting today of the Legislative Services Commission to look into the growing controversy over the subpoena.

The hearing before U.S. District Court Judge Mary Cooper came after the nonpartisan Office of Legislative Services rebuffed a subpoena for information in an investigation by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie that began with a probe into the activities of state Sen. Wayne Bryant (D-Camden).

A federal monitor found that Bryant had a $35,000-a-year "no- work job" created for him at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey. The monitor said Bryant performed little or no work and spent less than the minimum one day per week that he was required to be at the institution, while helping direct millions in additional state funding to the university.

Sources familiar with the investigation say it is not confined to Bryant.

Other subpoenas in connection with the investigation were served on the state Treasury Department and the Senate in October, attor neys for the Senate Democrats confirmed at the time. While Senate and Treasury officials had complied with the requests, the OLS maintained that the information being sought was privileged, and retained outside counsel to fight re lease of the documents.

The OLS, in addition to serving as a research and operations arm of the Assembly and Senate, also acts as counsel to the Legislature and its members.

Assembly Republican Leader Alex DeCroce (R-Morris) said yesterday all 31 members of his caucus op posed the decision not to comply with a federal subpoena.

"Assembly Republicans are united in the belief that the decision by the Office of Legislative Services to retain special counsel and challenge the federal subpoena in court is a colossal mistake," De Croce said. "It was done without our knowledge or support."

However, the attorney for the caucus, Mark Sheridan, left Cooper's fifth-floor courtroom yesterday just 15 minutes after the 2:15 p.m. hearing began -- an indication that the Republicans may have been denied their request to intervene.

"I cannot say anything at this point," Sheridan told nine reporters outside the courtroom. "The proceeding is sealed."

"I can't discuss anything," Fitzpatrick said.

The proceedings are under seal because they are part of a grand jury investigation.

Democratic legislative leaders say they believe the scope of the OLS subpoena remains narrowly focused, and may not suggest a broader investigation into the Legislature itself -- although they have not seen the subpoena, nor been briefed by the U.S. attorney.

Several legislative officials and budget officers, meanwhile, have been interviewed by the FBI in re cent weeks.

Staff writer Ted Sherman contributed to his report.

Hearing Concludes Over OLS-rebuffed Subpoena (APP)

Lawyers decline comment after closed-door session

TRENTON -- Lawyers for the U.S. Attorney's Office and the state Office of Legislative Services left after a one-hour, twenty-minute hearing today before a federal judge without saying anything about the federal subpoena that OLS is reportedly blocking.

The two sides met before U.S. District Judge Mary Cooper concerning a subpoena related to a grand jury investigation of whether lawmakers used their positions to illegally steer state grants to entities for personal or political profit.

Two assistant United States attorneys based in Camden, an FBI agent and two lawyers representing OLS left the hearing saying they could not comment.

Lawyers for Assembly Republicans, who say they have been improperly denied information about the investigation and have called for OLS to reveal the documents in question, tried to intervene in the proceeding but were escorted from the courtroom after 15 minutes, declining comment.

A message left at the office of OLS Executive Director Albert Porroni was not immediately returned.

Ex-CIA Official Charged With Fraud (NSDY/AP)

By Allison Hoffman

Long Island Newsday, February 15, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- As the CIA's executive director, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo had access to the spy agency's most sensitive secrets.

On Wednesday, Foggo, now retired, pleaded not guilty to federal charges that he used that information to direct classified supply deals to his best friend, San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes. According to a federal indictment, Wilkes reciprocated by paying for their lavish vacations and promised Foggo a job.

Both men surrendered Wednesday at FBI offices in San Diego after a 20-month investigation that has already sent former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison.

Foggo, who wore an American flag pin on his lapel, was released on $200,000 bail; Wilkes was released on $2 million bail.

The 11-count indictment returned Tuesday charges the lifelong friends, both 52, with fraud, conspiracy and money laundering, crimes punishable by up to 20 years in prison.

In a separate indictment, Wilkes was charged with 25 counts of conspiracy, bribery, money laundering and unlawful monetary transactions of more than $700,000.

Cunningham pleaded guilty in November 2005 to taking more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison. Wilkes faces up to 20 years in prison if convicted of those charges.

Mark Geragos, Wilkes' attorney, said he looked forward to defending his client.

"After 18 months of what has been, for lack of a better word, an unrelenting campaign of leaks, innuendo and unfounded rumors, we welcome the opportunity to be in the courtroom," Geragos told reporters.

In a statement later, Wilkes said he was innocent and called the investigation "tawdry" and "sordid."

"I guarantee you, I will be vindicated," Wilkes wrote.

He said Foggo was as close to him as a brother and defended his innocence against allegations "as cowardly as they are false."

DOJ_NMG_0132613

Foggo and his attorney did not comment to reporters as they left the courthouse. Foggo is the highest-ranking CIA officer to be charged with crimes allegedly committed while working for the agency.

Wilkes, whose firms got $100 million in government contracts, showered Foggo with expensive dinners, fancy cigar humidors and extravagant trips to Scotland and Hawaii, prosecutors say. When Wilkes built a new headquarters, he reserved an office for Foggo, and introduced him to employees as a future executive of Wilkes Corp.

In return, Foggo was "corruptly influenced in his performance of his official duties," the indictment says, steering classified government contracts worth more than $1.7 million to Wilkes' companies while concealing the depth of their friendship.

Bribery Indictments Include Long List Of Expensive Favors (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Two indictments issued Tuesday by a federal grand jury in San Diego contain fresh details related to alleged efforts by Brent R. Wilkes, a California businessman, to bribe a member of Congress and a senior CIA official. The goal, prosecutors charge, was to get the officials to steer lucrative federal contracts to companies Wilkes controlled.

The indictments include a long list of gifts and other illegal benefits that were allegedly exchanged.

Wilkes, a former accounting student at San Diego State University, got rich from those contracts in the mid-1990s. He built an $11 million high-tech company headquarters and became a sought-after big-money donor to important Republican lawmakers.

Wilkes's contracting empire is now virtually defunct after an 18-month federal probe led to this week's charges of conspiracy to commit bribery, honest services fraud and money laundering. Wilkes and Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the former third-ranking official at the CIA, pleaded not guilty yesterday in San Diego

Wilkes's office walls still bear photos showing him shaking hands with Vice President Cheney, presidential adviser Karl Rove, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and former House majority leader Tom DeLay. But all his employees are gone, his wife is seeking a divorce, and his tax arrears and other debts -- according to a tally by the San Diego Union-Tribune -- total nearly $1.7 million.

While his businesses were run from California, the crimes he allegedly committed occurred in Washington, and fall under the rubric of corrupt influence-buying. The government says Wilkes, like his former business partner and defense contractor Mitchell Wade, lavished gifts and a taste of high living on two key contacts -- former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Foggo -- to help procure federal funds.

Cunningham resigned in 2005 after pleading guilty to taking bribes from Wade. He is serving a prison term of as much as eight years. His attorney declined to comment yesterday.

Foggo has denied knowingly steering contracts to Wilkes. Wilkes has persistently denied wrongdoing, though he has also boasted of targeting selected Republican lawmakers with campaign funds to gain entree.

The indictment details how Cunningham allegedly hectored defense officials to pay Wilkes -- even when his companies had not done work to their satisfaction. The lawmaker called a defense official in Wilkes's presence and berated the official for slow payments, he pressured a principal deputy undersecretary of defense, he demanded the removal of an assistant deputy undersecretary of defense, he wrote letters to other defense officials, and he pressed his congressional aides into helping him reward Wilkes.

What was in it for Cunningham? The indictment lists the following among "more than $700,000 in payments, perquisites, and benefits" allegedly provided by Wilkes and his subordinates:

Â· Thousands of dollars in meals at the Capital Grille, the Palm, Ozio's, P.F. Chang's, Mr. K's, the Serbian Crown and the Confucius Cafe.

Â· Two Sea-Doo Speedster watercraft, priced at $11,255 and $14,496.

Â· An NEC laptop computer and a computer desk.

Â· An inflatable dock.

Â· A visit to the Four Seasons Hotel in Las Vegas and a $4,043 meal there.

Â· Tickets to the January 2003 Super Bowl and a Jimmy Buffett concert.

Â· Private jet flights "to various locations in the United States," including lavish in-flight meals.

Â· Payments on the mortgage for Cunningham's yacht, a Global Positioning System device and associated software for the yacht.

Â· Two vacations in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, including a "fully automatic machine gun shooting session" and $800 worth of golf equipment.

Â· A vacation in Key Largo, Fla., including a fishing tournament and diving trip.

Â· A vacation stay in a $6,600-per-night suite at the Hapuna Beach Prince Hotel in Hawaii, including a diving trip, golf tournament and the services of two prostitutes on successive nights.

Â· A $525,000 payment on Cunningham's home mortgage.

Wilkes separately provided Foggo with the following benefits, the government alleges, in exchange for Foggo's assistance in obtaining several CIA contracts:

Â· An offer of a "high-level, high-paying" job in Wilkes's companies.

Â· A joint family vacation in Scotland aboard a private jet, a $4,000 helicopter ride to a round of golf and more than $44,000 in lodging expenses at an estate with a seven-person staff.

Â· A joint vacation at a Hawaiian estate, costing $32,000.

Â· A cigar humidor.

Â· Meals at the Capital Grille, Ruth's Chris Steak House and the Serbian Crown.

Bribery Figures Wilkes, Foggo Plead Not Guilty (SDUT)

By Onell Soto and Karen Kucher

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 15, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Poway defense contractor Brent Wilkes and former CIA official Kyle “Dusty” Foggo began their legal proceedings in San Diego's federal court Wednesday.

After arriving at the downtown courthouse amid cameras and flanked by their attorneys, the two men entered not guilty pleas to charges of conspiracy, money laundering and defrauding the public of the honest services of a public official.

Wilkes also pleaded not guilty to a charge of bribing of a public official.

He is to remain free on $2 million bond, which will be secured by equity in his home and the homes of two of his brothers and a $500,000 bond. Foggo was required to post a $200,000 bond.

After the brief hearing, the two men were fingerprinted and photographed by U.S. marshals in the basement of the federal courthouse.

When Foggo left the courthouse shortly before 10:30 a.m., he did not respond to a reporter's question about whether he had sold out the government.

Wilkes also refused to answer reporters' questions when he left fifteen minutes later. His attorney, Mark Geragos, said Wilkes would be issuing a statement later in the day.

Geragos told reporters that after 18 months of an “unrelenting campaign of leaks,” that he and his client were looking forward to answering formal charges.

“We do welcome the opportunity now to be in the courtroom,” he said.

After walking through a throng of reporters and cameras, Geragos and Wilkes climbed into a black Ford Excursion and drove away.

On Tuesday, a San Diego federal grand jury handed down indictments against the two men, who became enmeshed in the congressional corruption scandal involving Randy “Duke” Cunningham, R-Rancho Santa Fe.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who leaves office Thursday, called the charges against the two men “breathtaking in scope.”

The indictment details the lavish gifts Wilkes bestowed on Cunningham so he would steer federal government contracts toward his flagship company, ADCS Inc. The gifts included cash, vacations, computers, meals, tickets to a Super Bowl game and prostitutes. In all, Wilkes gave Cunningham more than $700,000 in gifts.

A separate indictment details what authorities called the corruption of Foggo, who held the No. 3 spot at the Central Intelligence Agency before he resigned.

Prosecutors say Foggo failed to disclose to the agency that he had a close relationship with Wilkes, his lifelong friend, and that Wilkes gave him with gifts, expensive dinners and trips. The indictment also says Wilkes promised Foggo a job at his company, which he also failed to disclose.

If convicted, Wilkes and Foggo, both 52, could face up to 20 years in prison. The government is seeking $12 million in restitution from the defendants.

During Wednesday's hearing, prosecutor Phil Halpern told U.S. District Judge Larry Burns that the case against Foggo was a little complicated because it involves some classified information.

Halpern also said the witnesses and evidence in the two cases largely overlaps that used in the prosecution of Cunningham.

Another defendant, John T. Michael, a 35-year-old New York mortgage banker, also entered his not guilty plea Wednesday. He's accused of obstructing justice by providing false testimony to the grand jury about Wilkes' role in paying off the $500,000 second mortgage on Cunningham's Rancho Santa Fe home.

Michael was freed on $250,000 bond.

The trio are scheduled to be back in court on April 2.

Nevada Governor Faces FBI Probe Into Contracts (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Focus Is Gifts Gibbons Got While in Congress; 'Black Budget' Missions

Federal prosecutors are investigating whether Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons accepted unreported gifts or payments from a company that was awarded secret military contracts when Mr. Gibbons served in Congress.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is examining whether any gifts or payments violated federal contracting rules or were offered in exchange for official acts by Mr. Gibbons, people briefed on the investigation said. Mr. Gibbons, a Republican, represented Nevada for five terms in Congress, where he served on the House Intelligence and Armed Services committees. He was sworn in last month as governor of the nation's fastest-growing state.

The close ties between the congressman and the contractor, Warren Trepp, were disclosed in a Nov. 1 Wall Street Journal article1, which revealed that Mr. Gibbons accepted private jet flights and a Caribbean cruise from the software-company owner. Mr. Gibbons says accepting the cruise and flight didn't violate House ethics rules.

New evidence has emerged that includes emails to Mr. Trepp -- the majority owner of eTreppid Technologies LLC and the former chief trader for convicted junk-bond dealer Michael Milken -- discussing a payment or gift to then-Rep. Gibbons. They also show Mr. Gibbons repeatedly using his congressional office to help the firm seek classified military and civilian contracts.

The emails show that since at least 2003, Mr. Trepp maintained close ties to Mr. Gibbons, who helped eTreppid get no-bid software contracts from the Air Force, U.S. Special Operations Command and Central Intelligence Agency. The software was used in video tracking of military targets and other, classified applications.

Messrs. Trepp and Gibbons have denied any wrongdoing, and no charges have been filed; indeed, such investigations sometimes end without official action.

'Hit the Ground Running'

In a Sept. 25, 2003, email to Mr. Trepp after Mr. Gibbons had been particularly helpful on a recent contract, eTreppid executive Len Glogauer reports that "Jim really hit the ground running on that one." He adds, "we need to take care of him like we discussed." It isn't clear what Mr. Glogauer meant, and he declined to comment.

A second email, cited in court filings by Mr. Trepp's former partner, was more explicit. On March 22, 2005, days before Mr. Trepp and his wife embarked on the Caribbean cruise with the congressman and his family, Jalé Trepp sent a reminder to her husband. "Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn," referring to Mr. and Mrs. Gibbons.

Minutes later, Mr. Trepp responds, "Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!" Mr. Gibbons failed to disclose the cruise and travel on Mr. Trepp's leased private jet, as required by House ethics rules. He later asked the House Ethics Committee for an exemption, but left office before any action was taken.

The eTreppid emails include dozens to and from then-Rep. Gibbons. In one of the first such exchanges, on Sept. 23, 2003, Mr. Gibbons said he was "greatly impressed" with the technology and that he asked a military aide on his staff to set up a meeting with the National Security Agency to demonstrate the company's products. "No doubt, the Agency will be just as impressed," Mr. Gibbons wrote. He also tells an eTreppid executive to begin using a private email address that is "a direct link to my desk and does not go through anyone else."

In later exchanges, Mr. Gibbons discusses his efforts to set up meetings with the Department of Homeland Security, and arranges meetings with several Pentagon officials, including a top defense intelligence official. An eTreppid executive responds, "now if we can get into the Navy, it would be great."

In a statement yesterday, a spokesman for the governor said Mr. Gibbons has "consistently stated that he and Warren Trepp have a longstanding friendship." Mr. Gibbons, the statement continued, is proud of his efforts "to highlight the good work of Nevada companies as part of his duties to represent his constituents. However, he held no special power in awarding defense contracts, which go through a multilevel approval process."

Mr. Trepp didn't return phone calls or emails seeking comment. His attorney, Steven Peek, said yesterday, "Warren has had no inquires or questions from any federal officials about his relationship with Jim Gibbons." Mr. Peek said Mr. Trepp continues to talk to the FBI "about the theft of his company's intellectual property" by his former partner, the crux of continuing legal disputes between the two men. Mr. Peek also said Mr. Trepp "unequivocally denies that he wrote any emails regarding any payments to Jim Gibbons, and questions their authenticity."

Preliminary Stage

The FBI declined to comment on the investigation, which appears to be in a preliminary stage. The bureau has stepped up its pursuit of public-corruption cases, and says it now has about 620 agents working on federal, state and local cases, compared with 260 in 2002. On Tuesday, former senior CIA official Kyle "Dusty" Foggo was indicted on fraud, conspiracy and money-laundering charges for allegedly accepting jet flights and a vacation from a contractor, Brent Wilkes, who was indicted on related charges. Both pleaded not guilty yesterday. The indictments arose from a continuing FBI investigation of former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, who last year began serving a prison sentence for accepting bribes.

The Cunningham case and claims made against Mr. Gibbons have drawn attention to alleged congressional abuse of the classified or "black" portion of the federal budget, which covers CIA, NSA and other secret government activities and has grown to at least $30 billion. New limits on special-interest spending known as earmarks were enacted by Congress last month, including rules meant to restrict earmarks in the classified budget.

The Nevada case is being watched closely in Washington: John Negroponte, former director of national intelligence, warned in a court filing of "exceptionally grave damage" to national security if details of the secret contracts are disclosed.

The new federal probe follows a Nevada investigation of the dispute over ownership of eTreppid software used in secret government programs. That investigation was initially focused on Dennis Montgomery, the former partner of Mr. Trepp who designed the software on which eTreppid was founded in 1998. The men have accused each other of trade-secret theft, among other claims, and have been battling in court for more than a year.

The new emails and internal documents would appear to support some of the claims made in legal proceedings filed by Mr. Montgomery, who in court papers has alleged that Mr. Trepp gave at least $100,000 in cash and casino chips to Mr. Gibbons. Public records show Mr. Trepp gave $90,000 to the governor's campaign through a series of separate companies, avoiding a $10,000 limit on individual or corporate contributions.

Defamation Suit

In court filings, Mr. Trepp has denied Mr. Montgomery's claims. He also filed a defamation suit against the chairman of the Nevada Democratic Party, Tom Collins, over published comments about the business dispute before last year's election. He cites "false testimony" by Mr. Montgomery, who he says "engaged in a campaign to spread falsehoods...which led up to a story published in the Wall Street Journal." The Journal isn't a defendant in the libel suit, which is pending in state court in Reno.

The Nov. 1 page-one story in the Journal reported that Mr. Gibbons and his family accompanied Mr. Trepp on a Caribbean cruise and that the congressman had helped Mr. Trepp win federal contracts. Mr. Gibbons at the time said his assistance to Mr. Trepp's company was simply intended to promote promising technology, and that the cruise and jet flights didn't violate House ethics rules because of his "close personal friendship" with Mr. Trepp.

Mr. Montgomery has accused Messrs. Trepp and Gibbons of using their political clout to get local FBI agents to raid his home and investigate him. In December, a federal magistrate found flagrant constitutional violations in the FBI raid, according to people briefed on her ruling, which remains under seal. The court found that the local FBI and U.S. attorney's office had effectively acted as armed enforcers for eTreppid's wealthy owner in a private business dispute with a former partner.

Mr. Peek, Mr. Trepp's attorney, said, "If the magistrate decided the search was improper, I'm disappointed in the decision, but without knowing the basis, I can't comment."

In his court filings, Mr. Montgomery alleges that Mr. Gibbons himself called in local federal officials at the behest of Mr. Trepp, who is one of Mr. Gibbons's biggest campaign contributors. In an interview last year with The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Gibbons's wife, Dawn, acknowledged that Mr. Trepp's wife had called her about the dispute. In response, Mr. Peek said: "Any citizen has a right to report a crime like a theft of intellectual property and computer equipment, and the government should rightfully act on the report of a crime regardless of who reports it."

Black Resigns, Will Plead Today (RN&O)

By Dan Kane, J. Andrew Curliss And Lynn Bonner, Staff Writers

Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, February 15, 2007

Former House speaker's expected guilty plea may shed light on the future of the investigation

Former House Speaker Jim Black, once one of the state's most powerful officials, quit the legislature Wednesday as he prepared to plead guilty today to a felony public corruption charge in federal court.

"With both sadness and anticipation, I hereby resign from the House of Representatives on February 14, 2007," Black said in a short letter read to House members as they began their floor session. Black was not there to read it in person.

Black's letter did not mention the reason for his resignation. At 1 p.m. today, Black is expected to plead guilty to a federal crime of accepting illegal gratuities. The felony, which carries a 10-year maximum prison sentence, would bar him from continuing to serve in the House.

House Speaker Joe Hackney, an Orange County Democrat, said he spoke with Black midday Tuesday and learned that Black would resign and plead guilty to the crime.

Black, 71, a Mecklenburg County Democrat, could not be reached for comment. His attorney, Kenneth Bell, has not returned phone calls to The News & Observer for weeks, but confirmed the guilty plea to The Charlotte Observer on Tuesday.

Republicans and Democrats said the resignation and expected guilty plea mark a dark period for the legislature and one of the biggest falls from grace in recent state history. As speaker, Black was one of the most powerful elected officials in North Carolina, and he held the position for a record-tying four terms.

Legislators differed as to the seriousness of Black's criminal behavior, and as to whether anything would be learned from the various scandals that erupted around him over the past two years.

"I think most people feel like if he has to go to jail then the punishment doesn't fit the crime," said House Majority Leader Hugh Holliman, a Lexington Democrat. "Most of the things that I hear is that he was never accused of putting money in his own pocket, and he doesn't deserve prison because of that."

Republicans angry

Former Rep. Sam Ellis, a Raleigh Republican who lost his seat in 2004 after Black added more Democrats to his district, said the plea deal only scratches the surface. The deal would have been reached with federal prosecutors who work for U.S. Attorney George Holding, a Republican appointed to the position last year by President Bush.

"I'm disappointed that what he's pleading guilty to is so minimal compared to the level of corruption that I believe he brought to North Carolina," Ellis said.

The scandals involving Black included behind-the-scenes deals to help a major lottery company win the right to run North Carolina's new lottery; $50,000 in cash and campaign checks given to former Rep. Michael Decker, who switched parties and backed Black for speaker; and a lobbyist, Meredith Norris, whose clients gained extraordinary access to Black's staff because she also served as his unpaid political director.

Rep. John Blust, a Greensboro Republican who has been a frequent critic of Black's control over the House, said the latest developments should send a message to House members that they have to dilute the power at the top.

"It's harder to corrupt 61 instead of one," said Blust, referring to the simple majority needed in a House of 120 members.

A call for term limits

Sen. Phil Berger, a Republican from Eden, said allowing the leaders of the House and Senate to stay in those jobs indefinitely creates conditions for potential abuses. He said it would make sense to limit House speakers and Senate leaders to two two-year terms.

Black ran the House for eight years. Senate leader Marc Basnight, a Manteo Democrat, was elected this year to a record eighth term as president pro tem of the Senate.

Black Resigns House Seat (CO)

By David Ingram And Mark Johnson

The Charlotte Observer, February 15, 2007

RALEIGH - Former House Speaker Jim Black resigned his seat in the General Assembly on Wednesday, a day before he is expected to plead guilty to public corruption.

Black, six weeks into his 11th term in the House, did not appear there with colleagues. His front-row seat was empty. Instead, he sent a letter to new House Speaker Joe Hackney, Gov. Mike Easley and the clerk of the House, Denise Weeks.

In the letter, Black appeared to defend his decision to stay in office for the last 1 1/2 years, even after the State Board of Elections ruled that he broke campaign laws and while a federal grand jury heard testimony from his staff and closest political allies.

"It was important for me to help ensure a smooth transition during the last several months, which has occurred," the letter reads.

"Now it is time for me to move forward with my life and attend to the health and welfare of my family. With both sadness and anticipation, I hereby resign from the House of Representatives on Feb. 14, 2007."

The reality of Black's descent, from the pinnacle of legislative power to the precipice of a federal felony, permeated the halls of the legislature Wednesday. Even though lawmakers had anticipated such an outcome for months, as unsavory tidbits of the investigation dribbled out, the confirmation was no less unsettling.

DOJ_NMG_0132618

Following a two-year state and federal investigation, Black is expected to plead guilty today in a Raleigh federal courtroom to one felony count of accepting illegal gratuities. Black's lawyer, Kenneth Bell of Charlotte, confirmed the expected plea Tuesday.

Black faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

A clerk read Black's resignation letter aloud to a hushed House chamber shortly after 2 p.m. Minutes earlier, House chaplain Jim Harry offered a prayer based on Black's expected guilty plea.

"Today's news has an absolute and immediate effect on the men and women of this chamber -- indeed, in all of government, for that matter," Harry said. "We have the capability, and yes, we have the power, to set the tone for politics, not only for this session but for future sessions as well. More so, now than ever, the eyes of the people are upon us and upon the way we do business."

Harry also prayed for restraint and compassion -- sentiments that many fellow House members and Democrats echoed in widely describing Wednesday as a "sad day." Black remains popular among them because, they say, he was loyal and committed to building consensus among Democrats.

"I only wish the very best for a man who has done so much for the state," said Senate leader Marc Basnight, D-Dare, who often negotiated legislation directly with Black. "The emotions for myself and anyone who has known Jim Black are ones of concern for his family and for Jim Black and all of us in elected government."

In a statement, Linda Daves of the N.C. Republican Party asked House Democrats and the N.C. Democratic Party to apologize for contributing to "unprecedented corruption."

"America is a nation of laws. When men or women disregard the rule of law, a day of accounting usually comes. That day seems to have arrived for Jim Black," said Daves of Charlotte.

Democratic leaders, who avoided criticizing Black during the state and federal investigations, expressed little or no regret over not calling for his resignation earlier.

"I think all that was handled appropriately," Hackney told reporters.

Lt. Gov. Beverly Perdue, a Democrat, said, "You can't second-guess decisions that are made. That's yesterday's story. I believe, at the end of the day, justice wins."

Easley, a Democrat, remained publicly silent Wednesday on Black's resignation and expected plea.

The plea is expected to be entered around 1 p.m. today. Neither Bell nor federal authorities have given details of the plea or of how it might relate to the larger investigation.

So far, the investigation has led to the conviction of five of Black's associates, including a former lawmaker who said he took a $50,000 bribe to switch parties and support Black.

Another guilty plea from Black, in state court, could come as soon as next week.

Corruption Trial Depends On 'Prince Of Darkness' Witness (MH)

By Cammy Clark

The Miami Herald, February 15, 2007

KEY WEST - With the death last year of former Monroe County Mayor John L. "Jack" London, the federal public corruption trial of a former county attorney primarily hinges on the believability of a political consultant nicknamed ``the Prince of Darkness."

For the past three days, the political consultant, Miami Beach-based Randall Hilliard, has testified under immunity against defendant James Hendrick, his former good friend.

After the prosecution began by establishing that its key witness was not a devil worshiper, Hilliard testified that Hendrick was a major player in a 1996 bribery scheme involving a stalled Marathon hotel development.

Hilliard also testified that Hendrick orchestrated an attempted coverup, concocting explanations for how a $29,000 bribe payment London received could have come from ``legitimate business."

Hendrick, who served as Monroe County attorney from 1995 to 2000, is charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice, obstruction of justice and witness tampering.

No one involved in the bribery scheme -- to which London confessed and pleaded guilty on tax evasion -- could be prosecuted for bribery. The five-year federal statute of limitations had expired when the FBI learned of it, the prosecution said.

CREDIBILITY ATTACKS

Hendrick's Miami-based attorney, Edward Shohat, went after Hilliard's credibility, portraying him as a perennial liar and backstabbing friend who recorded private conversations for the FBI in exchange for immunity. Shohat said Hendrick's conversations on those tapes were simply an attorney trying to advise a good friend who also had been a client.

DOJ_NMG_0132619

Seven recordings offered into evidence began in July of 2003. They included phone conversations and meetings at a clothing-optional bar in Key West, at Hendrick's Key West home, at developer Pritam Singh's 50th birthday party in Vermont and during a walk in the quaint village of Woodstock, Vt.

In the first recording, Hendrick is heard telling Hilliard: ``Don't tell me anything you don't want John Doe or the world to know because as far as I know, my phone is tapped and so is yours."

Shortly after Hilliard got a subpoena to appear before a grand jury, he called Hendrick on March 5, 2004. On the recording, Hendrick told Hilliard: ``You just have to be very, very careful. And I should not be speaking with you and you and Jack should not be speaking."

Three days later, Hilliard and Hendrick met at Hendrick's home in Key West. During that recording, Hendrick told Hilliard: ``I'm sure no one would counsel me to sit here and talk with you because it would be considered witness tampering."

Developer Marvin Rappaport has testified that after years of frustration in getting county approval to develop a 79-room hotel called Hall's Resort in Marathon, the then-county mayor London told Rappaport that Rappaport had a ``political problem."

A half-hour later, Rappaport said, he got a call from Hilliard. An agreement soon was worked out in which Rappaport would pay Hilliard $82,500 for consulting fees. Hilliard testified that the terms were given to him by ``Jimmy and Jack."

The Halls Project was approved a couple of months later. London eventually received $29,000 for his influence in the project. Prosecutors said in opening arguments that Hendrick's motive for being part of the bribe was not for money, but for power. Hilliard was financially desperate and said he spent the initial $57,000 paid to him by Rappaport. After more than a year had passed, London became financially desperate as well. Prosecutors said he was about to lose his second home in Corks, Ireland.

Hilliard testified that in November of 1997, London arrived intoxicated at his pink home, located at the former fairgrounds in Key West.

"He told me he wanted his money and called me a welsher and threatened me," Hilliard said.

Hilliard testified that he sent London's lawyers in Ireland three cashier checks totaling $29,000 to satisfy the lien. On the DHL bills, he used his name on one, London's on the second, and London's wife Elaine's on the third.

When asked why, Hilliard said: ``If I was going to be doing all this madness, I wanted all of our necks to be in the same noose."

Hilliard testified he kept the incriminating documents as an ``insurance policy."

Allegations Leveled In Pellicano Case (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

A grand jury indictment identifies new details and victims in the investigation of alleged wiretapping by the Hollywood private eye.

The latest and perhaps final federal indictment in the long-running Anthony Pellicano investigation raised new allegations Wednesday about how the onetime Hollywood private eye conspired with attorney Terry Christensen to wiretap the ex-wife of billionaire Kirk Kerkorian.

While it did not charge any new defendants, the grand jury indictment named two new victims of Pellicano's alleged racketeering. Included is well-known entertainment attorney John LaViolette, who was chief negotiator in a bitter battle between the German company Intertainment AG and its onetime producing partner, the now-bankrupt Franchise Pictures.

The 111-count indictment, coming more than a year after federal prosecutors first charged Pellicano and six others with a litany of crimes, was immediately assailed by defense attorneys as a meaningless addendum to what they characterize as an overblown case.

"These are not even new charges," said Pellicano's attorney, Steven F. Gruel. "And what upsets me the most about it is that instead of providing discovery so we can contest the existing charges, it seems to me that they are wasting their time before the grand jury bringing meaningless accusations against Mr. Pellicano."

Christensen's attorney, Terree Bowers, was equally critical, suggesting the U.S. attorney's office brought the indictment in retaliation for the sharp criticism leveled at its tactics by defense attorneys.

"The prosecutors have made a huge mistake in their attempt to strike back at Terry Christensen for his recent charges of misconduct and disorganization against the government," Bowers said.

He contends that the details of that conversation "will actually clearly prove Terry's innocence if this matter is ever aired before a jury."

The U.S. attorney's office, as is its custom in pending cases, did not respond to the accusations of the defense attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0132620

The new allegations center on a March 18, 2002, conversation between Pellicano and Christensen in relation to his representation of Kirk Kerkorian in a child support case with his estranged wife, Lisa Bonder Kerkorian. Prosecutors contend Christensen paid the investigator $100,000 to eavesdrop on Bonder Kerkorian's phone calls to her attorneys and pass on information to Christensen.

The new indictment asserts that Christensen told Pellicano "one of the criteria" of arranging the illegal wiretap "is that no name ever surfaces anywhere" because "the people related to me don't want to do this."

The next month, the indictment adds, Pellicano allegedly told the attorney that "if we continue to get this kind of information with their strategy, we're really killing 'em."

And later in April 2002, according to the indictment, Pellicano allegedly told Christensen that he had 80 intercepted telephone calls to review "just from today."

The latest indictment also identifies attorney LaViolette as a victim of alleged wiretapping in 2001. On March 15 of that year, the attorney was involved in a negotiation between Intertainment and Franchise Pictures, then owned by Hollywood producer Elie Samaha and onetime actor Andrew Stevens.

In an interview Wednesday, LaViolette said he was told more than two years ago by his client, an Intertainment executive in Los Angeles, that the FBI had found phone records at Pellicano's offices suggesting that their conversations had been bugged. "The implication was that our calls were tapped, but [FBI agents] didn't give much more information than that," LaViolette said, adding that the FBI never interviewed him.

The indictment is the fourth issued by a grand jury that was impaneled in February 2005 and is expected to disband. It also names Los Angeles art dealer Paul Rusconi as a wiretap victim.

To date, seven people, including a former Beverly Hills police officer and film director John McTiernan, have pleaded guilty in the case.

New Indictment Released In Hollywood Wiretapping Scandal (AP)

By Greg Risling

AP, February 15, 2007

LOS ANGELES - A federal grand jury on Wednesday returned a revised indictment in a Hollywood wiretapping scandal that chronicles further conversations between private investigator Anthony Pellicano and an attorney representing billionaire Kirk Kerkorian.

The new indictment comes more than a year after initial charges were filed in the case and six months before trial is expected to begin. Prosecutors promised another indictment was forthcoming but no new defendants and charges were included in the latest version.

It does include detailed discussions between Pellicano, 62, and Terry Christensen, an attorney who represented Kirkorian in a child-support battle with his ex-wife.

Prosecutors accused Christensen of paying Pellicano at least $100,000 to illegally listen in on private conversations between Lisa Bonder Kerkorian and her attorneys to gain a tactical advantage in litigation. At issue was whether Kerkorian had fathered her then 4-year-old daughter.

Over a two-month period in 2002, according to court documents, Pellicano was instructed by Christensen to find out who the child's father was.

"One of the criteria is that no name ever surfaces anywhere" because "the people related to me don't want to do this," Christensen said.

Later, Pellicano tells Christensen that he has heard conversations between Bonder Kerkorian and her lawyers and "if we continue to get this kind of information with their strategy, we're really killing 'em," court documents said.

Kerkorian had a decade-long romantic relationship with Bonder Kerkorian, a former tennis pro, but they were married for only a month in 1999.

Bonder Kerkorian sought $320,000 a month from Kerkorian to support her child but later admitted that she faked a DNA paternity test by using saliva she obtained from Kerkorian's adult daughter.

Christensen, 65, has denied wrongdoing and has pleaded not guilty to one count of conspiracy and one count of intercepting wire communications.

"They have chosen to add brazenly false references to a conversation on March 18, 2002, that will actually clearly prove Terry's innocence if this matter is ever aired before a jury," Christensen's attorney Terree Bowers said.

Pellicano faces numerous charges and also has pleaded not guilty. Kerkorian, who will turn 90 in June, has not been accused of any wrongdoing in the 111-count indictment.

The conversations between Christensen and Pellicano also are the subject of a federal leak investigation. The New York Times published a story last month that had excerpts from audio recordings between the two men.

The recordings reveal Christensen stopped short of saying he told Kerkorian that Pellicano was using wiretaps to monitor Bonder Kerkorian.

U.S. District Judge Dale Fischer issued a protective order to prevent the release of evidence, but the Times has printed several articles that quote sealed FBI interview reports in the case.

The latest indictment also includes more victims including entertainment attorney John LaViolette and film producer Charles Roven.

Prosecutors contend that Pellicano illegally wiretapped the phones of Hollywood stars such as Sylvester Stallone and bribed police officers to run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases.

Fourteen people have been charged in the case, with seven pleading guilty. One person has been acquitted but has since had new charges filed against her.

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, February 15, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - An outraged federal judge sentenced a former Clark County commissioner to six years in federal prison Wednesday for doling out hundreds of thousands of dollars of a strip club owner's cash to bribe politicians in Las Vegas and San Diego.

"If there ever needs to be a message with regards to political corruption, it is this case," U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks said of the case dubbed "Operation G-Sting."

In a scathing rebuke, Hicks branded Lance Malone the recruiter, organizer, manager and leader of what he called "probably as gross a case of political corruption in the state of Nevada, certainly, that has ever occurred and been successfully prosecuted."

The judge blamed Malone, 45, for serving as "bag man" lobbyist in the distribution of at least $550,000 worth of bribes to former county commission colleagues and San Diego City Council members from 2000 to 2003.

"This has undoubtedly caused a loss of public confidence in local government that probably cannot be measured," Hicks said.

The judge increased a recommended 41-month sentence to 72 months in the Las Vegas case, after saying he was convinced by testimony that Malone accepted money for a new car from strip club owner Michael Galardi while Malone still served on the Clark County commission. Malone, a former police officer, went to work for Galardi as a lobbyist after losing a re-election bid.

Malone previously was convicted by a San Diego jury on charges that he delivered Galardi's bribes to councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet.

Zucchet's conviction was later overturned by the federal judge who heard that case. He ruled the evidence of fraud and extortion was insufficient. Inzunza was sentenced to 21 months in prison.

Hicks made the Las Vegas sentence concurrent with the three years in federal prison that Malone received in San Diego, and added a fine of $100,000.

Hicks acknowledged that all money came from Galardi, who has pleaded guilty and awaits sentencing.

"Pocket change" to Galardi, the judge said, "but big dollars, with regard to political corruption in Clark County."

The judge called Malone's relationships with his former commission colleagues essential to Galardi's attempts to buy votes and expand his empire of three strip clubs in the Las Vegas area and one club near San Diego.

However, Hicks rejected prosecutor Daniel Schiess' attempts to enter new evidence tying Malone to allegations of bribery involving a Las Vegas city councilman and to claims that a Canadian developer offered $250,000 to Malone and an indicted Las Vegas businessman to curry support for a casino project just outside Las Vegas.

Malone's lawyer, Dominic Gentile, said he would study Hicks' decision for grounds for appeal.

But he noted that Malone waived his right to appeal when he pleaded guilty in September to one count of conspiracy under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations, or RICO Act. That plea avoided trial in Las Vegas, and made Malone the fifth person convicted in the sensational southern Nevada case that included blue velvet Crown Royal bags stuffed with cash and Galardi's strip club employees trading sex for votes.

On Wednesday, Malone, 45, told Hicks that he had been greedy, and pleaded for leniency.

"I did start with good intentions, and those intentions went horribly, horribly wrong," said Malone, who Schiess said started accepting $300 a day from Galardi in October 1999.

His voice choking, the divorced father of two said the hardest thing he'd ever done was tell his young sons that he was going to prison.

"I did things that I regret and I wish I could take back, but I cannot," he said.

Malone was ordered to report to prison by April 9. The judge said will decide how much personal property Malone will be ordered to forfeit. But he put the figure at about $410,000, including assets the judge accused Malone of trying to "insulate from the system" by turning them over to his wife when they divorced shortly before his San Diego trial.

Malone declined to comment as he left court with his arm around his mother.

He becomes the third person sentenced in the corruption case that grew from years of FBI wiretaps.

Former Clark County commissioner Dario Herrera, 33, is serving four years and two months in prison. Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, 68, is serving 30 months. Erin Kenny, 46, pleaded guilty and testified against them last year. She awaits sentencing.

Galardi, 45, faces no more than five years in prison for his guilty plea and cooperation in the case.

The powerful seven-member commission wields control over a wide area of southern Nevada, including the Las Vegas Strip.

GOP Lawmaker Rips Justice's Berger Probe (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The Justice Department gave former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger a "free pass" in its investigation into his removal of documents from the National Archives, says a senior Republican lawmaker, who yesterday called for a House committee to investigate the matter instead.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and ranking member on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the department was "unacceptably incurious" about Mr. Berger's visits to the archives in May 2002 and July 2003 and never told the September 11 commission that he removed original, uninventoried documents.

Mr. Davis also said the department failed to administer a polygraph examination, despite the test being part of a plea agreement Mr. Berger made with the government in exchange for a lesser sentence.

"In investigating Mr. Berger, the Justice Department apparently gave him a free pass due to his stature as a famous former White House official," Mr. Davis said in a letter to committee Chairman Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat.

"The department's investigation came up lacking in a number of areas," he said. "Our committee, the 9/11 commission and the public have a right to a full account from Mr. Berger and the Justice Department. This can only be accomplished by further investigation."

The letter was signed by 15 House Republicans.

Mr. Waxman's office did not return calls for comment.

Mr. Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser from 1997 to 2001, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the Clinton administration's knowledge of terrorist threats to the U.S.

He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years. Facing a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, the plea bargain with the Justice Department reduced the fine and kept him out of prison.

The material was removed while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, which was investigating intelligence and security failures. This raised questions about whether he was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's counterterrorism policies and actions.

Last month, the National Archives Office of Inspector General said Mr. Berger left the building unescorted for a break and placed the papers "in an accessible construction area outside" the main Archives building.

Lanny Breuer, Mr. Berger's attorney, has said the case was thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and has been closed for more than a year. He said his client cooperated with the government's investigation and has moved on.

"It's time for the new congressional minority to do the same," he said.

The Justice Department has said there is "no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Prison Costs Spiral Upward As More Are Incarcerated (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0132623

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

America may not be able to afford its burgeoning prison system unless policy-makers overhaul their views about criminal justice, according to an analysis released yesterday by the Pew Charitable Trusts.

"It's a tempting leap of logic to assume the more people behind bars, the less crime there will be," said the report, which Pew described as the first such study to address both state and federal prison populations. "But despite public expectations to the contrary, there is no clear cause and effect."

The report suggests public officials weigh the benefits of incarceration as well as "evidence-based alternatives" that could save money but still protect public safety.

Big investments in prisons may not be "the most effective and economical way of combating crime," said Susan Urahn, director of state policy research at Pew.

But the state and federal prison population grew from 190,000 in 1970 to 1.5 million by 2005 -- an increase of 700 percent. By 2011, the prison census will be about 1.7 million -- or one out of every 178 Americans. Inmates will outnumber the residents of Atlanta, Baltimore and Denver combined.

"The U.S. imprisons significantly more people than any other nation," just beating China, which has imprisoned 1.5 million, the report said.

Total spending on local, state and federal corrections jumped from $9 billion in 1980 to $61 billion by 2003, with a "staggering" $27.5 billion increase expected by 2011, the report said, emphasizing the hard choices at stake.

"Every additional dollar spent on prisons is one dollar less that can go for preparing for the next Hurricane Katrina, educating young people, providing health care to the elderly or repairing roads and bridges," the report stated.

The report highlighted a number of trends. Finding and retaining qualified corrections officers and other personnel is a major challenge in many states; all face a changing prison population. The number of female inmates will increase by 16 percent by 2011; the male population will increase by 12 percent, the report said.

The current yearly cost of tending the average prisoner? It ranges from a low of $13,009 in Louisiana to a high of $44,860 in Rhode Island.

The report based its projections and other information primarily on statistics from the Department of Justice, the Bureau of Prisons and state resources. It is available online at www.pewtrusts.com.

"The bottom line is that the American correctional system is getting tough on criminals. But it is also getting tough on taxpayers," project director Adam Gelb said. "Our sense is that there is more bipartisan agreement about sentencing and corrections than there has been in 25 years. Led by both Republicans and Democrats, states are taking a hard look at costs and starting to make tough decisions about who needs to go for prison, and for how long."

Mr. Gelb added, "We're fairly optimistic, given the level of concern and the openness to new approaches. There's been an explosion of research about what works in the past decade. It's starting to reach both the public and elected officials."

FEVER PITCH For One Condo Developer, Boom Ends With Arrest (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

KISSIMMEE, Fla. -- The condominium boom that ended last year made a lot of developers very rich. Aleem Hussain, a journeyman property salesman with a winsome personality, wanted to be one of them.

He formed his real-estate company in 2004, calling it Main Street USA, after a nearby Disney World attraction. He bought a complex of 27 aging, two-story apartment houses in Orlando and set out to convert them into condos. His timing looked favorable. That year, for the first time, the average price of a condo in the U.S. exceeded that of a single-family home, and in the Orlando area, condo and house prices jumped 15%.

But not much has gone as planned for Mr. Hussain, 42 years old, nor has it for his hundreds of investors, who include a bunch of local sheriff's deputies. Today, Mr. Hussain's company is being liquidated by a federal bankruptcy court, and he is residing in the Seminole County jail, charged with 23 counts of federal mail and wire fraud.

Mr. Hussain's rise and fall illustrates one of the hazards of a frothy property market: inexperienced developers get in over their heads and drag unsophisticated investors down with them. "Schoolteachers, cops, doctors, priests, everyone thought they were Donald Trump," says Lewis Freeman, the court-appointed trustee administering Main Street's bankruptcy proceeding. Mr. Hussain's company, he contends, was a "microcosm of the total market. You had a lot of unqualified people getting easy money and able to go into businesses in which they didn't know what they were doing."

Mr. Hussain's 300 or so investors face potential losses of up to $400,000 apiece. Alan Cayo, 76, a retired Army officer who says he invested his "entire life savings" of $280,000 with Mr. Hussain, conjectures that the developer crossed the legal line only after financial problems began mounting. "It was incompetence, fraud, plus the market going down -- a triple whammy," he says.

· The Situation: A first-time condominium converter in Florida faces federal fraud charges related to his dealings with investors.

· The Bottom Line: The abrupt end to the national run-up in condo prices has been rough for some inexperienced developers and their often unsophisticated investors.

Mr. Hussain's lawyer, James Lenihan of White Plains, N.Y., describes his client as "someone with good intentions who made bad judgments and got overextended." He says others at the company were also responsible for what went wrong. Mr. Hussain has pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Hussain was born in the South American nation of Guyana in 1964, according to a résumé recovered from his computer by investigators. In the 1980s and 1990s, he worked in real-estate sales in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Costa Rica.

When he settled in Orlando about three years ago, the city was the epicenter of a national boom of conversions of rental apartments to condominiums. In 2005 and 2006, 24,550 apartments in the Orlando metro area, or 18% of the total in 2004, were taken off the rental market to convert, a greater number than in any other metropolitan area in the U.S., according to Reis Inc., a New York real-estate information firm.

The converters were attracted by rising prices. Between 2001 to 2004, the median resale price of existing condos nationwide jumped 57%, compared with a 25% increase for single-family houses, according to the National Association of Realtors. Real-estate experts say demand was boosted by baby boomers downsizing their homes upon retirement, and young people who were moving to cities. In addition, investors who had soured on the stock market had begun buying and selling condos.

Mr. Hussain envisioned Main Street USA, which is located south of Orlando near Gatorland amusement park, as a residential real-estate conglomerate. Its main business would be condo conversions. He and his partners formed "No-Fee Realty" to broker condo sales, and two subsidiaries, "USA Mortgage" and "Main Street USA Mortgage," to broker mortgages and home-equity loans, in some cases to enable property owners to invest in condos.

Former associates describe Mr. Hussain as charismatic and beguiling. He would demonstrate for employees his formidable sales skills by buttonholing potential home-financing customers at supermarkets and persuading them to fill out applications, which involved disclosing their Social Security numbers, recalls former employee Michael Lombardo.

To build trust with the local real-estate community, he took on a partner, Alan Randel, a real-estate broker who had worked in the area for several decades. Mr. Randel, the company's president, hasn't been charged in the case and declines to comment.

First, Mr. Hussain had to raise money to buy apartment buildings. His pitch to investors: Main Street would buy properties, convert them into condos, then sell them at a profit. He said he would set up a private real-estate investment trust to help finance the deals. Investors in the REIT, he said, would get steady, attractive dividends. Those who wanted higher, quicker returns, he said, could co-invest directly in the conversion projects.

In early 2005, he recruited Bernard Presha, who was retiring as public-information officer for the Orange County Sheriff's Department, to join as a vice president in charge of recruiting investors. Mr. Presha and others persuaded at least 10 sheriff's deputies to invest, according to bankruptcy-court documents. Jim Hanton, one of the deputies who invested, was put on a $25,000-a-year retainer. Bryan Margeson, a sheriff's department employee who taught criminal justice at a local community college, introduced Mr. Hussain at investment seminars and talked about how he thought Orlando's boom would continue for years.

Mr. Presha, who has filed a bankruptcy-court claim to recoup $305,000 he invested, says he quit after a couple of months because he wasn't good at persuading investors. Mr. Margeson, who says he lost $100,000, says Mr. Hussain "used me for some credibility, which I didn't realize they lacked."

"Jim [Hanton] said being a drug-enforcement cop, he was super skeptical when his wife suggested they invest," says Mr. Cayo, the retired Army man. "But after a luncheon with Aleem, he was convinced." Mr. Cayo says Mr. Hanton's involvement reassured him. "He was Anglo -- excuse me, but Aleem Hussain could be cousins with Saddam Hussein, so having Jim involved" was comforting.

Mr. Hanton, Main Street's vice president of operations, says he wasn't involved in condo sales or in company finances. He says he lost $130,000, and calls the situation "embarrassing."

DOJ_NMG_0132625

In August 2005, Mr. Hussain held a dinner for prospective investors at the Citrus Club, an elite private establishment. According to several who attended, he projected a 100% return in 120 days or less for those who invested directly in a Main Street project.

Magic Marketing Deal

That summer, Mr. Hussain cut a deal with the Orlando Magic, the National Basketball Association franchise. For $350,000, Main Street secured the right to use the team's name in advertising, and to use head coach Brian Hill in a marketing video. Fans could register on the Magic's Web site to attend Main Street investment seminars at the team's practice facility. Attendees could spin a raffle wheel for a shot at free game tickets.

An Orlando Magic spokesman describes the pact as "a traditional team marketing agreement," and says the video was one of 20 the head coach recorded one day for various sponsors. He says the team conducts reference checks on its marketing partners and has never had a problem before.

Mark Pilkington, a counterterrorism official at the sheriff's department who invested $300,000, says the Magic marketing deal reassured him. "We realized there was a frenzy in condos. They were selling like crazy," he says. "I figure, why would he rip me off for $300,000 if he's involved with the Magic?"

In September 2005, with $10 million from about 200 investors, Mr. Hussain moved to buy the 27 apartment houses known as Waldengreen. The complex contained 278 units ranging in size from 517 to 1,079 square feet. His $18.5 million winning bid, financed by a private lender, was a "damn good price for the seller," says Hal Warren, senior director with brokerage Cushman & Wakefield Inc., who represented the South Florida investors who sold. Nevertheless, Mr. Hussain figured he'd turn a substantial profit. He paid $67,000 per unit; he intended to sell them for an average of $150,000.

Mr. Hanton, the sheriff's deputy, alerted him to an 18-acre lakefront estate for sale in Winter Garden, which county records show was owned by Khalil bin Laden, a brother of Osama bin Laden. Mr. Hussain planned to refurbish the Spanish-colonial-style mansion and to add houses, condominiums or stores on the grounds, company documents indicate.

Before Mr. Hussain and a business partner left for Dubai, where the two sides planned to finalize the deal, the company had lined up financing for a $5 million bid, says Jim O'Neil, a former Main Street mortgage processor. In Dubai, after being persuaded by the seller that values had risen, Mr. Hussain agreed to pay $7 million. "We gave Aleem a line not to go over and he jumped over it," says Mr. O'Neil.

Mr. Hussain began renovating the apartment complex, which he renamed Villas at Waldengreen, and his sales team began peddling the planned condominiums. Prospective buyers were invited to seminars conducted by Messrs. Hussain and Margeson of the sheriff's department.

Anthony Cortes, an airline mechanic and father of two, says Mr. Hussain and a retired sheriff's deputy made him an attractive offer: If he put 10% down to buy a condo at Waldengreen, Main Street would make his mortgage payments for two years during the renovations. In February 2006, Mr. Cortes put $14,000 down for a $140,000 unit and took out a mortgage for the rest.

Linda Paralitici, a 50-year-old mother of five who worked for Main Street as a sales broker, bought one unit and persuaded her brother to buy one. "We were not allowed to see the property," she says.

Lack of Experience

Inside the company, Mr. Hussain's lack of experience was showing. Former employees say the operation was disorganized from day one. "The whole thing was a disaster," says Mr. Lombardo, the former employee, who was hired to originate mortgage loans even though he had no experience at it. Piles of mortgage applications by condo buyers who had put down $5,000 deposits, he recalls, languished on the desks of co-workers who were supposed to find financing.

In 2005, signs began emerging that the flood of new condominiums was more than the market could bear. That July, price appreciation for condos nationwide slipped below that of single-family homes. Converters stopped purchasing new properties and smart speculators got spooked.

Main Street sold only 100 of Waldengreen's 278 units. Renovation was haphazard, former employees say. Rather than try to move renters out of one building at a time to allow for the conversions, Main Street tore apart single apartments all over the complex. Several contractors quit because they weren't paid.

Buyers who were told that Main Street would cover two years of mortgage payments began hearing from their lenders that they were in danger of default. Mr. Cortes says he took a second job as a home inspector to take on the $1,200 monthly payment on his unit.

When Colleen Sharkey joined Main Street as a senior vice president in mid-2006, she says, Mr. Hussain told her: "I need to hire you because we've grown so fast and I have no credibility with the bankers and business community." It took her three weeks to understand the books, which were a mess, she says. She says she concluded the company was nearly bankrupt.

By August, the company was out of cash, bankruptcy-court documents indicate. It had lost $3.6 million in deposits on two other apartment complexes it had tried to buy. Dividend payments to the REIT investors, which had been steady, stopped. On Sept. 23, several of those investors confronted Mr. Hussain at Main Street's offices, according to a claim one of them filed in bankruptcy court, and Mr. Hussain responded by writing on a legal pad: "It is our intention to repay all principal investment and interest promised to the above referenced clients at such time as we refinance or sell our assets to provide the necessary funds to accomplish this."

On Sept. 29, Main Street sought bankruptcy-court protection in Orlando. By then, several investors, including some sheriff's deputies, had contacted federal prosecutors to report that REIT dividend payments had stopped and that Mr. Hussain had refused to return their original investments, as promised by the investment documents.

In October, Mr. Hussain rented a car and drove to Atlanta to catch a flight to Costa Rica. U.S. Marshals, alerted by federal investigators in Orlando, met him at the gate and arrested him.

A federal grand jury indicted him on 23 counts of mail and wire fraud. Among the accusations: He falsely represented to investors that their money would be kept in the REIT, when in reality there was no REIT and the money sat in a checking account. And he told investors their dividend payments came from investment profits, when he actually was paying them from money invested by others.

Investigators also say Main Street sold condos at inflated prices to Mr. Hussain's friends or relatives to generate misleading appraisals that justified the higher prices paid by outside buyers.

Mr. Hussain's lawyer, Mr. Lenihan, says his client wasn't trying to flee the country, but was going to Costa Rica and Nicaragua for business and charity purposes. He argues that prosecutors have singled out his client, in part because of his Middle Eastern sounding name, when others at the company were also responsible. "This thing was not set up as a scheme to defraud people," he says. "This is what happens to good people with a good idea and lousy timing who get into trouble." Mr. Hussain's trial is scheduled for April.

Investors and others have filed $19 million of claims in bankruptcy court. Mr. Cayo says he has defaulted on the three condos he bought because broken pipes have made them unrentable. Mr. Cortes continues to make payments on his unit.

The Waldengreen complex, which fell into disrepair last fall, has been taken over by the group that financed Main Street's purchase of it. A new manager has been hired and the units are once again for rent.

The company's remaining assets are being liquidated by the court. It is unlikely that investors will recoup much of their money, according to several people involved in the case.

Mr. Margeson, the sheriff's deputy, refers to the affair as his "$100,000 lesson." He notes that he "never saw people strong-armed to invest. The sad part is people lined up to invest their money. It was the whole furor of the real-estate market."

Anti-money Laundering Compliance Sparks Debate (MH)

By Jane Bussey

The Miami Herald, February 15, 2007

Banks -- facing the rising burden of complying with anti-money laundering rules -- often ask why federal officials are picking on them.

"Where are the criminals going to place their proceeds? At some point in banks," said Justice Department lawyer Lester M. Joseph, borrowing from Willie Sutton's purported quip that he robbed banks because that is where the money is.

Joseph, principal deputy chief in the Justice Department's asset forfeiture and money-laundering section, spoke Wednesday at the Florida International Bankers Association's annual Anti-Money Laundering Compliance Conference.

He said investigators simply follow the money and sometime end up targeting a bank for criminal enforcement if they discover it didn't have "a serious compliance program" in place.

Under the Bank Secrecy Act and the USA Patriot Act, banks must report suspicious activity and know their customers -- and that includes knowing whether those they do business with are drug traffickers, corrupt government officials or even an official's mistress.

Anti-money laundering consultant Brett Wolf said that the cost of implementing reporting programs was rising to the point where an anti-money laundering compliance officer can cost a bank half a million dollars.

"What everyone is concerned about is how do you balance the need for information with the compliance burden," said Wolf, anti-money laundering editor with Complinet, a New York company.

Throughout the three-day conference at the Radisson Miami Hotel, Washington officials emphasized the need to impose reporting requirements to counter drug trafficking and terrorist financing but also acknowledged the need to strike a balance.

They promised to listen, especially to concerns that stringent reporting rules are driving Latin American financial transactions away from Miami and to financial centers in Europe and elsewhere.

THE EURO FACTOR

Martin Redrado, the president of Argentina's Central Bank, said some of the hurdles and higher costs mean U.S. banks are losing business as Latin American banks simply decide to take their transactions to Europe and do business in euros.

"For a policy to be effective, you need to build consensus. It cannot be imposed," Redrado said.

Banks from the United States and Latin America are meeting in Cartagena, Colombia from April 18-20 to discuss the challenges of enforcing anti-money laundering rules across borders.

Washington officials attending the FIBA meeting, however, made it clear that while the government is trying to modify its approach, anti-money laundering safeguards are here to stay.

"It is even more relevant as we have collectively watched the world becoming more dangerous," William F. Baity, acting director of the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, said Wednesday, the final day of the conference.

Further complicating the panorama for banks are 2005 rules that require them to carry out due diligence on all their correspondent banks, which adds an extra burden on South Florida banks that do business with hundreds of counterparts in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Although Redrado, the Argentine official, said he did not believe there was "any possibility of modifying" the anti-money laundering rules, he pointed out there are many gray areas that need to be cleared up to ease compliance. "Be specific," he said.

ACCRUING INTEREST

Interest in anti-money laundering compliance is on the rise. Some 1,100 people attended this year's FIBA conference compared to around 700 people last year, and about 40 vendors participated, offering software and other services to help banks with their compliance requirements.

This year there was also a significant increase in the number of domestic bank representatives attending the conference. "You can see all of the [anti-money laundering] regimen is being spread out all over," said Clemente Vasquez-Bello, an attorney from Gunster Yoakley and the conference chairman. ``In the past it was [just] applied to big money center banks and international bankers."

Ex-D.C. Engineer Charged With Bribing Inspector (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Federal authorities have filed bribery charges against a former D.C. Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs worker accused of paying off an inspector to reduce thousands of dollars in building code fines.

Yaw Oteng-Agipong faces up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong, working as a private structural engineer, in September attempted to bribe a D.C. government inspector in connection with a construction project on Fifth Street Northwest, according to charging documents.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong declined to comment when reached by phone.

A spokeswoman for the Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs said yesterday that Mr. Oteng-Agipong retired in 2005 and hasn't worked for the city since.

Spokeswoman Linda Argo said agency officials cooperated in the investigation, which she said was handled by the FBI and the D.C. Office of the Inspector General.

"This is, as far as we know, an isolated incident," Miss Argo said.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong was employed with the District from 1982 to April 2005, when he took voluntary retirement. Before retiring, he was a supervisory structural engineer.

According to charging documents filed Friday in federal court, Mr. Oteng-Agipong offered $2,000 in cash to a city inspector in hopes of lifting a stop-work order on the project because it violated provisions of a building permit.

The inspector also had issued $6,000 in fines, authorities said.

Mr. Oteng-Agipong offered the bribe to "lift the stop work order and reduce the fine," according to the U.S. attorney's office.

SoCal Doctors Charged In Alleged $12-million Medicare Fraud (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, February 15, 2007

LOS ANGELES - Doctors and others filed phony Medicare claims that bilked the government out of more than $12 million, according to charges filed Wednesday.

A federal grand jury in Orange County returned indictments accusing 18 people of billing the government for respiratory therapy for Southern California patients - services that either were not needed or never performed, the U.S. attorney's office said in a statement.

The two indictments alleged conspiracy, money laundering and 68 counts of health care fraud against nine doctors and others, including several administrators of board-and-care homes.

Prosecutors contend that the doctors paid people known as "cappers" and board-and-care operators to recruit "elderly, infirm and mentally ill patients" for respiratory therapy.

"The therapists were ordered to entice the residents to undergo the treatments with gifts, such as sodas, candy and doughnuts," federal prosecutors said.

If convicted, the defendants could be sentenced to a maximum of 10 years in federal prison for each count of health care fraud, 20 years for money laundering and five years for conspiracy.

In an unrelated case, a man who posed as a doctor was accused billing Medicare for more than $500,000 in phony or unnecessary services he provided to patients from three counties.

Betros Garabet, 40, of Glendale, was not licensed to practice medicine when he opened a Pomona clinic and he was accused of using another person's doctor's license in order to file Medicare claims for patients brought in from Los Angeles, San Bernardino and Riverside counties, the U.S. attorney's office said.

He hired cappers to recruit Medicare recipients, who were paid kickbacks to go to Garabet's clinic, according to a Feb. 7 indictment.

Garabet and three other people are charged with health care fraud. Garabet remained at large but the others were arrested Wednesday.

One defendant also was charged with making a false statement to the FBI.

Garabet could not immediately be reached for comment. There was no telephone listing for him in Glendale.

Neteller Patrons To See Longer Wait For Money (USAT)

By Jon Swartz, Usa Today

USA Today, February 15, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — The waiting game for thousands of U.S. patrons with money tied up in an online payment service under federal investigation just got longer.

The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York late Wednesday said it extended the deadline until March 16 to decide whether to indict the co-founders of Neteller, an Internet money-transfer service popular among gamblers. Stephen Lawrence and John Lefebvre were arrested in January on a charge of conspiracy to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling

For U.S. customers of the site, it was another delay in their efforts to recoup their money, which remains in Neteller accounts until the legal matter is resolved.

Neteller says U.S. authorities have frozen access to about $55 million in U.S.-based accounts.

"As a result of the restrictions placed by third parties, court-ordered seizures and related legal concerns, (Neteller) is unable to make payments to U.S. customers," says a posting on the company's website.

FBI agent Neil Donovan has said funds are being held in court as potential evidence. He did not provide a timetable on when customers may get their money back.

Though money-transfer companies such as Neteller do business with financial institutions and merchants, many also allow gambling companies to transfer money collected from U.S. gamblers to bank accounts outside the USA. Neteller last month closed its U.S. Internet gambling services, erasing about two-thirds of its business.

A law signed by President Bush in October bans the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for Internet gaming. U.S. residents place more than half of all bets to major offshore casinos in an estimated $10.6 billion industry. However, most online gaming sites are based offshore, outside the reach of American law enforcement.

With Neteller's financial future teetering in the balance, consumers might choose less reliable money-transfer services instead, says Ken Dreifach, an Internet attorney.

Man Pleads Guilty In Scam (MJS)

By David Doege

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 15, 2007

Clothing scheme may bring 20 years

A Brookfield man charged with using the Internet to traffic counterfeit clothing and defraud people around the country and in Germany pleaded guilty Wednesday in federal court to wire fraud.

Steven M. Weber told U.S. District Judge Charles Clevert that his scam began innocently under his parents' roof when he found a way to make money by connecting small-business people with clothing suppliers.

"I tried to go into business, tried to be an entrepreneur," Weber explained. "I started around 2004, right after high school."

But after realizing that he was passing on counterfeit designer clothing because customers complained and the suppliers were charging prices too good to be true, Weber said he continued in the trade anyway.

"I foolishly knew that it was counterfeit," Weber told Clevert, adding that he kept some buyers' money without sending them their merchandise.

Documents filed in state and federal court during the 2 1/2 years that Weber was under investigation say that he persisted in illegal Internet activities after warnings from police, the seizures of his car and two computers from his home, the freezing of a bank account, and prosecutors' statement in open court that Weber had become the focus of a federal investigation.

Weber was arrested in September after an investigation involving the FBI, Brookfield police and an area cyber-crimes task force, in which undercover agents bought counterfeit clothing from Weber and made clear to him in e-mails that they wanted counterfeit clothing.

The agents connected with Weber after investigating complaints from customers in several states and Germany, who said they sent him thousands of dollars for large lots of designer clothing that they never received.

According to the plea agreement in the case, investigators linked Weber to at least 22 victims who were defrauded of at least $213,000.

Weber, who is under house arrest, is to be sentenced June 8. The charge carries up to 20 years in prison.

Robberies, Assaults With Guns Increase 50% From '06 (WT)

By Daniel Taylor

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The number of violent crimes committed with guns in the first six weeks of the year has increased by 50 percent compared with the same period last year, according to Metropolitan Police Department statistics.

Preliminary statistics indicate that 267 gun-involved robberies and assaults have been reported this year through Tuesday, compared with 181 in the year-ago period.

DOJ_NMG_0132630

"It's a big concern," 4th District Cmdr. Hilton Burton said yesterday. "We've definitely seen an increase in robberies since the beginning of the year."

Robberies involving guns jumped from 17 last year to 25 in the 4th District, which lies in Northwest east of Rock Creek Park. Assaults with guns have increased from five to 13 this year.

Such increases are sometimes due to a few criminals who go on crime sprees, Cmdr. Burton said.

"Generally, we find it's the same group of individuals that may be hitting over and over again," he said. "One, maybe two arrests will generally close out most of the cases."

But he has noticed that the recent robberies haven't been limited to one area.

"It's all across the 4th District," he said.

The biggest increase in robberies involving guns occurred in the 1st District, where such incidents jumped from 10 last year to 31. Assaults with guns went from seven last year to 10.

Cmdr. Diane Groomes, who heads the 1st District, said she isn't sure what is causing the increase. Her district -- which includes much of the downtown core -- showed the largest increase, with a 140 percent jump in gun-related assaults and robberies.

She attributed much of the increase to juveniles "going around in vans and jumping out on people."

The 7th District, located entirely in Southeast, showed a 200 percent increase in robberies with guns, going from 10 cases through mid-February last year to 30 cases. On Tuesday, an off-duty police officer was shot while being robbed by two men in that district.

Reports of assaults and robberies involving guns increased in every police district except the 6th District, which includes parts of Southeast and Northeast. That district showed no significant change.

There were 408 robberies, including those in which guns were not used, this year, compared with 404 last year.

Overall assaults have declined from 347 last year to 301.

The only substantial decline in gun-involved robberies occurred in the 3rd District, which recorded a drop from 35 last year to 31. However, gun-involved assaults in the 3rd District, which encompasses Columbia Heights and Mount Pleasant in Northwest, went from eight last year to 20.

Council member Jim Graham, a Democrat who represents Ward 1, which largely overlaps the 3rd District, said the increase in violence is "an extreme concern."

"The 3rd District has been experiencing a continuing spike, and that has worried me very much," he said.

Charles H. Ramsey, the former police chief, had declared a crime emergency in July after a wave of armed robberies and assaults. Homicides and robberies dipped in the months after the emergency.

Council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat, said he also was concerned about gun-crime levels in the District, but he cautioned that the statistics only cover six weeks.

Mr. Mendelson, who heads the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, which has oversight of the police department, said the main concern remains the amount of guns in the city.

"It's a continuing problem," he said. "There are far too many guns."

An Outsider's Murder Trial Shakes A Southern Town (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

ABBEVILLE, S.C., Feb. 14 — It was a dispute over 20 feet of mean-looking land, a deadly squeeze of the trigger three years ago backed by pure conviction and an unwavering motto.

The Bixby family refused to budge for a highway-widening project, out of belief. "Live free or die," cried Steve Bixby, bespectacled and rigged out in camouflage and guns the day of the shooting, in a challenge to the authorities, witnesses said.

Mr. Bixby, 39, and his father, Arthur, 77, are accused of murder in the fatal shootings of two law enforcement officers who were trying to seize the land on behalf of the State of South Carolina. Both men face the death penalty. Mr. Bixby's mother, Rita, 74, was indicted as an accessory.

Now, with the opening Wednesday of Mr. Bixby's trial in the murder of Deputy Sheriff Danny Wilson, 37, and Donnie Ouzts, 63, a state constable, this Old South town with its intense Confederate heritage is reliving the winter's day in 2003 when the reclusive Bixbys held off the local police for 14 hours, after the shootings of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Ouzts.

The town is doing so gingerly. There were no supporters of the Bixbys on hand Wednesday as a jury sat in judgment over what the authorities say was Mr. Bixby's deadly act of resistance to authority. He is reviled in Abbeville, and the prosecutor had to pick his jury 160 miles away.

What the authorities said was Mr. Bixby's armed refusal to give up a small piece of his land for the widening of Highway 72 — "We will protect it to our last breath," he is reported to have proclaimed — is regarded here as senseless. Guns at the ready, Mr. Bixby was primed and waiting for his face-off with the police, witnesses said.

On the other hand, symbols of resistance to central authority, some of the South's most hallowed, abound here, lovingly tended in the quaint little town billing itself for passing tourists as the "Birthplace and Deathbed of the Confederacy."

Up the street from the mellow brick courthouse is the white-columned mansion where Jefferson Davis had his last cabinet meeting; nearby, one of the first rallies demanding secession was held in 1860. The monument to the Confederate dead outside the courthouse proclaims that "the soldiers who wore the gray and died with Lee were in the right;" the Confederate flag flies high above the highway; and a bookstore off the old brick square sells titles like "The South Was Right" and "Myths of Slavery."

The Southern Poverty Law Center, a civil rights organization in Montgomery, Ala., says the Abbeville area, in the western part of the state, has attracted others like the Bixbys — fanatics about property rights and resistance to authority who find the Confederate heritage nourishing. "We've pointed out that that area is one of the hotbeds," said Mark Potok, a staff director at the center.

Residents deny that there is any connection between the region's Confederate heritage and a violent property-rights ideology.

"I have no clue why the Bixbys moved here," said the man running the bookstore, Robert Hayes, who also is the state director for the League of the South, a neo-Confederate group still pushing for Southern independence. "He could have picked any place in South Carolina."

Indeed, one the first things people here say about the Bixbys is that they were "outsiders," as Mr. Hayes put it, "not us." About 10 years ago they moved from New Hampshire, where they were involved with an anti-tax/anti-zoning group, and had had run-ins with a judge.

Why the family chose Abbeville is, people here say, a mystery. "Abbeville is just not like that," said Cheri Standridge, executive director of the Chamber of Commerce.

Amanda Dean, who runs a coffee shop on the square, said the family had the wrong idea about the town. "This is a good, strong family town," Ms. Dean said. "It's just such a shame. They could feel like they're coming to their homeland, and that's what's so sad."

The Bixbys may have warmed to Abbeville, but the feeling was not reciprocated by the genteel town. Steve Bixby, heavy-set and marginally employed in construction and food-concession vending, a sometime karaoke singer at a local bar, remained an outsider, while he and his parents fulminated together in the modest little clapboard house about the horrors of government interference. It is still pock-marked with bullet holes.

Indeed, the culture clash between the Yankee Bixbys and their reluctant Southern hosts was on vivid display in the trial's opening testimony Wednesday. Several witnesses — plain-talking highway engineers who had encountered the Bixbys in the days before the shootings on Dec. 8, 2003 — testified with shock about the family's propensity for profanity.

"During all this they continued to cuss," said Drew McCaffrey of the South Carolina Department of Transportation. "There was a lot of cussing from Steve and Rita," Mr. McCaffrey said.

"They were cussing an awful lot, him and his mom," said Mr. McCaffrey's colleague Dale Williams, who recalled the "No Government Agents" sign in the front yard. Michael Hannah, another department employee, recalled, "They basically started making some threats, and there was cussing."

The verbal violence — "ranting and raving," Mr. Williams called it — presaged the physical, the witnesses said. A chilling scene confronted him when he drove by on the morning of the shooting: Steve Bixby, framed by his house, "a pistol in his right hand and a long gun in his left." The witness added soberly, "I knew at that time the officer was in trouble." Mr. Wilson was shot in the chest and Mr. Ouzts in the back, at the doorstep.

Both men were well-known and well-liked; a young man, asked if he knew them, bit his lip and ducked his head as he hurried out of the coffee shop on the square. "They want to put it behind them," said Bill Greene, a retired electrical technician, of the townspeople. "Lot of times, people move into these little towns, they think they can have things their way. But you have to obey the laws."

Research: Red-light Cameras Work (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, February 15, 2007

ATLANTA — Surveillance cameras at major intersections dramatically reduce the number of drivers who barrel through red lights, two new research reports say.

DOJ_NMG_0132632

The findings come as debate about the controversial devices continues a decade after they were introduced. The battles include a proposal to ban the cameras here in Georgia, litigation in at least three states and legislative efforts to permit them in six other states.

The cameras automatically photograph vehicles that drive into intersections after the light turns red. Vehicle owners are then mailed citations instructing them to pay a fine or sign an affidavit that they weren't driving at the time.

More than 850 people die and about 170,000 are injured each year in crashes caused by drivers running red lights, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration says.

Researchers studied the effectiveness of red-light cameras in Philadelphia and Virginia Beach.

The Philadelphia study, conducted by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety (IIHS), an industry group, examined red-light violations using a two-step approach. First, researchers found that violations dropped by 36% after yellow lights were extended to give drivers more warning that the light was about to turn red. After red-light cameras were added, remaining violations dropped by 96%.

"There's a dramatic change in driver behavior when red-light cameras are used," says Richard Retting, senior transportation safety engineer for IIHS. "The jury is in on that question."

The Virginia Beach study, conducted by Old Dominion University, examined signal violations at four intersections before red-light cameras were installed, while they were operating and after they were removed in 2005. Violations more than tripled by August 2006.

"That's a huge jump," says lead researcher Bryan Porter, an associate professor of psychology at Old Dominion. "The rate of red-light running was actually higher" than before the cameras were installed.

The popularity of the cameras is growing rapidly despite opposition that centers on constitutional grounds. About 250 communities around the USA use the devices, according to the Insurance Institute. Just 10 years ago, only New York and San Francisco had them.

Opponents say the cameras deny drivers their right to confront their accusers in court and are a ploy by local governments to raise revenue.

"There is a lot of money to be made with them," says Howard Bass, a Minnesota attorney who successfully challenged Minneapolis' red-light camera system in a case that will be argued before the state Supreme Court next month. "Ultimately, this is an issue that may have to be decided in the court of public opinion rather than courts of law. It's a public policy issue of how much surveillance creep we will tolerate in the 21st century."

MySpace Cleared In Sexual Assault Case (LAT)

By Dawn C. Chmielewski And Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

Whose fault is it that 13-year-old Julie Doe lied about her age, met a guy on MySpace and was sexually assaulted by him in a Texas parking lot?

Not MySpace's, a federal judge said in a decision released Wednesday.

The ruling appears to be the first time a federal court has extended to social-networking sites the same free-speech protections granted to Internet service providers. It could prove pivotal, coming as educators, lawmakers and states' attorneys general are leaning on News Corp.-owned MySpace to protect young users from online predators.

"A lot of people are angry about what kids are doing and what's happening on the Internet," said Parry Aftab, a leading Internet child safety expert. "That's fine. But it is not MySpace's role to raise your child."

Authorities in Travis County, Texas, charged a 19-year-old man with sexual assault in connection with the Julie Doe case. The girl's parents sued News Corp. for $30 million, saying MySpace didn't do enough to protect its members from harm. At least four similar cases are pending in Los Angeles Superior Court. MySpace is based in Beverly Hills.

"If anyone had a duty to protect Julie Doe, it was her parents, not MySpace," Judge Sam Sparks wrote in a ruling dismissing the case.

Sparks, of U.S. District Court in Austin, said MySpace couldn't be held liable for the actions of its users any more than Yahoo Inc. is responsible for what people write on its message boards.

The judge also said MySpace should not be punished for the failure of its safety measures -- if it were, the judge said, Internet companies would stop trying.

Since News Corp. acquired it in July 2005, MySpace has worked to counter its image as a haven for unsavory characters. The site hired a former federal prosecutor as chief safety officer, ran public service announcements on its site and TV channels warning children to be cautious of strangers online and began working on parental control software.

"MySpace has always been concerned about what happened to Julie Doe, because we take the safety and security of our community very seriously," the site said in a statement. "However, a lawsuit against MySpace was not the appropriate way to redress any harm to her."

In his ruling, Sparks applied the 1996 Communications Decency Act, in which Congress said Internet service providers should not be held liable for content posted on their sites by third parties. A year later, the Supreme Court struck down online censorship provisions that sought to protect minors from obscene and indecent material but left intact the immunity for ISPs.

"The concept is basically the same," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest research group in Washington, D.C. "The exact same things were happening in AOL chat rooms as are now happening on Facebook and MySpace and elsewhere -- people are exchanging information and meeting each other in online environments."

In the past decade, Rotenberg said, courts have interpreted that immunity broadly out of "recognition that, if ISPs became responsible for editorial content of anyone who participated in online chat, it would be impossible to host a site."

According to the court documents, the 13-year-old girl known as Julie Doe listed her age as 18 when she joined MySpace. In April 2006, she was contacted through the site by college freshman Pete Solis. The two exchanged e-mail and phone calls, then went out for dinner and a movie. Police say he then sexually assaulted her in a parking lot.

Austin lawyer Adam J. Loewy, who represented the girl, said they were disappointed in the ruling and plan to appeal.

"We were prepared for a very long battle in this," Loewy said. "This is simply the opening round. ... We feel MySpace does have a duty to protect the children on the site."

Bipartisan legislation was proposed last month to require sexual offenders to register their e-mail addresses with authorities and passed on to social networking sites.

Last year, the House overwhelmingly passed legislation that would have prohibited schools and libraries that receive federal funds from allowing minors to access social networking sites. The legislation never came up in the Senate, but last month Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, incorporated it in a proposed bill to protect children online.

CIVIL LAW:

Advocates Urge Improvements To FOIA Process (TECHD)

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, February 15, 2007

Civil libertarians and national security experts told lawmakers Wednesday that the longstanding law that lets citizens request full or partial disclosure of previously unreleased government documents is essential for government accountability.

Caroline Fredrickson, the American Civil Liberties Union's top lobbyist, said in prepared congressional testimony that the Freedom of Information Act is "democracy's X-ray" and is a priceless tool for revealing government waste, fraud, abuse and corruption.

Recent documents uncovered by the ACLU thanks to FOIA showed that the government has been spying on peace groups and torturing detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Afghanistan and Iraq, she told the House Government Reform and Oversight Information Policy Subcommittee in a mid-afternoon session.

But Fredrickson said in her statement that FOIA's effectiveness has been undermined by the Bush administration, specifically through an October 2001 directive by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft for agencies to adopt a policy of non-disclosure.

The current White House is "intentionally and improperly shielding itself from public view, using 'national security' as a barrier to prevent Americans from seeing what's happening inside our government," Fredrickson said. She urged Congress to rescind the Ashcroft memorandum and emphasize the presumption toward disclosure.

Meredith Fuchs, general counsel for the National Security Archive, said in her testimony that plenty of good comes from FOIA, but the process is "plagued by inefficiency, delay and sometimes outright obstruction."

FOIA requires agencies to process requests within 20 business days, but a 2003 archive audit identified unprocessed requests as old as 16 years, she said. The examination was repeated two years ago with similar findings.

According to Fuchs' testimony, addressing the delays requires better reporting so problems are identified promptly; improved leadership and tracking of requests by agencies; more resources to handle FOIA requests; and penalties for departments that do not answer requests within the required timeframe.

Clark Hoyt, who testified on behalf of the Sunshine in Government Initiative, also had some recommendations. He said a FOIA ombudsman should be created within the federal government to serve as a "champion for FOIA training and compliance [and] a place where individuals seeking to exercise their rights under FOIA can go for help short of filing a lawsuit."

Hoyt's group consists of 10 media groups committed to openness in government. "FOIA has become an essential tool for journalists attempting to find out for the public what the vast and complex federal government is up to," he said.

Subcommittee Chairman William Lacy Clay, D-Mo., called FOIA "one of the cornerstones of our democracy" and said a bill introduced last session provided a "practical and measured approach to remedying problems identified by the requester community."

That measure would have reduced the number of disputed FOIA requests through mediation and improved the information reported by agencies, he said. The bill is "an excellent starting point for legislation this Congress," Clay said.

Linda Koontz, director of information management for the Government Accountability Office, and Melanie Ann Pustay, acting director for the Justice Department's office of information and privacy, also were expected to testify at the hearing.

NIAGARA FALLS: Arrests Made In Temple Vandalism Case (LOCKUSJ)

By Rick Pfeiffer

Lockport (NY) Union-Sun & Journal, February 15, 2007

Two teenage skaters are charged with hate crimes

Now, two members of a “skakeboard club” known as DNA, are behind bars and charged with hate crimes. The arrests follow an investigation by local and federal law enforcement into a continuing series of acts of vandalism at Temple Beth Israel Conservative on College Avenue.

Shawn Michael Blount, 18, and a 14-year-old boy, whose name is being withheld because of his age, were picked up Wednesday morning by Falls Police Juvenile Division detectives and an agent from the FBI’s Joint Terrorism Task Force. Blount will be arraigned later today on charges in Falls City Court, while the juvenile appeared in Niagara County Family Court late Wednesday afternoon.

Blunt has been charged with third-degree criminal mischief and second-degree harassment as felony hate crimes. He also faces charges of third- and fourth-degree criminal mischief, first-degree aggravated harassment, fourth-degree criminal facilitation, fourth-degree stalking, making graffiti, possession of graffiti instruments and unlawfully posting advertisements.

The juvenile was charged with second-degree menacing, second-degree aggravated harassment and third-degree criminal mischief as felony hate crimes. He was also charged with third- and fourth-degree criminal mischief, first-degree aggravated harassment, fourth-degree criminal facilitation, fourth-degree stalking, making graffiti, possession of graffiti instruments and unlawfully posting advertisements.

In addition, police charged the juvenile with second-degree assault and resisting arrest after he fought with detectives as they tried to take him into custody. Two detectives suffered minor injuries in the scuffle.

“(The juvenile) has an awful lot of anger and hate in him,” Falls Police Captain John DeMarco said. “He didn’t want to go (with cops), but he did (go).”

The trouble at the temple has been going on for the last two years, but escalated dramatically over the summer and into the fall of 2006. The most recent incident at the temple occurred on Jan. 12, when duct tape was used to spell out the message “Kill the Jews” on a temple door.

Other acts of vandalism included spraying painting “DNA” on the concrete steps of the synagogue, destroying fencing and peppering the walls of the temple with eggs and paintballs.

The use of the temple property for skateboarding apparently began DNA’s interest in the property. Having established their turf, the group refused to leave.

“They wouldn’t go,” said Dr. Lawrence Wolfgang, president of the temple congregation. “They wouldn’t leave no matter who told them to go. They’d even bring out the skateboard ramp (as temple representatives told them to leave their property).”

On one occasion, Wolfgang said he confronted Blount and the juvenile outside the temple, as they were skateboarding. He said the confrontation was scary.

"They responded with a string of four letter words, right in your face," he said. "I'm kind of lucky they didn't hit me. These are big kids, bigger than me. They were scary to talk to. They had no respect for the property or for (temple members) as individuals."

After the duct tape incident in January, Wolfgang met with agents from the Buffalo office of the FBI and the local Joint Terrorism Task Force. Niagara County Sheriff's Department Investigator and JTTF Agent Mike Messina joined forces with Falls Police Juvenile Division Detective Shawn Larabee to look for leads in the case.

"We did a neighborhood canvas and that yielded some results," Messina said. "We were then able to identify (Blount and the juvenile)."

However, the intimidation of Blount, the juvenile and others made the investigation anything but easy.

"Every person we spoke to was afraid to call the police, because they were afraid of retaliation," Larabee said.

Larabee and Messina said they were able to eventually build a strong enough case to arrest Blount and the juvenile and they said they will continue to keep a close watch on DNA and its members.

"We were able to gather intelligence that didn't necessarily lead to arrests, but will show us who to watch," Larabee said.

Falls Police Superintendent John Chella said he and other law enforcement officials met with Wolfgang on Tuesday to let him know the arrests were coming.

"Myself, the United States Attorney and district attorney met with Dr. Wolfgang to pledge our support and to make sure that not only is justice done in this case, but going forward we will protect the synagogue," Chella said.

U.S. Attorney Terrance Flynn had considered filing federal hate crime charges against Blount and the juvenile, but decided it was better to keep the case in New York state courts.

"The federal charges are more focused on adults. Below 18, runs into a problem," Wolfgang said. "(Flynn) felt it would be better to handle (the cases) in one place. I know (Flynn) did consult with (U.S. Justice Department officials) in Washington, D.C., so they took this very, very seriously."

The temple leader praised the work of local police in cracking the case.

"I really have to say the city police tried really hard to solve this problem over the last two years," Wolfgang said. "They are keeping a close eye on this group. I'm hopeful (the vandalism is over). These seem to be the two main perpetrators or leaders."

Officials Manipulate Elections With Polling Location (AP)

By Joe Stinebaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2007

HOUSTON — Officials in two Houston-area elections recently manipulated polling locations to clear the path for their supporters to vote and to toss numerous roadblocks before their opponents.

Sponsors of a local community college bond election tried last year to put all their polling locations on their campuses, making voting easy for students and employees — a natural support base — but less convenient for opponents. That move prompted the U.S. Department of Justice to step in, and the election was postponed.

And officials with a suburban school district scheduled their bond election on the same day as the state's general election in November — and then spent $64,000 extra to set up separate polling places. State law would normally bar such a move, but a large loophole allows such maneuvers in the Houston area only.

"I'm sort of astonished that election law in Texas allows somebody to buy their way onto a different ballot," said Henry Brady, a political scientist at the University of California, Berkeley. "It's just astonishing to me."

Such maneuvers go on to a lesser degree all over the country.

Some Minnesota schools hold bond elections in frigid January. Fire departments pushing bond elections in New Jersey routinely place their polling booths in remote fire stations. And elections officials in Ohio and California have been accused of uneven distribution of voting machines, causing long lines in neighborhoods that support one party and a quick passthrough for supporters of the other party.

Such machinations allow government officials to assist their favored candidate or to help pass bond issues — and their resulting property tax increases — without mounting expensive campaigns. Controlling the location of polls allows supporters to turn out in their usual numbers, while opponents have to drive farther, or to several places, to vote.

But election experts said that unless there are clear civil-rights violations against a minority group, federal authorities are unlikely to step in. Polling place manipulation doesn't fall under the Voting Rights Act, so the Justice Department is not authorized to police such moves.

"These are things that can often fly beneath the radar," said Dan Tokaji, a professor specializing in elections law at Ohio State University. "Unless somebody notices it and makes a big stink through the ordinary political process, you're not going to hear a lot about that. And it's very easy for these sorts of decisions to slip through without detection."

The North Harris-Montgomery Community College District, in Houston's northern suburbs, planned a $250 million bond and board of trustees election in May. But instead of joining with other jurisdictions holding elections, district officials chose to hold a separate election. Citing budget concerns, officials cut the number of polling places from 80 to 12 — all on district campuses — and left some voters up to 20 miles from a polling place. The League of United Latin American Citizens and other critics accused district officials of trying to dilute Hispanic voting strength and limit voter turnout to those who work and study at the college.

"The reasoning behind the eliminating of voting locations is to eliminate voters," Fred Blanton, an unsuccessful board candidate, said.

The Justice Department ultimately intervened in the community college election, and the district ended up postponing it until November and offering dozens of polling places throughout the area. The bond proposal failed by 12 percentage points.

In Pearland, where the campaign to replace former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay guaranteed a higher-than-usual turnout in the general election, school district officials scheduled a $115.6 million bond election for the same day.

But consultant Richard Murray, a political scientist at the University of Houston, advised the district that they would be "much more at risk" if the bond issue was on the same ballot as the general election.

"It might cost you 10 points if you have everybody voting," he told school board members. "They know less about the bonds. If somebody emerged that was publicly opposing the bonds, an ad hoc group, they could make a lot more headway."

So the Pearland schools spent an extra $64,000 to hold a separate election, meaning people would have to make two stops to complete voting.

It worked. Forty percent of Pearland voters turned out for the general election, but only 9 percent turned out for the bond election, most of those in early voting.

The bond proposal passed with 70 percent of the vote.

Pearland schools Superintendent Bonny Cain said the election was held independently to accommodate early voting.

"It wasn't a perfect decision," Cain said. "We just felt like we were following through with a long tradition of bringing the voting booth to the voting public."

But the area elections administrator, Janice Evans, estimated that four times as many bond-issue voters would have turned out had the bond election been held along with the general election at the usual polling places.

Brady called the Pearland election "bizarre."

"The notion that you could buy your way out and have a separate ballot, I mean start thinking about what that would mean," Brady said. "It's pretty astonishing. ... It's pretty easy to put polling places in the right places and to therefore discourage some people and encourage others."

In California, local officials rely on their local voter registrar to fend off several obviously partisan attempts to manipulate voting sites. Alameda County's "voting bus" — a van stripped of passenger seats and equipped with electronic voting machines — is sent to areas around the county in an effort to boost voter turnout and help disabled voters reach the polls.

Alameda County officials were bombarded with requests from partisan groups wanting the bus to visit sites with a disproportionate numbers of voters from one party or another.

Election law experts said such tactics could result in trouble if registrars aren't careful about where they place the alternative polls.

Many states, Texas included, require that local governments holding elections on the same day as a November general election use the same polling locations as the general election. But the Houston area — Harris County and seven surrounding counties — is exempt.

Republican state Rep. Dan Gattis, who wrote the law, said he stripped the eight counties out of his original bill at the request of a Houston-area legislator who threatened to organize opposition to kill the bill.

"I believe the constituents of Harris County and those seven surrounding counties are being ill served by not being under the same rules and regulations as the rest of the state," Gattis said. "It is pure manipulation that is going on with some of these elections."

Tokaji agrees.

"I do think that there's a great potential for manipulation of elections," he said, "and it's probably something that should get a lot more attention than it's received so far."

Genetic-Discrimination Ban Nears Congressional Approval (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132637

WASHINGTON -- A bill barring discrimination by employers and insurers based on genetic information is moving swiftly through Congress, drawing praise from privacy advocates and objections from business groups that the measure is too broad.

The legislation would be the first federal law prohibiting health insurers from denying coverage or charging higher premiums based solely on genetic information. It also would forbid employers from using the information to make hiring, firing and other job-placement decisions.

The bill was approved by the House Committee on Education and Labor yesterday and is expected to pass the full House. The Senate, which previously passed the legislation twice, is expected to vote on it within two weeks, and President Bush has indicated he will sign it. The legislation has been debated for a decade but was opposed by House Republican leaders.

Rep. Louise Slaughter (D., N.Y.), the bill's co-author in the House, said the legislation will "encourage Americans to seek out preventive health care and participate in clinical trials critical to finding cures for some of our most deadly genetic-based diseases."

Genetic testing has increased over the past decade, and tests for about 1,000 diseases are available clinically, according to the Genetics and Public Policy Center in Washington. These tests can help diagnose, predict diseases and guide treatment, but the lack of a federal antidiscrimination law, advocates say, has made some consumers reluctant to participate in genetic research. Many states bar discrimination based on genetic tests, but the protections vary widely.

Some business groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, oppose the legislation. Michael Eastman, the group's executive director of labor policy, said the bill would encourage employees to file discrimination lawsuits. He said the bill would affect how employers collect health information in general because the line between genetic and other health information isn't always clear.

"We think it's really based on the politics of fear and anecdote and not on reality and reason," said Neil Trautwein, a vice president at the National Retail Federation.

International Business Machines Corp., which includes genetic nondiscrimination in its employment policy, supports the bill, according to testimony prepared for a recent hearing of the House Education and Labor Committee. But the company also said Congress should monitor implementation to prevent "expansive interpretations."

Francis Collins, director of the National Human Genome Research Institute at the National Institutes of Health, said the legislation would encourage more people to participate in genetic testing for risks such as colon cancer. "All of us are at risk for genetic discrimination if protections are not put in place because there are no perfect human specimens," he said.

Maywood Suburb Wants Investigation Of Police Misconduct (LAT)

By Hector Becerra

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

Allegations of sexual misconduct, racism and brutality are roiling the Police Department in the small suburb of Maywood, prompting the City Council this week to request an immediate investigation by the state attorney general's office.

The request for the probe comes after years of accusation from residents and activists that the Police Department has mistreated Latino immigrants, who make up the vast majority of the 30,000 residents.

The council called for the probe late Wednesday at the urging of Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, who in a letter to the council called the growing catalog of alleged misdeeds deeply concerning.

One of the allegations the attorney general would examine is that the Police Department enforced a policy of afternoon sobriety checks that was actually designed to nab unlicensed illegal immigrants and generate money for the city.

Nearly 2,000 cars a year have been impounded from immigrants. Residents have also come forward with allegations that officers beat up people for no reason. Several woman claim that officers stalked and sexually abused them, while parents claim that their teenage daughter was groped by an officer, according to a document listing the allegations obtained by The Times.

Even top city and police officials admit there is a problem. "Do I feel some of the residents have valid points? Yes, I do," said Maywood Police Chief Richard Lyons.

Two officers have been suspended pending internal investigations, Lyons said, and other officers are under investigation. "There's a handful of renegade cops out there we need to build cases on," said Councilman Sam Pena.

Maywood garnered national headlines last year when a new pro-immigration council majority was elected and declared the city a "sanctuary" for illegal immigrants.

That issue has polarized the city. Felipe Aguirre, the councilman who pushed for the sanctuary movement, was later the target of death threats by City Clerk Hector Duarte, who opposed the new direction of the city. Duarte pleaded guilty to the death threat allegation.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Settles Iowa Consumer Antitrust Lawsuit (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Bob Van Voris

Bloomberg, February 15, 2007

Feb. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Microsoft Corp., the world's biggest software maker, reached an undisclosed settlement in a lawsuit claiming it used its monopoly position to overcharge Iowa consumers for software products including Windows and Word.

Microsoft reached the deal with a statewide class of consumers who had purchased Microsoft products since 1994. The plaintiffs claimed the company violated Iowa antitrust law to charge inflated prices by taking advantage of its monopolies in personal computer operating systems and software applications.

``I think everyone in the courtroom is a little stunned," Roxanne Conlin, a lawyer for the consumers, told an Iowa state judge and jurors today in Des Moines after announcing the accord.

The settlement, which must be approved by the judge, ends a trial that began in December and resolves one of the last private antitrust cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. The Iowa customers claimed $329 million in damages, which could have been tripled under Iowa law.

Judge Scott Rosenberg ordered both sides to keep details of the settlement secret until they file papers formally asking him to grant initial approval of the settlement, expected in April. Similar cases that settled have provided class members with vouchers for discounted software.

Last of Dozens

The case, and a similar suit in Mississippi, are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers following an antitrust case against Microsoft filed by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998.

Microsoft, based in Redmond, Washington, claimed it didn't limit competition and said the company is successful because it offers high-quality software at low prices.

``We're happy to have this matter behind us so we can focus on the future," Rich Wallis, a Microsoft associate general counsel, said in a joint statement issued by the parties.

The case settled during the consumers' part of the six-month trial, before Microsoft would present its defense. The company's lawyers said they had planned to call as witnesses Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates and Chief Executive Officer Steve Ballmer. Conlin showed jurors a tape of Gates's testimony in the Department of Justice case.

After they were excused from the courtroom today, members of the 11-member jury could be heard whooping and cheering in the jury room.

`Digital Divide'

In an interview after the proceeding, Conlin said the settlement includes a program to ``close the digital divide" by ensuring that every Iowa student graduates high school with necessary computer skills. She declined to say how much the program will cost, citing the judge's order. Conlin said serious settlement talks began on Feb. 11 and a deal was reached by 6 p.m. yesterday.

During the trial, many internal Microsoft documents were made public for the first time.

In a 2004 e-mail to Gates and Ballmer disclosed during the trial, Windows chief Jim Allchin said ``we have lost our way" and ``I would buy a Mac today if I was not working at Microsoft."

In another e-mail, a Microsoft executive said he wanted to ``whack" computer maker Dell Inc. over its relationship with Linux software distributor Red Hat Inc., the same week in 2002 a federal judge ordered the company not to retaliate against competitors.

Class Action

The Iowa case was filed in 2000 by Joe Comes, a Des Moines businessman. It was certified in 2003 as a class action, or group lawsuit, on behalf of indirect purchasers of Microsoft software from May 1994 to June 2006. The consumers, including individuals and businesses, bought computers loaded with Microsoft software, or purchased the software from sources other than the company.

Conlin claimed that Microsoft's monopoly allowed it to raise the price of Windows by an average of $42.49, and $10.55 for Word.

In addition to settling the lawsuit by the U.S. government, Microsoft has reached accords in antitrust cases in 18 states and the District of Columbia, it said in a Jan. 25 filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

Under those settlements, consumers get vouchers for rebates on computers and software. The value of the deals depends on how many vouchers are redeemed. Microsoft estimates the total cost will be from $1.5 billion to $1.8 billion.

In 2004, Microsoft settled a Minnesota case during trial, the only other private antitrust suit against it that went to a jury.

Monopoly Power

Shares of Microsoft rose 37 cents to $29.40 in Nasdaq Stock Market trading. They have risen 11 percent in the past 12 months.

Before the trial, Rosenberg adopted many of the findings from the Justice Department trial, including the conclusion that Microsoft held illegal monopoly power in the market for Intel Corp.-compatible personal computer operating systems before June 1999.

Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs almost 95 percent of the world's personal computers, released its new Windows Vista operating system in stores Jan. 30.

Microsoft Settles Iowa Antitrust Case (AP)

By David Pitt, Ap Business Writer

Microsoft Corp. on Wednesday settled a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of thousands of Iowans who bought the company's programs between 1994 and 2006. Terms of the deal were not immediately disclosed.

The lawsuit sought more than $330 million from Microsoft for allegedly engaging in monopolistic and anticompetitive conduct that caused customers to pay more for software than they would have if there had been competition.

Microsoft denied the allegations, saying Iowa customers received quality products at fair prices.

On Wednesday, Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg ordered attorneys to refrain from disclosing details of the settlement until April.

"The court will be advised of the terms of the settlement in April and there will be a hearing on April 20 for preliminary approval and if all goes as scheduled there will be a hearing for final approval on Aug. 31," said Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis.

The world's largest software maker has faced 206 class-action lawsuits across the United States since 2000. The company said 108 were consolidated in a federal antitrust case and 96 remained in state courts.

Most were dismissed or settled before trial.

Only two, the Iowa case and one in Minnesota, went to trial. The Minnesota case was settled after about two months into the trial.

Attorneys Roxanne Conlin and Rich Hagstrom filed the Iowa lawsuit in 2000.

"It was a mutual decision to settle and you kind of have to see the cards lay down. That's part of what happens for both sides," Conlin said. "You have to assess your risk and you have to assess what's in the best interest of your clients."

Both sides agreed the settlement will include making money available to buy computers and software for Iowa schools.

"We're going to take half of the unclaimed amount and use that to close the digital divide in Iowa," Conlin said.

Conlin would not say whether the settlement would take the form of cash or vouchers for computer equipment. Previously, she said she would refuse to accept vouchers.

In the Minnesota case, the lawyers sought more than $300 million from the company. During trial, the case settled for $174.5 million. Lawyer fees were about $59.4 million, according to court documents. The six plaintiffs who brought the case forward received $5,000 each

By Rob Pegoraro

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Customers might not like the idea of technology that allows some uses of music (like copying iTunes downloads to their iPods) but forbids others (like copying the same song to another kind of music player). But until recently, it didn't seem to bother the executives behind these anti-piracy systems.

They all agreed that anybody selling downloadable music and movies needed to police what customers did with their purchases.

Last week, however, the person responsible for the most successful copy-control software in the music market, Apple chief executive Steve Jobs, ruffled feathers with the question: Do we need any of this in the first place?

In an essay called "Thoughts on Digital Music" on Apple's site, Jobs wrote that his company's iTunes Store used copy-control software called FairPlay only because major record labels insisted on it. Those same labels' demands made it impossible for Apple to share its technology, he said. So his proposed solution to the "this download will only play on my iPod" problem is to abolish copy-control software altogether.

Since that remarkably blunt piece of writing hit the Web, the debate over whether technology can curb illegal file sharing has come back to life. That's good. But in the process, a lot of old myths are resurfacing -- and believing them will stop you from understand the deeper problems with the digital-media market. The myths include:

Â· "Apple can't share FairPlay with other companies, because the technology could get leaked and eventually prompt the labels to pull their catalogues from the iTunes store."

That's not necessarily so.

You can't completely dismiss Apple's contention; only Apple knows the fine print of its deals with the record labels. We don't. But the simple way Apple's copy-control system works should make it relatively easy for outsiders to join the FairPlay game.

FairPlay assigns the police work to the iTunes program on your Mac or PC, not the iPod. As a result, you can plug a friend's iPod into your computer and copy your iTunes purchases to it, even if that iPod is already loaded with your pal's iTunes downloads.

Plus, Apple has already taken a baby step toward putting FairPlay in other companies' hardware, in the form of Motorola cellphones that include a miniaturized version of iTunes. If the iTunes Store survived that experiment, it should be able to live through the addition of FairPlay compatibility to other playback-only devices, such as handheld organizers or car stereos.

It would be different if Apple were to let somebody design a competitor to iTunes. A lot more would be at stake in that case.

That depends on how you define "solved."

Microsoft can point to dozens of PlaysForSure devices from various companies, not including its own incompatible Zune. Even users of Palm organizers and smartphones can join the fun, by using NormSoft's Pocket Tunes. But when it comes to anything more complex than a handheld gadget, Microsoft takes a different stance.

Although the company allows other people to develop Window Media-compatible programs for other operating systems, such as Telestream's Flip4Mac for Mac OS X, it won't let them add PlaysForSure support.

When asked why PlaysForSure should be confined to Windows, Microsoft says it would be too difficult to keep that software secure on another operating system. That's almost the same excuse Jobs used in his online essay, except that Apple still managed to ship a Windows version of iTunes.

Either Microsoft needs to upgrade its understanding of competing operating systems, or it should admit that promoting Windows outweighs living up to its own talking points.

Â· "This is the price we have to pay to stop illegal file sharing."

Just try to prove that.

First, as Jobs noted in his essay, the vast majority of music sold today comes on audio CDs that impose no copying restrictions. DVDs include copying controls, but they were breached years ago.

Even if you abolished these old formats in favor of media locked up with technologies like FairPlay or PlaysForSure, you'd still have no bar to music file sharing. Both Apple and Microsoft's systems allow buyers of a song to burn it to an audio CD that can then be copied back to a computer in an unrestricted format.

The side effect: It only took a few minutes with a file-sharing program to find MP3 copies of songs sold only on iTunes. And even without the audio-CD workaround, hackers have repeatedly dismantled the defenses of FairPlay and PlaysForSure.

Either way, all you need is one unprotected copy loose in the wild; that copy can then be duplicated endlessly. And no existing anti-piracy system can stop people from downloading and playing those copies.

The technology can still serve a role in online music or movie rental services, which have drawn far fewer customers than stores like iTunes, but for purchases it does too little to justify its costs. In practice, it only stops copying by the unmotivated, the over-scheduled or the inexperienced -- the people most likely to buy a song or movie online as long as they can do so quickly, easily and cheaply.

In the music industry, a growing number of outlets beyond the big-name companies, from tiny indie-rock operations to the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Smithsonian Institution's Folkways label, have realized the futility of copy-restriction software and now sell digital downloads in open, unrestricted formats.

At this point, this all amounts to little more than expensive psychotherapy for Hollywood executives. It's the height of arrogance for them to keep sending us the bill.

Justice Official Bought Vacation Home With Oil Lobbyist (WP)

By Susan Schmidt And James V. Grimaldi

Washington Post, February 15, 2007

A senior Justice Department official who recently resigned her post bought a nearly $1 million vacation home with a lobbyist for ConocoPhillips months before approving consent decrees that would give the oil company more time to pay millions of dollars in fines and meet pollution-cleanup rules at some of its refineries.

Sue Ellen Wooldridge, former assistant attorney general in charge of environment and natural resources, bought a $980,000 home on Kiawah Island, S.C., last March with ConocoPhillips lobbyist Don R. Duncan. A third owner of the house is J. Steven Griles, a former deputy interior secretary, who has been informed he is a target in the federal investigation of Jack Abramoff's lobbying activities.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department said yesterday that Wooldridge sought and received approval from a career ethics official in her office before buying the vacation property. Wooldridge's lawyer and officials at ConocoPhillips said that Duncan had no role in negotiating the consent decrees and never lobbied Wooldridge.

Wooldridge, who earlier served in senior positions at the Interior Department, lives with Griles in Virginia. Her investment with Griles and the oil lobbyist took place on March 13, 2006, property records show, during a wide-ranging Justice Department criminal investigation that involves Griles and lobbyists at Interior. The joint purchase and Wooldridge's role in the consent decrees were reported yesterday by the Associated Press.

Stephen Grafman, an attorney for Wooldridge, said his client owns a 25 percent share of the vacation property. "She used her own money," Grafman said. He said that Wooldridge was called in November before a grand jury investigating Abramoff and Griles but that she is not under investigation.

In November 2006, ConocoPhillips reached proposed consent decrees with the federal government and four states that would modify an agreement the company had reached with the Environmental Protection Agency in 2005 to settle charges it was violating the Clean Air Act. The proposed changes, which must be approved by a federal judge overseeing the case, would give the company more time to install equipment and processes that would cost an estimated $525 million to cut emissions at some refineries.

Wooldridge, as head of the Justice Department's environmental division, signed the agreements on behalf of the federal government.

In lobbying disclosure forms filed last year, Duncan -- ConocoPhillips's vice president for federal and international affairs -- said he lobbied Congress on revisions to the Clean Air Act. He did not report lobbying the Justice Department or other federal agencies.

Duncan "was not involved at all" in the consent decrees, said ConocoPhillips spokeswoman Kristi Desjarlaif, who said the negotiations were handled by company lawyers. Nevertheless, Duncan sought approval from the company's legal division last year when he sought to invest with Griles and Wooldridge. "Our legal division said she needed to get clearance from DOJ ethics officials," said Desjarlaif, something she said Wooldridge was already pursuing.

Wooldridge submitted her resignation from Justice last month, three days after Griles's lawyer was informed by the department's criminal division that Griles faces potential criminal charges in connection with his dealings with Abramoff. A Justice spokeswoman has said that Wooldridge returned to the private sector and that her departure was voluntary.

Wooldridge and Griles "do own a small condo together," said Griles's attorney, Barry M. Hartman. Of the South Carolina property, he said: "This is a shared investment among people who have been close personal friends for years. What exactly is wrong with three close personal friends sharing a vacation/rental home?"

Griles, who resigned his deputy's job in 2005 and now is a mining and energy lobbyist, was a lightning rod for criticism during his four years at Interior. Sources close to the federal probe have said he is being investigated for making possibly false statements about a job offer from Abramoff, who lobbied Interior heavily on behalf of Indian tribal clients with casinos.

Griles was harshly criticized in a 2004 report from Interior's inspector general for maintaining ties to lobbying clients who had business before the department. Inspector General Earl E. Devaney found that Griles had used his official position in dealings with clients of his former firm even as he continued to receive payments from the firm amounting to more than $1 million. His report did not draw conclusions about whether Griles broke any law or ethics rules. The Office of Government Ethics, in reviewing the findings, said that, with two possible exceptions, Griles did not violate ethics rules.

Wooldridge, who was deputy chief of staff to the interior secretary and later became solicitor at Interior, provided ethics advice to Griles and advised then-Secretary Gale A. Norton on how she should handle the inspector general's allegations. She did not tell the inspector general of her personal relationship with Griles, according to sources familiar with the investigation. About August 2002, according to the inspector general's report, Wooldridge replaced Griles's special assistant as his ethics screener, a role in which she helped him determine when he should recuse himself from matters that posed a conflict of interest. After Griles's departure from Interior, Wooldridge disclosed to investigators in the Abramoff probe that she and Griles began dating in February 2003, sources familiar with the probe said.

Wooldridge and Griles both filed amended financial disclosure reports late last year that reported thousands of dollars in gifts and trips they gave one another in 2003. During that time and afterward, Wooldridge was contacting investigators, answering questions and writing a memorandum defending Griles's activities as deputy at Interior.

The memo, dated Feb. 8, 2004, concerned Griles involvement with a bid by some former clients to gain concessions to extract coal-bed methane in the Powder River basin of Wyoming and Montana. Griles had contacted EPA officials to urge that a dispute over an environmental study not delay the project.

In the memo, Wooldridge argued to the inspector general and to the Office of Government Ethics that Griles's actions were not a violation because they were not a "particular matter involving specific parties."

Norton took no action against Griles at the time of the inspector general's report and declared that he had been "cleared" of any wrongdoing.

Norton's handling of the matter angered members of Congress, including Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who had initiated one aspect of the investigation. Lieberman said the report had painted a "disturbing picture of repeated questionable conduct."

Lobbyist, Fed Lawyer Share Vacation Home (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Nine months before agreeing to let ConocoPhillips delay a half-billion-dollar pollution cleanup, the government's top environmental prosecutor bought a $1 million vacation home with the company's top lobbyist.

Also in on the Kiawah Island, S.C., house deal was former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles, the highest-ranking Bush administration official targeted for criminal prosecution in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe.

Just before resigning last month, Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge signed two proposed consent decrees with ConocoPhillips: one giving the company as much as two to three more years to install $525 million in pollution controls at nine refineries and the other dealing with a Superfund toxic waste cleanup.

Last April, Wooldridge, ConocoPhillips Vice President Donald R. Duncan and Griles had gone together on a $980,000 home in a gated community at Kiawah Island. Records from the Charleston County Auditor's office obtained by The Associated Press list Duncan as a 50 percent owner of the home and Wooldridge and Griles as 25 percent owners.

The deed is filed under Duncan's name, but the mailing address for the South Carolina property _ tucked among pines, palmettos, a pool, golf course and tennis club several hundred yards from the beach _ is Griles' home in Virginia. He and Wooldridge jointly own a condo there.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee said Wednesday night it will open an inquiry and request documents into the real estate transaction and consent agreements.

"There appears to be a breakdown of ethics at the Justice Department, said the committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. "Senior Justice Department officials should not be handling cases that affect their close friends and investment partners."

ConocoPhillips said in a statement Wednesday night that Duncan had no involvement in negotiating the consent agreements.

"We object to the suggestion that the real estate transaction involving Don Duncan, which was cleared in advance by the ethics office of the Department of Justice, had any impact whatsoever on the consent decrees entered into by ConocoPhillips or the recent SEC filing amending ConocoPhillips code of ethics," company officials said. "Any savings resulting from these delays are expected to be offset by the cost of additional and stricter controls agreed to in the amended agreement."

Griles, now an oil and gas lobbyist, began dating Wooldridge while he was her boss at Interior. He was the department's No. 2 official from July 2001 to January 2005, behind only former Secretary Gale Norton. He and Duncan, a ConocoPhillips vice president who runs the company's Washington office, both served on President Bush's presidential transition team, Griles for the Interior Department, Duncan for the Energy Department.

Duncan has played a major role in getting the Bush administration's backing for a proposed $25 billion natural gas pipeline reaching from Alaska to Midwest markets.

Wooldridge and Griles have known each other at least since the first year of the Bush administration in 2001, when Wooldridge became deputy chief of staff and counselor to then-Secretary Norton. Bush used a recess appointment to make Wooldridge the department's solicitor _ its top lawyer _ in June 2004.

After she became solicitor, Wooldridge told the department's ethics office she and Griles had begun dating, an Interior spokesman said.

From 2001 through 2004 Duncan was lobbying the department on a wide range of issues. The topics, according to his lobbying records on file with the government, included oil leases in the eastern Gulf of Mexico, coal-bed methane in the San Juan Basin of New Mexico and the Powder River Basin in Wyoming, and permits for the proposed Alaska natural gas pipeline.

After Griles resigned from Interior, Bush appointed Wooldridge to head the Justice Department's 600-employee environment division, representing virtually every federal agency on cases related to pollution, natural resources, wildlife, some Indian issues and land condemnation. She began work at Justice in November 2005. The division is now handling about 6,800 cases nationwide.

Griles, meanwhile, had signed up as lobbying clients the American Petroleum Institute, Newmont Mining Corp. and other energy and mining clients with a broad range of legal and financial interests before the government.

As for the vacation home, Stephen W. Grafman, Wooldridge's attorney, said she paid for her share and was told by the Justice Department's ethics office a month before the sale went through "that the purchase was not a problem."

"There was no need to recuse herself from ConocoPhillips since she was advised by the appropriate ethics officials that there was not a conflict," Grafman said. "Mr. Duncan invested in the property as an individual and friend. He has no business before the environment division. He never lobbied Ms Wooldridge on an issue on behalf of himself. In point of fact, he never lobbied her on behalf of ConocoPhillips."

A Justice Department spokeswoman, Cynthia Magnuson, confirmed that Wooldridge "sought the advice of ethics officials who informed her that the purchase did not raise ethical issues."

Magnuson said the consent decrees with ConocoPhillips "were approved through the normal management channels and were presented to Sue Ellen with the unanimous recommendations of her career staff as well as those of the EPA."

Griles' lawyer, Barry M. Hartman, called the home "a shared investment among people who have been close personal friends for years. What exactly is wrong with three close personal friends sharing a vacation/rental home?"

Wooldridge submitted her resignation letter to the Justice Department on Jan. 8, three days after other prosecutors in the department met with Griles to outline criminal charges they are seeking against him. She said in the letter she wanted to return to work in the private sector.

The federal task force heading the Abramoff corruption probe also has become interested in Wooldridge and her connections to Griles, people familiar with the investigation said on condition of anonymity, citing the issue's sensitivity.

Paul Light, a professor at New York University's Wagner School of Public Service and an expert on presidential appointees, said Wooldridge's participation in the Kiawah Island partnership and the ConocoPhillips settlement "creates the impression of favoritism, or favors due."

"From an appearance standpoint it's awful, and from a legal standpoint it's questionable," Light said Wednesday. "Political appointees have been indicted for less."

Wooldridge's last day at Justice was Jan. 19. All of the other parties to the ConocoPhillips agreement _ four states, the Environmental Protection Agency, a local pollution control agency in Washington state, and the company _ signed it in November.

Wooldridge's signature is not dated, but the document with it as well as the other signatures weren't submitted to the U.S. District Court in Houston, where ConocoPhillips is headquartered, until Jan. 11. It was published in the Federal Register on Jan. 25, triggering a 30-day public comment period before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake can decide whether to approve or reject it.

One of the proposed agreements would change the terms of a major air pollution settlement announced with fanfare in 2005 by Wooldridge's predecessor at the Justice Department, Thomas Sansonetti. In addition to installing a half-billion dollars in new pollution controls, ConocoPhillips agreed to pay a $4.5 million fine to settle charges of Clean Air Act violations.

The new agreement Wooldridge signed delays many of the deadlines the government had imposed on the company _ some by two to three years _ for cutting emissions of chemicals from its refineries that cause smog and soot. It also postponed by more than a year some potential penalties and pollution reporting requirements. The agreement cited damage to a refinery in Belle Chasse, La., from Hurricane Katrina as justification for some of the delays. EPA referred all comment to the Justice Department.

Wooldridge did not list her purchase of the South Carolina resort community home with Griles and ConocoPhillips' Duncan in a financial disclosure report she submitted a month after the real estate deal. That report covered calendar 2005 and Wooldridge resigned before having to submit a financial disclosure report covering 2006.

The other refineries covered in the consent decree are in the Los Angeles and San Francisco areas in California, Roxana, Ill., Linden, N.J., Trainer, Pa., Borger and Old Ocean, Texas, and Ferndale, Wash.

Wooldridge also put her undated signature on a proposed consent decree filed in January involving ConocoPhillips and a Superfund toxic waste site. The agreement calls for nearly 100 companies to pay $500,000 in damages and up to $10 million to clean up an 8-acre former solvent recycling facility in Elkton, Md., that closed in 1988.

Separately, Justice Department prosecutors notified Griles by letter last month that he faces possible criminal charges of lying to Congress and fraud under a 1988 law that says citizens are entitled to "honest services" from public officials.

The charges involve questions about whether Griles passed on information from Abramoff to other Interior officials and falsely testified in 2005 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee about Abramoff's attempts to hire him away from Interior. Abramoff is serving about six years in prison for a fraudulent deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida and awaits sentencing in Washington after pleading guilty to corrupting government officials and their staff members with bribes.

Duncan had no comment.

On Monday, ConocoPhillips notified the Securities and Exchange Commission of changes in its bylaws and ethics code. The company reiterated its policy that the "promise, offer or delivery to an official or employee of the U.S. government of a gift, favor or other gratuity in violation of these rules would not only violate company policy but could also be a criminal offense."

Ex-Official Is Not Target Of Abramoff Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — The government's former top environmental prosecutor has been told by Justice Department officials that she does not face charges in the corruption investigation centered on the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, her lawyer said Wednesday.

The former prosecutor, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, stepped down last month as an assistant attorney general and head of the department's environment and natural resources division.

Her lawyer, Stephen W. Grafman, said Ms. Wooldridge had cooperated fully in the investigation of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation and ties to lawmakers and senior officials in the Bush administration. Among the officials was J. Steven Griles, the former No. 2 official in the Interior Department, with whom Ms. Wooldridge has had a romantic relationship.

"We have been advised by Justice Department officials on several occasions that she is not now, nor has ever been, a target of the grand jury," Mr. Grafman said in an interview, responding to what he said were false news reports suggesting that Ms. Wooldridge was under scrutiny in a criminal matter.

Mr. Griles was notified by the Justice Department last month that he was probably going to be indicted on charges that he had lied to federal investigators about his relationship with Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff's records show he repeatedly sought Mr. Griles's help at the Interior Department.

The Associated Press reported Wednesday that Ms. Wooldridge, Mr. Griles and a lobbyist for the oil company ConocoPhillips had jointly bought a $980,000 vacation home in South Carolina last year, about nine months before Ms. Wooldridge signed two major consent decrees that allowed ConocoPhillips to delay environmental cleanup projects.

Cynthia J. Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said that Ms. Wooldridge's purchase of the home with the lobbyist had been cleared last year by the department's ethics office, and that she had not been barred from contacts with ConocoPhillips.

Ms. Magnuson said that Ms. Wooldridge had signed the consent decrees after they had been recommended to her unanimously by career officials at the Justice Department and by the Environmental Projection Agency.

Ms. Magnuson said she could not comment on the status of the criminal investigation.

Mr. Griles, who left the Interior Department to return to a career as a corporate lobbyist, has denied wrongdoing and insisted that he did no special favors for Mr. Abramoff. A spokesman for ConocoPhillips declined to comment on Wednesday.

Mr. Abramoff entered prison last year after pleading guilty to conspiring to corrupt public officials.

Climate Change's Cold Economics (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball

Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132645

With mandatory curbs on U.S. global-warming emissions looking increasingly likely in the next several years, industries are starting to argue over who will pay for the cleanup. One thing is clear: Whatever the cost, it will get passed along to consumers.

A new report from the utility industry's think tank, the Electric Power Research Institute, says the U.S. utility sector could ratchet back its global-warming emissions to 1990 levels by 2030. That would be a major feat, given that emissions are projected to rise significantly over the next few decades.

But Congress is unlikely to boost taxpayer-funded energy research by enough to develop the necessary technologies, says Jeffry Sterba, chairman of the institute, who is expected to present the study today at an energy-industry conference. One option he said utilities are considering proposing: that the government allow them to tack an additional modest charge onto consumers' electric bills to raise roughly $2 billion a year to cover the cost.

As the Democrats who now control Congress start pushing for federal global-warming regulations, industry heavyweights are changing their stance on the issue. Exxon Mobil Corp., which has long opposed emission constraints, now is talking about how such rules should be structured. And the Edison Electric Institute, the electric-utility industry's chief trade group, announced last week that it is dropping its longstanding opposition to mandatory emission limits.

The corporate change is a concession to political reality. Even if they would prefer not to have an emissions limit, industries targeted by regulators are angling to shape whatever they get slapped with to minimize their portion of the bill.

The Electric Power Research Institute's study estimates some of the potential costs of an effort to curb U.S. global-warming emissions and puts a lengthy timeline on the task. It reflects a message likely to be heard increasingly from heavily emitting industries: They are confident they will be able to develop technologies to reduce global-warming emissions, if politicians, consumers and certain other industries are willing to foot the bill.

That "if" shows how the global-warming debate is moving beyond political rhetoric to questions of economic reality.

Achieving that emissions cut in the power industry -- the nation's biggest source of global-warming emissions -- would require aggressively rolling out a broad array of technologies, some of which aren't yet economically proven, the study says. Among those technologies: energy-efficiency improvements, for instance in buildings and appliances, to slow the projected growth in electricity demand; increases in the penetration of renewable and nuclear power; higher-efficiency coal-fired power plants; and capturing the carbon dioxide emitted from power plants and storing the global-warming gas underground.

Developing the necessary technologies so they could be widely deployed will require roughly $2 billion more in annual low-carbon-energy research spending in the U.S., the EPRI says. That's money beyond the approximately $3 billion the institute says the federal government currently invests each year in that area.

The power industry could raise the roughly $2 billion a year for new clean-energy research by increasing the average U.S. electric customer's rate by 0.05 cent a kilowatt hour, said Mr. Sterba, who stressed the utility industry hasn't yet proposed such a fee. That would increase the average American's monthly electric bill about 0.5%, to $89.07 from $88.60, according to government data.

EPRI officials believe the $2 billion collected would advance the technologies to a point where they are economically competitive with conventional technologies. The expectation is that private investors then would be willing to finance deployment of the technologies, because then they could earn an attractive profit, the officials said.

Mr. Sterba, the chairman and chief executive of PNM Resources, a New Mexico utility, says the study suggests that the cost of addressing global warming is significant but not insurmountable. "I'm concerned we may be being a little bit naive" about the likely costs, he said. "At the same time, I think there are people who may be being a bit too gloom-and-doom."

The study also marks an attempt by the utility industry to deflect regulators' attention to other sectors of the economy that utilities argue are ripe for emission cuts themselves. Utilities will need decades to develop technologies to significantly cut their emissions, Mr. Sterba said, but other industries capable of reducing their emissions more quickly and cheaply should be asked to do their share.

Among the technologies the study proposes to bring 2030 emissions back down to 1990 levels, for instance, is the widespread sale of so-called "plug-in" hybrid vehicles. Plug-in hybrids would get even better fuel economy than today's gasoline-and-electric hybrid cars because they would get more of their power from their electrical system, requiring the cars to be plugged into electrical outlets to be recharged. But deploying plug-in hybrids widely would require big shifts by auto makers.

In addition, taking steps to preserve more trees and inducing farmers to change the way they till their land would be lower-cost and quicker ways to begin reducing emissions than relying solely on the utility sector for the bulk of the cuts, Mr. Sterba said. Trees and soil absorb carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas.

Other studies are coming to similar conclusions. A new report by consultant McKinsey & Co. argues that the least-expensive options to curb global-warming emissions are some of the most basic: improving the energy efficiency of buildings, air conditioners and lights, for instance, and planting more trees. Such moves will be cheaper than some higher-technology methods, such as capturing the CO2 that is emitted from power plants and then burying that CO2 underground, McKinsey says.

The cheaper options do present a political hurdle, the McKinsey report notes. They involve "billions of small emitters -- often consumers -- rather than a limited number of big companies already subject to heavy regulation."

Oil Company To Pay $200 Million In Toxic Dumping In Ivory Coast (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen And Marlise Simons

New York Times, February 15, 2007

CONAKRY, Guinea, Feb. 14 — An oil trading company based in the Netherlands has agreed to pay almost $200 million to the government of Ivory Coast to settle claims that it illegally dumped toxic petrochemical waste in Abidjan last August.

The company, Trafigura, said the payment was not an admission of fault by any party. It said the money would help pay for a new waste disposal plant, a new hospital and an audit to determine the cause and effects of the dumping.

At least 10 people died and thousands more were sickened in Abidjan after hundreds of tons of toxic sludge, pumped from the hold of a ship named the Probo Koala, was dumped at more than a dozen sites, some of them densely populated.

About 100,000 people sought medical treatment, swamping the country's health care system, and public outrage at the suspicion that corrupt government officials had allowed the dumping led to the resignation of the entire cabinet, though much of it was later reinstated.

In announcing the settlement on Tuesday, Trafigura said in a prepared statement that three of its employees, who had been held since September, had been released.

Trafigura had leased the Probo Koala, a Greek-owned tanker flying a Panamanian flag, to transport petrochemical products. It arrived in Amsterdam on July 2, on its way to Estonia, to unload what the company said was 250 tons of "regular slops," wash water from a ship's holds, which is normally laced with oil, gas, caustic soda or other chemicals.

But when Amsterdam port workers began pumping out the tanker, they noticed that the liquid was thicker than normal and smelled foul; they refused to finish the job for the agreed-upon price, about $15,000, telling the company that safe disposal in Europe would cost about $300,000. (Trafigura said that with the extra cost of the delays, the amount could have been twice that.)

The waste was eventually shipped to West Africa, where it was dumped by an Ivorian company called Tommy for $20,000. An inquiry by the Ivorian government later said that the company might have been created just to dump the waste, and that it had "neither the qualifications, the competence or the technical ability to treat this waste."

President Laurent Gbagbo of Ivory Coast described the settlement as a "a good agreement that will allow the state to compensate the victims," according to The Associated Press.

But environmental activists said the incident highlighted how toxic waste often ended up on the doorstep of the world's poorest people.

Greenpeace called the deal premature and inadequate. "It does not do justice to the facts because the full liability and the damages have yet to be assessed," said Helen Perivier, a spokeswoman for Greenpeace International. She said she feared the government might absolve Trafigura of liability for the waste transport. The incident prompted a number of other investigations. A class action suit on behalf of thousands of victims is before a British court. In the Netherlands, a criminal investigation into the ship's moves while in Amsterdam's port is in progress, a spokesman for the Dutch government said. And there is a criminal investigation under way in Estonia, where the ship loaded cargo and left unhindered.

Achim Steiner, director of the United Nations Environment Program, told reporters on Wednesday that the incident had drawn attention to what he called "a whole unregulated and often illegal trade in toxic hazardous waste. This is not just some minor problem."

Effects Of Genetically Engineered Alfalfa Cultivate A Debate (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, February 15, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — The government was premature in deregulating production of alfalfa that is genetically engineered to resist a weed-killing herbicide, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture should not have acted as it did in 2005 without assessing the environmental effect of crops genetically modified to resist the herbicide Roundup, ruled U.S. District Court Judge Charles Breyer of the Northern District of California. The suit against the USDA was filed by the anti-biotech Center for Food Safety, the Sierra Club and organic alfalfa (hay) farmers. It accused the USDA of violating federal law by not requiring the environmental assessment.

Opponents of biotech crops, which are genetically engineered to have certain qualities, such as resistance to weed killers, have expressed concerns that they could interbreed with wild plants and create herbicide-resistant weeds.

Alfalfa is the nation's fourth-largest crop and is fed to farm animals, especially dairy cattle.

"There's potential for these crops to contaminate non-genetically engineered alfalfa," says Will Rostov, senior attorney for the Center for Food Safety. This is particularly a concern for organic farmers, because genetically engineered plants cannot be sold as organic.

The Roundup Ready alfalfa cited in the suit was developed and sold by Forge Genetics of Minnesota, using technology from Monsanto. It allows growers to spray fields with Monsanto's Roundup herbicide, in which the chemical glyphosate is the active ingredient, killing weeds without hurting the alfalfa.

Monsanto submitted a detailed environmental analysis of the alfalfa to USDA, says company spokesman Chris Horner. "Reading the ruling, it's unclear how much of that was taken into consideration." All weeds built up resistance to herbicides over time, he says.

Breyer ruled that both sides must sit down together and propose remedies to him by Feb. 26.

Rostov says his group plans to push for an injunction on the planting, sale and distribution of Roundup Ready alfalfa until the USDA has done an impact assessment.

Only about 197,600 acres of the 22 million acres of the alfalfa grown in the USA in 2006 was genetically engineered, according to the International Service for the Acquisition of Agri-Biotech Applications.

The USDA is "very committed to protecting the environment" and is evaluating the ruling, says spokeswoman Rachel Iadicicco.

However, even if the USDA does an environmental assessment, it's unclear that it would have any effect on whether or not Roundup Ready alfalfa can be sold.

The judge ruled that under the National Environmental Policy Act, the USDA must do an assessment if there was the potential for "a significant environmental impact."

But under the Plant Protection Act, the basis for USDA's regulatory authority, it can adopt regulations only to prevent the introduction and dissemination of plant pests.

"If they find that the only thing it does is cause organic farmers harm, that may be an environmental impact, but under the Plant Protection Act, it may not be something that (USDA) can take into consideration," says Greg Jaffe, director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest's biotechnology project.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Attorney To Plead Guilty To Leaking BALCO Testimony (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 14, 2007

A lawyer admitted in court documents Wednesday that he provided a Chronicle reporter with transcripts of confidential grand jury testimony by Barry Bonds and other athletes about steroid use, and federal authorities said they would drop their effort to send the reporter and a colleague to prison for 18 months for refusing to disclose their source.

The lawyer, Troy Ellerman, 44, who once represented the founder and another executive of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, agreed in court documents to plead guilty to four charges of disclosing the transcripts in violation of a judge's order. The plea agreement calls for a sentence of up to two years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

The agreement must be approved by a federal judge, and Ellerman can withdraw his admissions and go to trial if the judge rejects the two-year sentence or any of the other terms of the deal. No court date has been set.

Ellerman admitted allowing a Chronicle reporter, Mark Fainaru-Wada, to take verbatim notes of grand jury testimony by Bonds, fellow baseball players Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield, and sprinter Tim Montgomery in his Sacramento office in June and November 2004.

Articles in 2004 by Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams quoted Giambi and Montgomery as admitting they used performance-enhancing drugs. Bonds and Sheffield both testified they didn't knowingly take steroids, but the substances they described taking matched prosecutors' descriptions of steroids supplied by BALCO.

While he was secretly leaking the transcripts, Ellerman acknowledged Wednesday, he was publicly complaining to a federal judge about the leaks, and even filed a motion in October 2004 to dismiss charges against BALCO's founder, Victor Conte, arguing that the disclosures made a fair trial "practically impossible."

Based on those admissions, he agreed to plead guilty to obstruction of justice and making a false declaration, in addition to two counts of contempt of court for leaking the transcripts.

Once U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White accepts Ellerman's guilty plea, grand jury subpoenas to Fainaru-Wada and Williams will be withdrawn, the Justice Department said.

The subpoenas, received last May, demanded that the reporters identify the source or sources of the grand jury testimony, and that The Chronicle turn over any documents that might reveal the source.

When Fainaru-Wada and Williams refused to testify, White held them in contempt last September, saying a 1972 U.S. Supreme Court ruling had established that journalists have no special privilege to withhold evidence from a grand jury.

The judge ordered the reporters imprisoned for up to 18 months, unless they agreed to testify earlier, and also fined The Chronicle $1,000 a day for defying its subpoena.

The penalties have been suspended while the reporters and the newspaper appeal to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which had scheduled a hearing for March 7.

Their lawyers have argued that a 1996 Supreme Court ruling opened the door for federal judges to recognize a journalist's right to protect confidential sources when the value of the reporting to the public outweighed any harm caused by the leak.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-San Francisco, and several other congressional leaders have urged the Justice Department to withdraw the subpoenas and have expressed support for a federal "shield law" for journalists, similar to laws in effect in California and most other states.

Fainaru-Wada, Williams and The Chronicle all withheld comment on Ellerman. Eve Burton, a lawyer for the reporters and the newspaper, said, "As we have said throughout, we do not discuss issues involving confidential sources."

Ellerman's admission does not end the BALCO case, which has already resulted in guilty pleas from Conte and four other defendants, congressional hearings on steroids in sports, and a new steroid-testing policy for professional baseball.

The question that still looms over the case is whether a separate grand jury, convened last year, will indict Bonds for perjury in his 2003 testimony that he never knowingly took steroids. Bonds' former trainer, Greg Anderson, who pleaded guilty to drug distribution in the BALCO case, has been in prison since August for refusing to testify against Bonds.

Bonds' lawyer, Michael Rains, said Wednesday he thinks Fainaru-Wada and Williams should be prosecuted on charges of conspiring with Ellerman to disclose the grand jury transcripts.

"I think they're co-conspirators in a criminal enterprise with Troy Ellerman ... a deceitful attempt to undermine orders of a federal judge," said Rains, who unsuccessfully sued the reporters, the publisher of their book about BALCO, "Game of Shadows," and The Chronicle on similar grounds last year. "They bragged about getting these materials. They knew they were secret grand jury materials."

But a news media advocate was relieved.

"In a sense, the system worked," said Peter Scheer, executive director of the California First Amendment Coalition. "The reporters honored their promise of confidentiality to their source, which is both their right and their responsibility to the First Amendment." And ultimately, he said, the government uncovered the leaker on its own.

Another media advocate was uneasy, however, about the prosecution of Ellerman.

While the reporters deserve applause for not revealing their source, "someone who may be thinking about leaking information to the press may think twice if he knows he's going to go to jail," said Mark Feldstein, a journalism historian and associate professor of media and public affairs at George Washington University. That could keep important information from coming to light, he said.

Ellerman, of Woodland Park, Colo., represented Conte and BALCO vice president James Valente at different stages of the case. His name surfaced publicly in December when Yahoo.com quoted a former defense investigator, Larry McCormack, who was once fired from his job by Ellerman, as saying that the lawyer was the reporters' source.

Prosecutors said in a news release Wednesday that "a previously unknown witness" had approached the FBI last fall offering to help prove that Ellerman was the source.

On Dec. 13, prosecutors said, FBI agents confronted Ellerman at his home and he "made admissions that could be used to prove his guilt."

But nine days later, prosecutors filed a brief urging the appeals court to uphold the contempt-of-court orders against the two reporters and send them to prison. In an apparent reference to Ellerman, prosecutors said they were also submitting sealed documents to the court with new information about their efforts to identify the reporters' sources.

Ellerman's lawyer contacted the U.S. attorney's office about three weeks ago and said his client was prepared to admit disclosing the grand jury testimony, leading to negotiations that produced Wednesday's plea agreement, prosecutors said.

The development comes amid other controversies about reporters and sources.

In Washington, D.C., the trial of former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on charges of lying about disclosing a CIA agent's name to the press, has included testimony from a series of reporters, including Judith Miller of the New York Times, who spent 85 days in prison until she got permission to identify Libby as her source.

In San Francisco, blogger Josh Wolf has spent nearly six months in prison -- the longest incarceration of a journalist in U.S. history -- for refusing to surrender a videotape of a July 2005 anarchist protest to federal authorities.

By Karen De Sá

The San Jose Mercury News, February 15, 2007

A defense attorney Wednesday agreed to plead guilty to leaking secret grand jury testimony in the Balco steroids probe to the media, likely sparing two San Francisco Chronicle reporters from an 18-month prison term for refusing to disclose their source's name. The reporters had used the leaked testimony to expose alleged steroid use among big-name athletes, including baseball players Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi.

According to an agreement filed in San Francisco's U.S. District Court, Troy Ellerman, 44, who counseled two key figures in the steroids probe, will plead guilty to the 2004 leak, as well as lying about it, obstructing justice and disobeying a court order not to disclose grand jury information. The agreement freed the reporters -- awaiting an appeal of their case -- from having to serve time on contempt of court charges. The subpoenas seeking to force the reporters to reveal their source will be withdrawn once the plea is formally entered, a Justice Department spokesman said.

Federal prosecutors, searching for the source of the leaks, early on set their sights on Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, who wrote in December 2004 that Bonds testified he might have unwittingly used steroid-laced substances. Bonds later denied using steroids, claiming he thought the substances were flaxseed oil and a legal ointment.

Williams said Wednesday that he had dashed out of the office early to pick up Valentine's Day flowers for his wife when a television reporter called with the news. He's reluctant to get too exuberant, he said, until the agreement is approved.

``If we're not going to jail, of course that's great,'' Williams said. ``But it will take a little while to sort that out.''

The case of the two threatened reporters had taken on broader significance as yet another example of the federal government using tough tactics to coax reporters into spilling their sources amid high-profile investigations. Journalists must often promise sources confidentiality in order to get critical information to the public -- especially when the stakes are high.

Peter Scheer, executive director of the California First Amendment Coalition, praised the recent development in the Balco case but noted that Wednesday's agreement does not mean the larger issue has been resolved. With the ``Scooter'' Libby CIA leak trial ongoing and the pending case against freelance journalist Josh Wolf -- now in a Dublin jail for refusing to turn over videotape of a 2005 political protest in San Francisco -- reporting freedom remains in jeopardy, he said.

``There's tension between the press and the government. The government tries to keep secrets, and the press tries to get those secrets and report on them,'' Scheer said. ``The Balco case is one example, but better examples very recently include warrantless wiretapping by the National Security Agency or the CIA's extraordinary rendition program in Europe and elsewhere.''

The steroid scandal involving the Bay Area laboratory not only raised fundamental issues of press freedom, but it also tarnished the reputations of adored athletes, from Bonds and Giambi to sprinter Tim Montgomery -- once billed as the world's fastest man.

But now it's Ellerman -- a former rodeo cowboy and the commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association -- who is in the spotlight. His expected guilty pleas to four charges of disclosing confidential transcripts in violation of a federal judge's order calls for a prison sentence of up to two years and a $250,000 fine.

Ellerman met Balco President Victor Conte Jr. in 1997, after helping one of Conte's daughters with legal problems. When investigators raided Balco in September 2003, Conte called Ellerman for help. The broad-shouldered lawyer with a shaved head eventually represented Jim Valente, Balco's vice president. Both Conte and Valente were among five men convicted for giving elite athletes illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

Ellerman, who lives in Colorado and worked as a criminal defense lawyer in Sacramento until 2005, often blamed the government for the leaks.

He did not return calls seeking comment Wednesday night, but he's spoken with the Mercury News in the past. In March 2004, he told the newspaper that the prosecution's request for a trial within 70 days, while turning 34,000 pages of documents and evidence over to the defense, ``smacks of a political agenda.''

``Bush wants to have a summit on steroids,'' Ellerman said of the Balco case.

Conte, the Balco mastermind who had been accused in court papers of being the source of the leak, said Wednesday he was happy to have his name cleared and called Ellerman's actions outrageous.

``I'm shocked at this news,'' he wrote in an e-mail. ``This man was an officer of the court who was highly paid to provide the services of a criminal defense attorney. Instead, he chose to serve his own agenda and act in a way that was damaging to his own clients.''

Reporters Avoid Jail In Balco Case (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 14 — Two reporters from The San Francisco Chronicle who wrote a best-selling book about steroid use in baseball will avoid jail time after a defense lawyer agreed Wednesday to plead guilty to leaking them secret federal court documents, prosecutors said.

The lawyer, Troy L. Ellerman, will plead guilty to two counts of contempt, as well as one count each of obstruction of justice and filing false statements in a federal court, according to a statement from the United States Attorney's Office in Los Angeles.

As part of the plea, the Justice Department will withdraw subpoenas issued to the reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada, who had been held in contempt by a federal judge since September for refusing to say who their sources were for a series of Chronicle articles and their 2006 book, "Game of Shadows."

"The government believes that Ellerman's guilty pleas alleviate the need for the reporters to testify," the statement read.

Ellerman faces up to two years in prison and a $250,000 fine, said Douglas M. Miller, one of the prosecutors in the case.

Ellerman, who did not return a call to his cellphone for comment, had once represented Victor Conte Jr., the founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, the company from Burlingame, Calif., at the center of a continuing federal investigation into steroids in sports. Ellerman had also represented James J. Valente, the vice president of Balco.

Conte and Valente served time in prison in connection to distributing steroids through their company, whose client list included some of the biggest names in sports, including Barry Bonds, the San Francisco Giants slugger; Tim Montgomery, the Olympic sprinter; and the baseball stars Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi.

All four athletes testified in front of a grand jury in 2003, and court documents filed Wednesday show that Ellerman admitted that he had allowed the Chronicle reporters to see transcripts of each of the men's testimony in 2004 in violation of a court order.

Defense In Steroid Case Admits Leak (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo And Stuart Silverstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

Attorney's action will spare San Francisco Chronicle reporters from prison for contempt in refusing to reveal source.

A defense attorney in the BALCO steroid scandal has admitted that he revealed secret grand jury testimony from Major League Baseball players to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters, ending a constitutional standoff between federal prosecutors and the press, and eliminating the threat of prison for the journalists.

Troy Ellerman, 44, who represented the vice president of the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, agreed to plead guilty to two counts of contempt of court, one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false declaration with a federal court, according to an 18-page plea agreement filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on Wednesday.

Once he enters his plea, the U.S. Justice Department intends to withdraw the grand jury subpoenas issued to reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, who had been sentenced to prison on contempt charges for refusing to comply with the subpoenas, a government spokesman said. Fainaru-Wada, 41, and Williams, 57, had remained free while appealing the sentence.

"The government believes that Ellerman's guilty pleas will alleviate the need for the reporters to testify before the grand jury," Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles, which investigated the leak, said in a news release.

Williams, reached by phone, said Wednesday's news caught him and Fainaru-Wada by surprise. He declined to confirm that Ellerman was their confidential source.

"The whole point of our situation is that we're not going to give our sources to anyone as long as we have a confidentiality agreement in place, and we do," Williams added.

At the same time, Williams said if the prospect of prison is removed, "Of course, that's great."

The case was seen as a tipping point in a series of court battles between journalists and federal prosecutors seeking to unmask their sources. This week, a procession of reporters has filed into a Washington courtroom to testify about who leaked the name of CIA agent Valerie Plame.

Media advocates, however, contended that unlike the Plame matter, the BALCO case did not involve sensitive security issues and the reporters performed an important public service by exposing drug abuse in national sports.

Attorneys for the Chronicle argued before U.S. District Judge Jeffrey S. White that forcing journalists to disclose their sources would undercut the 1st Amendment and ability of the media to gather news.

But White agreed with the prosecutors, who argued that letting people get away with violating a judge's order to keep information confidential would deeply erode the system of justice.

And according to the plea agreement, Ellerman very much flouted that system in 2004 as his client, James Valente, was headed to trial for allegedly illegally distributing steroids.

Ellerman allegedly invited the reporters on two occasions to his law offices to take verbatim notes of the testimony given by baseball stars Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield and sprinter Tim Montgomery.

When the Chronicle's subsequent stories connecting the athletes to the steroid ring rocked the sports world, Ellerman blamed the government in a court hearing for the leaks, according to the plea agreement. He then filed a motion to dismiss the charges, saying that the media coverage of the confidential testimony made "fair trial practically impossible anywhere in the country," the plea agreement said.

For misleading the court, Ellerman was charged with obstruction of justice. Although he could face up to 15 years in prison and fines of $500,000, the U.S. attorney's office has agreed that he should be sentenced to no more than two years, and he could get probation. If the judge decides to give him more time than the agreement stipulates, Ellerman can withdraw the plea.

"The government acknowledges that Ellerman's decision to plead guilty has saved future government resources by resolving the leak investigation now, has saved the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals from having to consider and rule on the appeal filed by the reporters and the Chronicle, and has avoided the potential that Fainaru-Wada and Williams would serve time in prison," Mrozek said.

The BALCO case began in 2003, when agents raided the Burlingame laboratory that produced performance-enhancing drugs and a grand jury probe was begun.

As professional athletes were called before the grand jury, reporters scrambled to learn the names of those who got illegal drugs from the firm.

But when indictments were announced in February 2004 against four defendants — including Valente and BALCO founder Victor Conte — prosecutors had removed the athletes' names.

The transcripts of the grand jury testimony, revealing the athletes' names, were distributed to the defendants and their attorneys. Judge Susan Illston made the parties sign a protective order not to disseminate them to the press.

About four months later, however, Ellerman "willfully disobeyed" Illston's order and invited Fainaru-Wada to his Sacramento law offices to take verbatim notes from Montgomery's sealed testimony, according to the plea agreement.

The June 24 headlines were: "Sprinter admitted use of BALCO 'magic potion' " and "Track star's testimony linked Bonds to steroid use." Illston asked the Justice Department to investigate the leak.

Ellerman expressed outrage about the leak in court. In mid-July, he filed a declaration under penalty of perjury stating that he "had no idea who provided the information to the media concerning Mr. Montgomery's grand jury testimony nor why it was done." He wrote that the leak was "very damaging to [the defendant's] right to a fair trial."

In October, he made the motion to dismiss while subsequently inviting Fainaru-Wada back to his offices to take notes from the testimony of Giambi, Bonds and Sheffield. The resulting stories caused an international uproar over the use of steroids by top stars in professional sports.

This fall, according to Mrozek, a "previously unknown witness approached the FBI offering to help prove that Ellerman was the source of the leaks." The FBI secretly taped Ellerman admitting that he was the source of the grand jury transcripts, according to the plea agreement.

Media advocates were delighted to hear that Williams and Fainaru-Wada would avoid prison.

Lucie Morillon, the Washington director of Reporters Without Borders, said the whole episode still damaged journalists' ability to dig up information.

"This source has been forced to come forward and this does not help to instill trust between reporters and their sources," she said.

Traditionally, the Justice Department has opted to subpoena reporters in only the most extreme circumstances, such as to protect national security or public safety, but critics said that changed under the Bush administration. Eve Burton, corporate counsel for the Hearst Corp., which owns the Chronicle, said the number of media subpoenas has increased markedly in recent years, according to research the company did to prepare for this case. Of 91 federal subpoenas issued to journalists since 1991, 41 have been filed since January 2003, she said.

The Justice Department has said it does not have a tally of the total number of subpoenas issued to reporters.

Fred Brown, vice chair of the ethics committee of the Society of Professional Journalists, said the case also raises ethical issues for journalists who grant confidentiality to sources whose motives for releasing the information might be questionable.

"I think it shows you don't make that promise unconditionally," Brown said. "You should leave yourself an out if your source does something unethical."

FBI Rules Out Terrorism In Shootings By Young Bosnian Immigrant (AP)

By Paul Foy, Associated Press Writer
AP, February 15, 2007

(AP) - SALT LAKE CITY-The FBI said Wednesday it has no reason to believe the shooting spree that killed five people in a shopping mall was an act of Islamic terrorism, leaving a young Bosnian immigrant's motives a mystery.

"It's just unexplainable," FBI agent Patrick Kiernan said. "He was just walking around and shooting everybody he saw."

Sulejman Talovic, 18, fired randomly at shoppers Monday, killing five and leaving four others injured before he was shot dead by police.

"We are Muslims, but we are not terrorists," the boy's aunt, Ajka Omerovic, said Wednesday at the family's house. She rejected any religious motive for the shooting and said the family cannot explain it.

The Talovic family fled war-torn Bosnia for Utah in 1998 "to be free," she said.

Talovic's parents do not speak English and are not answering knocks on their door. Omerovic said the boy's mother is distraught and that the father normally works "dusk to dawn" in construction.

Authorities are investigating how Talovic acquired one of his weapons, a .38-caliber pistol, which is illegal for a teenager to possess, said Lori Dyer, in charge of the local office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Those efforts were delayed Wednesday when an East Coast storm shut down ATF offices, she said.

Talovic was heavily armed with ammunition and a shotgun as well.

"You can buy long guns at 18. That's not a problem. The handgun he shouldn't have had, so obviously we're going to look at where he got that gun," Dyer said.

Omerovic said Talovic never displayed any guns. "We want to know, who sold these guns to him," she said.

Meanwhile, less than 48 hours after the killings, the mall reopened.

Salt Lake City Police Chief Chris Burbank said the rampage could have been even worse if not for the quick actions of an off-duty officer, Ken Hammond, who engaged Talovic in a shootout before other officers arrived.

Investigators knew little about Talovic, except that he lived in Salt Lake City with his mother. He was enrolled in numerous city schools before withdrawing in 2004.

He was a legal U.S. resident, arriving with family members as war refugees in 1998, said Virginia Kice, a spokeswoman with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

At 16, Talovic was taken out of high school by his mother to work, Salt Lake City school district spokesman Jason Olsen said Wednesday. He was employed at Aramark Uniform Services, where managers refused to comment.

Talovic was only 4 when he and his mother fled their village of Talovici on foot after Serbian forces overran it in 1993, people close to the family told The Associated Press in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

He lived as a refugee in Bosnia from 1993 to 1998, when his family moved to the United States, they said.

During that period, he spent some time in Srebrenica, the northeastern enclave where up to 8,000 Muslim men and boys were slaughtered in 1995 by Serb forces.

Talovic left Srebrenica two years before the massacre, but acquaintances suggested it may have left an indelible mark on the quiet little boy they knew.

"That's why I'm convinced the war did this in Utah," said Murat Avdic, a friend of the family. "There cannot be any other reason."

The four people injured remained in hospitals, with two in critical condition and two listed as serious.

Associated Press writers Debbie Hummel in Salt Lake City and Aida Cerkez-Robinson in Sarajevo contributed to this story.

FBI Taps Raytheon For Info-sharing System (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff
Government Computer News, February 15, 2007

The FBI has awarded a contract to the Raytheon Co. of Waltham, Mass., to build out the National Data Exchange (N-Dex) law enforcement information-sharing system, sources said.

According to a bureau official, FBI systems specialists expect to meet with their Raytheon counterparts within the next two weeks to plan the IT work leading up to the N-Dex system rollout.

DOJ_NMG_0132653

N-Dex uses advanced information sharing that harmonizes data entered into various types of law enforcement systems for common search, acquisition and analysis. N-Dex acts as a counterpart to R-Dex, a regional data exchange system that provides a “pointer” to the location of specific information held by other law enforcement agencies.

Technical descriptions of the N-Dex project emphasize its use of standards such as the Global Justice XML Data Model and the National Information Exchange Model to foster information sharing.

The Justice Department likely will provide funds for N-Dex during 2007 and 2008, and the FBI will assume funding responsibility in 2009 and later, sources said.

N-Dex is intended to facilitate data analysis and the detection of links among people and places, as well as events such as crimes, objects such as weapons, drugs and currency, and gangs to help intelligence analysis. The project has progressed for about six years under the auspices of the bureau’s National Criminal Information Services Division in Clarksburg, W.Va. FBI officials have worked with their counterparts in many federal agencies as well as states and cities to create the framework and standards for the system.

Raytheon declined to comment. FBI officials were not immediately available for comment.

An FBI official close to the project noted that the bureau had structured the acquisition as a performance-based contract. The official said N-Dex likely would begin full-scale operation in about a year.

'Breach' Draws a Fresh Angle on the Story of the FBI Mole, But the Mystery of Why He Did It Endures Six Years Later

Why did the FBI's top spy hunter -- a Cold War warrior who repeatedly professed his love of God, family, country and J. Edgar Hoover -- sell his nation's most sensitive secrets to the Russians?

It's a question that hangs unanswered over Washington, the city where Robert Hanssen was arrested on Feb. 18, 2001, for the worst security breach in the FBI's history.

Ever since, it has confounded not only his family, friends and colleagues, but also untold numbers of authors, forensic psychologists, criminologists and intelligence analysts. And that question is further compounded by the enigma of Hanssen himself -- a counterintelligence officer who passed classified materials to the Soviet and Russian governments undetected for 22 years; a devotee of the Catholic order of Opus Dei who encouraged a friend to secretly observe him having sex with his wife; who bought a Mercedes-Benz for a Washington stripper; and who was obsessed with pornography.

Six years, virtually to the day, after Hanssen's capture, a new movie brings that perplexing question back into play with a previously undisclosed story -- that of Eric O'Neill, the 27-year-old surveillance operative whose job it was to closely monitor Hanssen while the FBI maneuvered to ensnare him. O'Neill's story does not appear in any of several books written about Hanssen since his capture because -- until recently -- the FBI forbade him to speak publicly.

Directed by Billy Ray, "Breach" offers no "Rosebud" revelations to explain Hanssen's treason. But it places audiences in the same unnerving situation O'Neill (played by Ryan Phillippe) found himself in in January 2001 -- posing as office assistant to Hanssen (Chris Cooper), securing his trust and reporting his every move until the double agent made the crucial mistake that led to his apprehension. Hanssen was arrested a month later, after stashing a trash bag full of classified materials under a footbridge in Fairfax County's Foxstone Park -- a spy's "dead drop" intended for his Russian handlers.

"There are, I'd say, 500 stories that could be told about Hanssen," Ray acknowledges. "After all, there were 500 officers working on that case. But out of the 500, there was only one who was locked in a room with that guy every day -- Eric."

Hanssen, who turns 63 in April, is spending the rest of his life at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, Colo. Only after he pleaded guilty in 2002 -- and after most of the half-dozen or so books about the case had been published -- was O'Neill finally cleared to tell his story. He pitched the "Breach" project to Hollywood.

Which is to explain how the real Eric O'Neill and Ray come to be sitting in a lunchroom -- right across the street from FBI headquarters -- and revisiting the baffling conundrum that is Robert Hanssen.

Both acknowledge they are telling only one small corner of the story and both agree that, in terms of explaining Hanssen's motivation, "Breach" can only offer informed conjecture. But that's as close as anyone can expect to evoke the man, insists Ray, who has read all the available research on Hanssen and can reel off the prevailing theories about him.

"His father told him he was a loser," Ray begins. "He didn't want to look bad in front of his wife. He was mad at being passed over for promotion. The Russians treated him like James Bond and that really got him going."

But Ray, whose 2003 film "Shattered Glass" probed the motives of another Washington schemer, journalistic fabricator Stephen Glass, has his own interpretation.

DOJ_NMG_0132654

"The truth is, we just don't know him," says Ray, 43, boyish and gentle-voiced. "And ultimately, does it matter why he did what he did? His wife's going to have to think about why he did what he did. But I didn't spend a lot of time thinking about it. I imagine Chris Cooper spent some time thinking about it. Why did Stephen Glass write all those [false] articles? I can give you 50 reasons -- all totally valid. But at the end of the day, he did it. And I think, ultimately, you are what you do."

For Ray, the bottom line was this: Hanssen "had an absence of a moral rudder. He didn't have that part of the gut that says: 'Don't do this. It's illegal, immoral, dangerous and wrong.' "

"I believe that moral rudder was there, but it was just ignored," counters O'Neill, a clean-cut, bright-eyed man of 33, now a government contracts lawyer in Washington. "He knew the right things to do but he made excuses for himself. And because his religion was so central to his life -- and he knew he was doing immoral things, hurting people -- he believed himself evil and doomed."

"Breach" is also fascinating, ironically, for what it doesn't tell, and how those stories -- found in numerous articles and such nonfiction books as David Wise's "Spy: The Inside Story of How the FBI's Robert Hanssen Betrayed America" and David A. Vise's "The Bureau and the Mole" -- yield even more perplexing questions about Hanssen.

"Ultimately, who knows the heart of a double agent?" asks "Spy" author Wise. "Does a spy even know what drives him to betray everything -- his wife, his country, himself? It's a complicated business."

In the case of Hanssen, the more that these writers uncover, it seems, the darker and more elusive he becomes.

In a 2001 article, intelligence affairs author James Bamford, who came to know Hanssen personally, remembered that Hanssen "would much rather talk about the immorality of abortion and the dangers of Planned Parenthood than the latest draft picks." And when Bamford finally agreed, at Hanssen's request, to attend one of his Opus Dei meetings, the FBI man "reveled in that closed society of true believers, like a fraternity brother exchanging a secret handshake."

But "hidden deep behind that pious, anti-Communist facade," Bamford wrote in the New York Times Magazine, "was a disturbing, bifurcated psyche. A Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hanssen."

A tall, brooding loner -- nicknamed "the mortician" for the dark suits and clothes he always wore -- Hanssen pursued a shadowy double role in virtually every facet of his life. As the head of the Soviet unit at the FBI, he was in charge of catching enemy spies but, according to court documents, books and published reports, received an estimated $1.4 million over 22 years for passing classified materials to the Soviet and Russian regimes.

(Those materials included details of the U.S. government's contingency plan for surviving a nuclear attack, identities of Soviet agents working for Washington and the existence of a multimillion-dollar spy tunnel built under the Soviet embassy here.)

Hanssen would duck out of work early so he could attend antiabortion rallies, yet had no compunction about sending three young men to their deaths -- Russian double agents whose identities he sold to Moscow. And according to Vise's book, Hanssen was never too busy working for his country's enemies to feed the media damning information about the Clinton administration's purported cover-up of financial contributions from communist China.

"You have to understand he was a compartmentalizer," Vise says. "How else could he be married and a father and go to church every day and, at the same time, commit treason?"

According to Wise and Vise's books and others, Hanssen spent his share of secular time at "gentleman's clubs" in downtown Washington. He befriended several strippers, including Priscilla Sue Galey, on whom he lavished several thousands of dollars in cash and jewelry. (She was the one for whom he bought the Mercedes -- used.)

On one occasion, he took Galey on a free trip to Hong Kong, while he attended an FBI conference there. Yet to her surprise, Hanssen never attempted to have sex with her. He was, he told her, trying to bring her closer to God. He neglected, however, to inform his wife, Bonnie, of his missionary work.

As the movie only alludes to, but most Hanssen books recount, Hanssen reserved the worst betrayal of all for his wife, Bonnie -- who, by the terms of her pension arrangement, cannot comment about her husband to the media. He ostensibly revered her, yet disseminated material about their sexual relationship on the Internet, and even rigged a secret surveillance camera in their bedroom -- unbeknown to her -- so a childhood friend could watch their lovemaking when he came to visit.

This highly secretive man also wanted to be discovered, maintains Vise; "otherwise, in his eyes, the world would never have had the chance to see how devilishly clever he was -- eluding detection for two decades."

That seemed clear to O'Neill on that January day in 2001 when he moved into Hanssen's office to begin his clandestine assignment. As the movie shows, his new boss immediately lectured him on the kind of spies to be on the lookout for: They would be in "the worst possible place," trying to do the most possible damage and for the best financial gain.

"There he was," O'Neill says. "Across the desk, sitting in that worst possible place, with access to everything. So we began our relationship with me thinking, 'Is it cat and mouse? Who's the cat and who's the mouse? Is he just being a mentor or is he saying: 'I know what's going on. See if you can catch me. You can't because you're a stupid, low-level clerk.' "

But O'Neill had the last word in that crucible of a relationship. On the day of Hanssen's impending arrest, knowing he'd never see Hanssen free again, O'Neill had a special farewell to make.

"I said 'Boss?' He turned and said, 'Yeah?' I said, 'I'll catch you later.' "

Judge To Reconsider Bail For Alleged Drug Kingpin (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 15, 2007

Thrice-convicted felon flight risk, prosecutor says

Dang, that sounds harsh.

Locked down in solitary confinement in an already tightly secured jail, forced to suffer from an untreated hernia and isolated from his wife and children - that has been the unfair life of Vicente Corona since he was alleged by authorities to be the top dog of a massive mail-order drug distribution network, his attorney argued Wednesday.

But, wait. Call Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck crazy, but he's thinking all that extra security might stem from Corona's alleged threat to escape, kill a witness and slay an accused conspirator.

"The defendant has communicated to a person in the Blount County Jail his intent to escape," Winck told U.S. District Judge Thomas Phillips at a hearing Wednesday. "He was going to use his brother, Roberto, to help him escape (during) his hernia operation.

"The defendant also communicated he intended to have one of the witnesses killed," Winck continued. "The defendant communicated he would have had another co-conspirator killed."

Winck said authorities have proof to show that Corona's brother rented a hotel room in the area around the time of the alleged escape attempt.

It was only because the U.S. Marshals Service got wind of the alleged plot that security was beefed up. Corona waseventually allowed to have his hernia operation under heavy guard, Winck said.

Johnson countered that Winck was telling tales he couldn't back up.

"I would note for the court he's relying on someone who is an inmate at the Blount County Jail who is unidentified," Johnson said of the alleged source of Winck's information.

It was a pretty bold move on Johnson's part Wednesday to ask Phillips to reconsider an earlier ruling by U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton that Corona should be locked up pending trial.

Consider the facts Guyton relied on:

Corona is an illegal immigrant caught in California with fake identification. He is alleged to be the kingpin of a mail-order drug business that shipped more than a half-ton of marijuana and a quarter-ton of cocaine from California to Knoxville in just three years.

He has three prior felony drug convictions, which Winck contends makes his punishment a mandatory life term if he is convicted. His wife and children live in California. He has no relatives in the Knoxville area, although he has a few in Chattanooga.

"Persons who continually violate the (federal drug laws) are a danger to our community," Winck said. "Because he's facing a term of imprisonment of life, I also submit he is a risk of flight."

Johnson counters that it is unduly harsh to keep Corona locked up in the Blount County Jail, where inmates cannot even watch television.

"Pretrial detention in a county jail is, I submit, the harshest alternative," Johnson said.

Phillips said he would issue a written ruling on the issue. He also is set to decide Johnson's bid to have the case tossed out for trial delays. The odds are not good given that Phillips called Johnson's bluff with an offer to move up the July trial date if Johnson would drop pending motions. Johnson declined.

Congressional Delegation Staying Out Of Hemp Debate (AP)

AP, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON North Dakota legislators are urging Congress to make it easier for farmers around the country to grow hemp. But the state's congressional delegation won't be rushing to help.

Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan and Rep. Earl Pomeroy, all Democrats, are staying out of the congressional debate over industrial hemp. At issue is whether it should be treated in the same way as marijuana or whether commercial hemp production should be allowed.

DOJ_NMG_0132656

The North Dakota House passed two resolutions on the issue this week, urging Congress and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration to allow farmers to grow the crop. The state last week issued the nation's first licenses to two farmers seeking to grow industrial hemp.

Congress has tentatively waded into the debate, with pro-hemp legislation introduced by Texas Republican Rep. Ron Paul. Pomeroy is not signing on.

In an interview, Pomeroy said he does not want to interfere in discussions between the DEA and the commercial hemp industry.

"At this point in time, I'd like to leave this to the experts, and no one has ever accused Congress of being that group," Pomeroy said.

He has not decided how he feels about the issue, he said.

"I haven't reached a conclusion. I am watching with interest," he said. "I am learning from North Dakota's experience."

Spokesmen for Conrad and Dorgan said neither senator would be sponsoring or co-sponsoring legislation dealing with hemp. They did not say whether the two senators support making it easier for farmers to grow it.

Conrad spokesman Chris Thorne said Conrad worries the Bush administration will object.

"At this point, we don't see much room for success there," he said.

North Dakota Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson met with DEA officials earlier this week to try to persuade them to accept the two state licenses. The farmers must get approval from the agency, which has not allowed commercial hemp production but has said it would consider applications to grow it.

"I felt that we've got a long ways to go with DEA," Johnson said after the meeting. "They made it quite clear that they still do not understand or believe the distinction between industrial hemp and marijuana. That's a pretty fundamental issue."

He said he would rather see the DEA change its rules than try for a controversial battle in a busy Congress.

Garrison Courtney, a spokesman for the DEA, said the agency will give full consideration to the North Dakota applications.

"It's still in the very beginning stages," he said. "It would be premature to speculate on what our decision is going to be down the road."

Hemp is a cousin of marijuana that contains trace amounts of the chemical that causes a marijuana high, though hemp does not produce the same effects. The sturdy, fibrous plant is used to make an assortment of products including paper, rope, clothing and cosmetics.

Industrial hemp cultivation is legal in Canada and other countries but is banned in the United States. Law enforcement officials worry that industrial hemp can shield the growing of marijuana, although hemp supporters say that fear is unfounded.

North Dakota is one of seven states that have authorized industrial hemp farming. The others are Hawaii, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Montana and West Virginia, according to Vote Hemp, an industrial hemp advocacy organization based in Bedford, Mass.

Losing Afghanistan To Opium? (WT)

By Ileana Ros-Lehtinen

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The spring opium harvest will soon begin in Afghanistan. So will a murderous spring offensive by the Taliban and its allies against U.S. and coalition troops. The two events are directly related, for the Taliban and the warlords are funded by the billions of dollars deriving from the massive, illegal opium trade.

The deteriorating security in Afghanistan has been made possible by the opium crop's skyrocketing expansion. Much of the money is used to buy sophisticated weapons for the Taliban and warlords, pay their fighters, purchase supplies, bribe Afghan and Pakistani officials and provide an impoverished population with the means to earn a living and thereby secure their allegiance and support.

Seen in this context, it is clear that U.S. and coalition forces in Afghanistan are battling more than merely a few thousand militants. They are at war with an expanding narco-state that extends throughout the country. Without this support, our enemies would be hard-pressed to operate, much less continue increasing their numbers and firepower. Given this reality, the odds against success are lengthening.

After five years of sustained U.S. effort in Afghanistan, it should be apparent to all that our strategy has not succeeded. Yet as a new approach is about to be rolled out, it does not appear that those formulating this new proposal fully understand that the Taliban and its allies cannot be defeated without also targeting their principal source of financing -- the illegal drug trade.

Our anti-narcotics policy has long been hobbled by conflicting views and bureaucratic battles between the various players, including the Departments of Defense and State, the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), and other U.S. agencies, along with our NATO allies, especially the British. There is little prospect these long-entrenched divisions will be reconciled by themselves.

To encourage the administration to focus on this central problem, I and four of my colleagues on the House Foreign Affairs Committee recently sent a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates recommending a number of steps be taken immediately, including:

· Appointing a high-level coordinator of Afghan narco-terrorism policy to create and lead a unified campaign against drugs and terror that utilizes all U.S. agencies, assets and assistance, as we are doing successfully in Colombia.

· Implementing a new DEA "ride-along" policy with the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) and our own military forces on the ground in Afghanistan in order to combine ongoing U.S. and NATO military operations when these overlap with those of the DEA.

· Extraditing to the U.S. major drug kingpins and drug warlords, using a new narco-terrorism provision in the USA PATRIOT Act that makes the use of illicit drugs to support acts of terrorism or foreign terrorist organizations a federal crime. Extradition has worked well in Colombia, and can work in Afghanistan.

· Expediting training by the Colombian National Police's elite anti-narcotics unit, which visited Afghanistan last year, of their Afghan counterparts. We were pleased to see Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, note recently the key role our Colombian allies, and U.S. experience in Colombia, can play in the fight against illicit drugs in Afghanistan.

· Helping develop and facilitate trade promotion and increased trade-building capacity for Afghan products and industries in order to increase exports and create legitimate livelihoods in place of illicit opium farming and production today.

Of course, these recommendations must be part of a much broader effort that includes a greatly enhanced effort by Pakistan to secure its tribal areas and the president's proposals to increase funding for roads, rural electrification, alternative livelihood programs, and training for security forces. But without a comprehensive counternarcotics policy, these efforts by themselves are unlikely to succeed.

The problem with our strategy in Afghanistan is not primarily one of resources, but of policy. Our enemies draw their strength not merely from their weapons and their fanaticism, but from the opium in the fields as well.

Report: Teens Using Prescription Drugs (AP)

By Karen Matthews

AP, February 14, 2007

NEW YORK (AP)— Junior's been helping himself to Mother's little helper. That's the conclusion of a report released Wednesday by White House drug czar John Walters that found while U.S. teenagers' use of marijuana is declining, their abuse of prescription drugs is holding steady or in some cases increasing.

"The drug dealer is us," said Walters, the national drug policy director.

Walters said that many teenagers are obtaining drugs over the Internet, getting them free from friends or taking them from someone's medicine cabinet.

According to an analysis of national surveys prepared by Walters' office, 2.1 million teenagers abused prescription drugs in 2005, the most recent year for which figures are available.

While their use of marijuana declined from 30.1 percent to 25.8 percent from 2002 to 2006, use of OxyContin, a painkiller, increased from 2.7 percent to 3.5 percent over the same period. Use of Vicodin, another painkiller, increased slightly from 6 percent to 6.3 percent.

Teens are also abusing stimulants like Adderall and anti-anxiety drugs like Xanax because they are readily available and perceived as safer than street drugs, Walters said.

Walters said adults should keep track of prescription drugs and throw them out when they expire.

"People just aren't aware that they need to be careful, and so they leave prescriptions in the medicine cabinet and they don't think anything about it," he said.

The report is based on the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, a survey of 68,308 families, and the 2005 Monitoring the Future Survey of 50,000 eighth-, 10th- and 12th-graders conducted by the University of Michigan.

Dr. Terry Horton, the medical director of Phoenix House, which operates nearly 100 substance abuse programs in nine states, said the belief that prescription drugs are safer than street drugs is false.

"These medicines cause dependence and addiction when misused and have the potential to cause death," he said. "We're talking about medicines that are related, pharmacologically, to heroin and have very similar effects."

CBS News/AP, February 14, 2007

That's the conclusion of a report released Wednesday by White House drug czar John Walters that found while teenagers' use of marijuana is declining, their abuse of prescription drugs is holding steady or in some cases increasing.

"The drug dealer is us," said Walters, the national drug policy director, who released the report Wednesday at a news conference in New York. "We have to have a response that keeps that very important fact in mind."

Teens who are being treated for prescription drug addiction agreed.

"It's available and you can get high off of it," said Michael Robin, a 17-year-old who is being treated for addiction to drugs, including Xanax and OxyContin, at a Phoenix House facility on Long Island.

Walters said in some cases teens use the Internet to obtain drugs or to visit Web sites that provide what purport to be instructions for taking safe amounts of various prescription drugs.

Victoria Winebarger, a therapist at the Pathway Family Center in Southfield, Mich., said some of her clients have also used the Internet to research symptoms of conditions including depression and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder so that they can get a doctor to prescribe drugs for them. "That's not uncommon," she said.

Winebarger told CBS News correspondent Sharyn Alfonsi that all but four of the kids in her classroom abused prescription drugs.

"These kids think they're cleaner because of the package they're in," she said.

According to an analysis of national drug surveys prepared by Walters' office, 2.1 million teenagers abused prescription drugs in 2005, the last year for which figures are available.

While their use of marijuana declined from 30.1 percent to 25.8 percent from 2002 to 2006, use of OxyContin, a painkiller, increased from 2.7 percent to 3.5 percent over the same period. Use of Vicodin, another pain reliever, increased slightly from 6 percent to 6.3 percent.

Teens are abusing pain relievers as well as stimulants like Adderall and anti-anxiety drugs like Xanax because they are readily available and perceived as safer than street drugs, Walters said.

"Fifty-seven percent of them say they get them free from friends or they take them out of somebody's medicine cabinet," Walters said in a telephone interview Tuesday.

The report is based on the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, a survey of 68,308 families, and the 2005 Monitoring the Future Survey of 50,000 eighth, 10th and 12th graders conducted by the University of Michigan.

According to the National Survey on Drug Use and Health, marijuana use is still more common than prescription drug abuse among youths 12 to 17 years old.

Three percent, or 840,000, of 12-to-17-year-olds said they had abused prescription drugs in the past month, compared with 7 percent who had used marijuana.

The Monitoring the Future Survey found that the list of drugs abused by 12th graders was headed by marijuana, with 31.5 percent reporting they had used it in the past year. The rest of the top five were prescription drugs — Vicodin, amphetamines, cough medicine, sedatives and tranquilizers.

Teenagers and drug counselors said the popularity of prescription drugs is fed by the belief that they are less risky than street drugs.

"It seemed a lot safer because I knew what they were putting in them," said Sara Johnson, a 16-year-old who is being treated for drug addiction at the Pathway Family Center in Southfield, Mich.

Johnson, who planned to attend Wednesday's news conference, said she abused drugs including Xanax and Adderall before bottoming out and going into treatment.

"I would ask people, 'Oh, do your parents have any painkillers at the house?'" she said. "'Or do they use Adderall?' It was really easy after a while."

Dr. Terry Horton, the medical director of Phoenix House, which operates nearly 100 substance abuse programs in nine states, said the belief that prescription drugs are safer than street drugs is false.

"These medicines cause dependence and addiction when misused and have the potential to cause death," he said. "We're talking about medicines that are related, pharmacologically, to heroin and have very similar effects."

Walters said adults should keep track of prescription drugs and throw them out when they expire.

"People just aren't aware that they need to be careful, and so they leave prescriptions in the medicine cabinet and they don't think anything about it," he said. "Once you tell them there is a hazard here, there are easy steps to take to put these things in a safe place, to monitor them and also to toss them once you've used them."

A Shift In Teenage Drug Abuse (NYS)

New York Sun, February 15, 2007

More teenagers in New York are getting high on prescription drugs than street drugs, according to a study released yesterday.

The trend replicates a nationwide increase in prescription drug abuse, according to the study, conducted by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. According to the study, nearly one in five teenagers nationwide reported abusing prescription medications, making prescription drugs the second most commonly abused illegal drugs among teenagers, after marijuana.

"This is attractive to young people, we found in the study, because they think it's safer," the director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, John Walters, said during a videoconference with reporters convened in Manhattan.

Officials said abuse of prescription drugs among teenagers in New York is most popular upstate. The majority of teenagers steal drugs from medicine cabinets at home or get drugs from friends. In New York City, the three most popular prescription drugs sold on the street are Elavil, Xanax, and Vicodin.

"It's a dangerous epidemic," the editor-in-chief of Seventeen magazine, Ann Shoket, said. Seventeen, which featured a teenager who died from a prescription drug overdose on the cover of its March issue, partnered with the White House to release the study.

New York Press, February 14, 2007

Lock up the medicine cabinet.

A new report from the White House indicates that teenagers no longer prefer marijuana and other illegal street drugs when it's time to get high, showing an increasing preference for prescription pills. Director of National Drug Control Policy John P. Walters is urging parents to be wary of just about everyone, especially your family, since stereotypical drug dealers are not typically the culprits in such prescription drug abuse.

"Parents need to know that teens are turning away from street drugs and increasingly abusing prescription drugs to get high. They should also be aware that suppliers of these drugs might not be sinister characters on the street corner, but are more likely close friends or relatives," said Walters. "Too many young people see popping pills as a painless high."

The report does note that overall teen drug use has dropped 23% over five years, so it's not all suspicious glances at distant cousins.

'The Drug Dealer Is Us' (MET)

Metro, February 15, 2007

MIDTOWN. For Michael Robin, a Long Island teen receiving treatment for his addiction to Xanax and OxyContin, getting the drugs was as simple as a trip to the bathroom.

"It was just everywhere, unfortunately," the 17-year-old said. "You could go to a friend's house and look in their medicine cabinet and you could find something."

Robin, of Oceanside, said he was one of the 2.1 million teenagers who abused prescription drugs in 2005, the last year for which figures are available. A report released yesterday by White House drug czar John Walters found that while use of marijuana is declining, abuse of medications is on the rise. From 2002 to 2006, marijuana use by teens declined from 30.1 percent to 25.8 percent as abuse of powerful painkillers such as OxyContin increased from 2.7 percent to 3.5 percent.

In New York, where the average for overall prescription drug use among teens (7 percent) is below the national mark (9 percent), roughly 181,000 youth ages 12 to 17 reported current use of illicit drugs and one out of every 14 reported abusing prescription drugs in the past year. The problem is even bigger upstate, according to the report, where more than 156,000 teens, or 19 percent, have used pills to get high.

Robin, who is now being treated at a Phoenix House facility on Long Island, said it took an overdose of OxyContin for him to realize he had a problem.

"I actually purchased it from somebody I met after a while of getting it through friends," he said. "It became something that I felt was essential to my life. I became addicted to it."

Walters, who released the report in New York via satellite from Washington, said 57 percent of respondents acquired the drugs without cost, typically from friends or from a medicine cabinet. They're readily available and often perceived as safer than street drugs such as cocaine.

"Because these are medicines and not polluted street drugs, young people have the false view ... that this is safe," he said. "It's not."

DOJ_NMG_0132660

Walters urged parents to monitor prescription drugs in the home and to throw them out when they expire.
"The drug dealer is us," he said.
Other findings
· Next to marijuana, the most common illegal drugs are prescription medications.
· 11.9 percent of respond-ents said they've used prescription pills to get high.

McClatchy Newspapers, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON - For the closest U.S. ally in Latin America, crunch time is near.

Top Colombian officials have hit Washington in recent weeks in a stepped-up effort to lobby Congress for a new multibillion-dollar anti-drug trafficking plan and a free trade agreement that has run into fierce opposition among the Democratic majority in Congress.

Colombian Vice President Francisco Santos met with key Democratic and Republican lawmakers and Bush administration officials during a two-day trip that ended Wednesday. Earlier this month, Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos was in Washington.

Both officials pushed a massive $44 billion anti-drug trafficking effort, informally known as Plan Colombia II. The United States contributed $4 billion in the first Plan Colombia, unveiled in 1999. And now Bogota hopes to obtain a similar amount from Washington for the successor program, Francisco Santos told The Miami Herald Wednesday.

The Colombians have been telling lawmakers the initiatives are crucial to a democratic U.S. ally that has embraced open markets at a time when socialist Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez blasts U.S. initiatives as imperialistic.

But though many Democrats seem supportive of Plan Colombia, they want Bogota to include stronger labor provisions in the free trade deal. Vice President Santos says the Colombians are willing to make concessions once they know exactly what the Democrats want.

"(The Democrats) tell us labor is an important issue but they don't say how," he said. "The truth is it feels like we're chasing ghosts ... Colombia is willing to do what it takes to ease the concerns of the Democrats."

A text on the free trade deal must be submitted to Congress by March 31 if it is to be approved under a special trade promotion authority, which gives Congress the power to pass or reject free trade agreements but not amend them. Peru and Panama are also awaiting ratification.

Santos said that under Plan Colombia II, Washington would provide money for the security side and the Colombians would focus on reforming the judiciary and promoting alternate crops to coca farming.

He said the first Plan Colombia succeeded in bringing down violence in Colombia, which is battling several armed insurgent groups. Kidnappings are down ten-fold in the past four years and the annual murder rate has dropped from 28,000 to 17,000, he said.

The second phase seeks to consolidate those gains, he said. Drug trafficking is still widespread in places like southern Caqueta and Putumayo provinces, where leftwing insurgents are strong.

Colombia also faces a tough sell on some aspects of its counter-insurgency efforts.

Critics say aggressive herbicide fumigation campaigns under Plan Colombia has displaced coca farming to more remote areas but not stopped it, and that the reach of right-wing paramilitary groups and drug traffickers is still too pervasive in state institutions.

A government "peace and justice" program to disarm paramilitary fighters has come under fire from rights organizations that say the terms are too lenient, and that former paramilitary units are resurfacing under a new guise.

Santos says the plan has disarmed 30,000 paramilitary fighters and that the new groups that are taking their place are small and more "gangster-like" than an organized political or military force.

IMMIGRATION:

On US-Mexico Border, Illegal Crossings Drop (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2007

YUMA, ARIZ.

DOJ_NMG_0132661

One phrase sums up both the chief achievement and complaint of National Guard soldiers and airmen posted along this dusty strip of border with Mexico: "Nothing happening."

That's good news for Operation Jumpstart, President Bush's eight-month-old initiative to reinforce America's southern border with National Guard troops until enough border patrol agents are trained. The extra troops appear to be discouraging people from trying to cross illegally.

Apprehensions of illegal immigrants in the Yuma sector – one of the busiest for the past two years and a top target for the operation – have dropped 62 percent in the last four months compared with the same period a year ago. That's the biggest drop of all nine border patrol sectors on the frontier with Mexico and double the average decline. The amount of marijuana seized in the Yuma sector fell 36 percent for the same period.

The figures for the entire southern border – a 27 decline in apprehensions and a 51 percent increase in marijuana seized – are encouraging, experts say.

"If those numbers hold [for the entire fiscal year], that would indeed represent a significant drop," says Luis Cabrera, an expert on transnational justice issues at Arizona State University in Tempe. "We're pretty sure there's a deterrence effect."

President Bush visited this busy crossing point last May to introduce his program to supplement US border patrol agents with National Guard soldiers and airmen for two years (6,000 the first year, 3,000 the next).

Of those, 2,400 are posted in Arizona, which has the two top-priority sectors in the operation – Tucson and Yuma.

"We have had 49 states participate in the border mission in Arizona, with 7,758 [troops] coming through Arizona," says Maj. Paul Aguirre, spokesman for Operation Jumpstart in Arizona. "Roughly 40 percent of the effort is in Arizona."

Moreover, some 500 additional border patrol agents have bolstered the efforts in the Yuma sector this past year, as have added infrastructure – National Guard helicopters, miles of triple fences, lights, cameras, and sensors.

Still, it's the highly visible National Guard troops that most here say are having the biggest deterrent effect. With their limited support roles (they can't apprehend nor arrest individuals), they are freeing border patrol agents from routine duties, such as fence-building and repair, so they can spend more time nabbing illegal infiltrators.

Watching the smugglers watch them

A few miles from town along the dusty levee between the Colorado River and the Salinity Canal, two National Guard soldiers man a station. (The media can no longer identify the soldiers because border patrol intelligence officers have learned that smugglers have placed a $30,000 to $50,000 bounty on their heads.) The two Guardsmen from North Carolina are dressed in camouflage fatigues. They carry M-16 rifles and high-powered binoculars that enable them to see clearly across to Mexico – often to see smugglers looking back at them through their binoculars.

They stand in front of a Chevy Blazer painted in camouflage next to their tent. Their shifts vary, but they are mainly deployed in groups of four for 48 to 72 hours. Two stand watch for four- or six-hour shifts while the other two sleep in the tent.

The North Carolina men, who were previously deployed to Iraq, have been posted here for the entire time.

The days "start to run into each other after a while. We basically observe and let border patrol know what we see," says one.

In the entire four months they've stood here, watching and waiting, they've seen only two families – four or five people in each group – attempting to cross. One of the men says it is difficult to report these people. "I wonder what would make me do that – climb into that icy cold river holding my child above my head? You can be compassionate, but you have to do your job, report them."

In both cases where the Guardsmen observed people attempting to cross, they called the border patrol who arrived within 15 minutes and apprehended the illegal immigrants.

A little farther down the dirt road is another outpost, one of 20 to 60 such sites strategically located according to intelligence gleaned from smugglers at various spots along the Yuma sector's 125-mile border section.

The two Guardsmen manning this post, also previously deployed in Iraq, are from Washington State. These two men – dressed similarly and toting the same weapons – have been here since October.

"We haven't seen anybody in a long time – maybe since November," says the more talkative of the two. "But there's always stuff to do, like we make Crystal Light, sanitize our hands, make sun tea. Talk to the BP and get their input when they stop.

"They," he says, pointing to border patrol senior agent Chris Van Wagenen, "have to put up with driving and air conditioning. We don't."

Mr. Van Wagenen responds that it's because of these highly visible men that the Yuma sector is now apprehending about only 100 illegal immigrants per day, compared with 500 to 600 a year ago.

The Washington Guardsmen's boredom is briefly interrupted by Rosita's catering truck from San Luis, a nearby town. This is the fourth day of servicing the National Guardsmen, according to John Anguian, the driver. These men – and several others along the levy – are thrilled to eat tostadas and refried beans rather than their MREs (meals ready to eat).

Overall, the Guardsmen say they are content with their roles and even praise it as a mission providing good training for Iraq – "We're staying in a tent in the dust – it's a lot like over there."

Close calls with smugglers

There have, however, been some close calls. border patrol agents say that one of the indicators that Operation Jumpstart is successful is that violent attacks on officers are up at the border (a 28 percent increase in the Yuma sector alone).

"We are definitely putting a dent in their pocketbooks," says Van Wagenen, "and they are going to try to intimidate you, resort to violence."

Most assaults are rock-throwing incidents, but there have been other, more-serious incidents. In early January, for example, four armed men from Mexico approached an Arizona observation post manned by a team of four National Guard soldiers, armed with M-16s.

The National Guard left the post as the Mexican gunmen closed in, as their rules of engagement require. The gunmen disappeared back into Mexico before border patrol agents arrived.

The incident has been controversial in that many politicians in Arizona, especially, are calling for the National Guard to become more proactive.

Still, many believe the initiative is beneficial, but wonder how long the operation can be maintained and what will happen if and when the National Guard leaves.

"Once the resources are brought in, you have to not only make the change, but those resources have to stay there to maintain the change," says Doris Meissner, a senior fellow at the Migration Policy Institute in Washington, D.C., and former commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. "You can't simply do an interruption and go back to the status quo ante and expect that it is going to hold."

Professor Cabrera agrees: "To truly gain operational control of the border – to stop unauthorized immigration in the way people speak about – will resemble a major military operation in cost and size of undertaking."

Democrats Hit Visa, Citizenship Fee Raise (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Democrats yesterday said the fee increases for naturalized citizenship and visas proposed by the Bush administration amount to a "citizenship tax" and vowed to fight it, saying taxpayers should pick up the bill for many immigrants.

Some Democrats also proposed a means-tested type of system, where those with higher incomes would pay more for citizenship or other benefits.

"Many in the immigrant community see the increase for what it is -- increasing the cost of the American dream, telling those least fortunate among us they probably need not apply," said Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat.

He and fellow Democrats said the fee increases, proposed last month by U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, will hurt poor immigrants and could force some of them to try coming to the country illegally.

"Don't you provide them an incentive to do an end-around and come here illegally?" Rep. Artur Davis, Alabama Democrat, told USCIS Director Emilio Gonzalez during a hearing held by the House Judiciary immigration subcommittee on the proposed increases.

But Democrats' options are limited. The proposed increases are in the form of an administration regulation, which means once they are tweaked and finalized by the agency some time this summer they will take effect unless both houses of Congress pass a measure blocking it.

The debate goes to the heart of the nation's legal immigration system.

USCIS' budget comes mostly from fees paid by those seeking a visa or citizenship, though Congress has appropriated some money to help with specific projects. Democrats, though, say it's time to consider changing that and having Congress spend money to cover general operations.

Mr. Gonzalez rejected that, saying a fixed appropriation would tie his hands while collecting fees allows him to be flexible -- if more people apply, he gets more fees.

He said immigrants will see almost immediate improvements in services with the higher fees, while without them the agency will return to the days with application backlogs in the millions.

"We're simply not going to be able to keep up with our workload," said Mr. Gonzalez, adding that would hurt the agency's core mission. "We're going to be suffering from a national security perspective."

DOJ_NMG_0132663

Under the changes, applying for naturalized citizenship would cost $595, up from $330, and the cost for processing fingerprints and other biometric information would increase $10, to $80. The cost of some complicated applications would jump by more than $1,000.

On the other side of the ledger, Mr. Gonzalez has proposed eliminating the fee for applying for a visa as a victim of human trafficking.

Republicans generally seemed to support the increases, saying citizenship or the chance to work in America is worth it.

Rep. Lamar Smith, Texas Republican, called citizenship "one of the greatest values in the world," and Rep. Dan Lungren, California Republican, said those who are applying should be the ones who pay.

"Maybe I'm old-fashioned, but I believe one of the marks of responsibility is people pay for what they get," Mr. Lungren said.

Mr. Conyers told Mr. Gonzalez he is not likely to see any money from Congress this year because there are so many needs competing for limited dollars.

But Republicans said Mr. Conyers showed a misunderstanding of the process because USCIS isn't seeking a large congressional appropriation this year. In fact, Mr. Lungren said, Mr. Conyers' argument about competing federal needs makes the argument for why USCIS needs fee increases.

Democrats were also concerned about the effect on poorer applicants, and proposed to keep down the costs on them by charging high-income applicants much larger fees.

Rep. Bill Delahunt put forward the case of a hypothetical wealthy German businessman making $2 million a year.

"I don't mind whacking him," the Massachusetts Democrat said.

Mr. Gonzalez said USCIS already allows a waiver for applicants making less then 125 percent of the poverty level. He said 85 percent of those who apply are granted one.

GOP Lawmakers Peeved At New Bank Of America Credit Card Program (FOX)

Fox News, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers are lashing out at Bank of America Corp. over its new program to offer credit cards to customers without Social Security numbers, saying it creates a dangerous loophole for terrorists and illegal immigrants.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., called for a federal investigation of the program on Wednesday, sending Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff a letter requesting a review of the program.

"After September 11, we were told that money was the lifeblood of terrorists, and that we should do everything possible to block their access to financial resources," Tancredo said in a statement. "Today we are hearing a far different message: Bank of America, it's everywhere terrorists want to be."

The program welcomes applicants without a Social Security number and credit history if they have held a checking account with the bank for three months without an overdraft, The Wall Street Journal first reported in Tuesday editions.

Another Republican lawmaker criticized the program, saying it should be stopped to avoid security risks with illegal immigrant members of the program.

"If an individual wants to get a credit card, they can get that in their home country," Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn., told FOX News.

"This is something that is of deep concern to me, that Bank of America would choose to market to those that have chosen to break U.S. law to enter this country and then they would give credit to them," Blackburn said.

Bank of America stands by its program, saying that it complies with all U.S. banking and anti-terrorism laws. Rep. Ed Royce, R-Calif., said a loophole in a Treasury regulation allows Bank of America to act within the law.

"It's risking our security and it's happening because the administration and Democrats in Congress won't close this loophole," Royce told FOX News.

In 2004, Royce unsuccessfully tried to close the loophole, a provision in the Patriot Act that allows banks to use unsecured forms of identification — like the easily obtained matricula consular cards issued by the Mexican government — to open bank accounts, transfer funds and do other transactions.

"The American public should demand that this loophole be closed," Royce said, calling it a controversial flaw that allows banks to take advantage of U.S. law.

Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., said the program should be reviewed but he's a "little skeptical" that the program will threaten U.S. security.

"I think it bears looking into and obviously if there's something being done to make it easier for terrorists to strike America, we need to close that down," Bayh said. "I think we ought to not be hysterical about it until we get the facts."

DOJ_NMG_0132664

The program was tested last year at five Bank of America branches in Los Angeles. It was expanded to 51 branches in Los Angeles County last week.

In Virginia, The Harm Of An Anti-Immigrant Bill (WP)

By Nancy Lyall And Teresita Jacinto

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

A young mother who wants to support her first-grader and get a better-paying job. A man in his late 50s who has diabetes but no access to health care. A 16-year-old day laborer who is hungry and needs winter clothes. These and thousands of others like them are the people who will be most harmed if Virginia enacts House Bill 2937.

Last month, the House of Delegates voted 70 to 29 that no organization receiving state or local funds "shall use those funds to provide benefits or assistance to ineligible persons such as undocumented immigrants." As volunteers with the Woodbridge Workers Committee in Prince William County, we regularly work with members of the immigrant community and know the disastrous effects a cutoff of state money could have for new immigrants who may lack official residency paperwork.

The immigrant population in Prince William has risen significantly in the past five years in response to the need for construction labor. Because no jobs were available back home, many immigrants are here trying to provide for their loved ones. The growing Northern Virginia economy not only thrives on their labor but also would collapse without it.

Current federal immigration policy provides no legal avenue for their presence, so many immigrant workers cross the border without authorization. Most of these people are hardworking and focused on supporting their families. But if this bill becomes law, not only will immigrants suffer but the organizations that try to help them also will be compromised.

Let's look at the lives of some undocumented immigrants:

One gentleman in his late 50s has diabetes and had no access to health care. We referred him to the Family Health Connections mobile clinic of Potomac Hospital, where he was given advice and medicine to correct his failing health. Family Health Connections is funded by public-private partnerships but also receives significant state funding. Under the House bill, this man would have been denied care and probably become seriously ill. He might have ended up in an emergency room with his care ultimately paid for by Virginia taxpayers.

Then there's the young mother with limited income who wanted to support her first-grader's education and get a better-paying job. She found year-around English classes right in her neighborhood through which she could learn to communicate with her child's school, help her child complete assignments and read simple books. She became a committed student, attending class twice a week. Under the House bill, the group that sponsors the classes would have to deny this mother services or risk losing its nonprofit status.

A 16-year-old Totonac Indian with limited Spanish skills recently arrived from his village in Puebla, Mexico. This young man had no winter clothes and hadn't eaten in three days. We referred him to the Hilda Barg Homeless Shelter, where he was fed and given warm clothes. The Hilda Barg center, which currently provides assistance to all without question, plans to discontinue clothing and food distributions if the House bill becomes law. This would be catastrophic for all who count on the shelter for help, not just undocumented immigrants.

Organizations such as Prince William Action in Community Through Service and the Salvation Army are among those that could be affected if the House bill becomes law. Although the Woodbridge Workers Committee is staffed entirely by volunteers and has never sought or received state funding, this bill would directly affect our work. Churches and other not-for-profit community groups that assist us may withdraw their support. Some of these groups themselves operate soup kitchens, participate in clothing drives, provide transportation or housing, or otherwise assist immigrants. Most community service organizations don't have the resources to implement the onerous regulations required by this legislation. Although the bill stipulates that it would affect only people over age 19, it would surely hurt children the most, as their parents would be denied any assistance.

It is scandalous to us that Del. Jackson Miller, who sponsored this bill, and others would be so callous when it comes to hungry children, those with urgent health-care needs and others who are struggling in this brutal winter. This is the opposite of good public policy. We hope the Senate will rise above the House's cynical political opportunism and soundly reject HB 2937.

TAX:

Merck Agrees To Pay IRS $2.3 Billion To Settle Tax Disputes (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0132665

By Linda A. Johnson, The Associated Press

AP, February 15, 2007

Merck & Co., mired in multibillion-litigation over its withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, has eliminated another legal headache, resolving several tax disputes with the Internal Revenue Service by agreeing to a $2.3 billion settlement.

In announcing the agreement Wednesday, the Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based company said the settlement resolves all outstanding tax disputes with the IRS, covering the years 1993 through 2006. Merck had faced potential taxes, interest and penalties totaling as much as $3.8 billion, but the agreement apparently reduced that amount.

Neither Merck nor the IRS would discuss the reduction.

The IRS said in its own statement that the settlement resolves all issues in dispute for the years 1993-2001.

"It can't be seen as anything but positive" for Merck to resolve the case, said analyst Steve Brozak of WPP Securities.

Merck still has a $1.76 billion tax dispute with Canadian authorities and has filed an appeal with the Canada Revenue Agency that is expected to be reviewed this year, spokesman Raymond Kerins said.

Merck had disclosed both tax cases in November in a routine filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Merck said the Canadian dispute "related to certain intercompany pricing matters."

Tax and accounting analyst Robert Willens of Lehman Brothers said in such cases drugmakers generally sell medicines at low cost to subsidiaries in countries with lower tax rates, which can then mark up the price and keep more profit after taxes.

"This is a constant tug-of-war between the IRS" and companies, Willens said.

He said Merck paid a very high percentage of the amount of taxes in dispute -- about 60 percent -- far higher than the one-third or so that is typical.

"That would suggest Merck must have felt it had a fairly weak case," Willens said.

Merck said the IRS settlement is not expected to materially affect its profit for 2007 because it had previously reserved money to cover those costs. Kerins declined to say how much was reserved and when that was done.

Brozak said the stock price likely did not shift much because the tax dispute is not as significant as other problems Merck is juggling. Those include looming generic competition to key drugs, a limited number of new ones coming to market and more than 27,400 personal injury lawsuits alleging harm from Vioxx -- the former blockbuster arthritis pill it pulled from the market in September 2004 after finding in increased risk of heart attack and stroke.

"How many things can you focus on at one given time?" Brozak said.

Merck said the IRS settlement was in the company's best interests given the uncertainty and cost of potential litigation.

The settlement relates to a subsidiary Merck set up in 1993 in tax-friendly Bermuda with a third-party investor as a way to raise capital.

Merck's November SEC filing states the IRS had notified the company it was proposing adjustments to tax returns related to the partnership; IRS was planning to disallow deductions for royalties and other expenses and to designate as taxable income money Merck reported as loans from foreign subsidiaries, among other things.

In its statement, the IRS called the Merck settlement one of its largest in recent years.

Another drug company, Britain's GlaxoSmithKline PLC, agreed in September to pay the IRS $3.4 billion in what was the largest tax settlement ever.

Associated Press Writer Andrew Bridges in Washington, D.C., contributed to this report.

Merck To Pay $2.3 Billion In Tax Case (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Merck & Co. will pay the federal government $2.3 billion to resolve roughly a decade of disputed back taxes, in one of the largest publicly disclosed settlements between a U.S. corporation and the Internal Revenue Service.

The agreement is the latest such high-profile settlement between the IRS and a corporate taxpayer as part of a general crackdown on tax shelters. In the fall, the IRS announced a $3.4 billion deal with GlaxoSmithKline PLC to settle a dispute over the tax treatment of transactions between the British drug maker and its U.S. subsidiary. And the government has notched court victories in the past year against General Electric Co., Black & Decker Corp. and aerospace-products maker Coltec Industries Inc. over the use of tax shelters.

The agreement between Merck and the government covers taxes, interest and some penalties, settling three separate disputes spanning from 1993 to 2006 that could have totaled at least $3.8 billion, according to Merck's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0132666

The biggest of the disputes involved a complicated transaction dating back to 1993. At the time, Merck set up a Bermuda-based subsidiary with a unit of British bank Abbey National PLC, to which it transferred two lucrative patents for its cholesterol-lowering drugs Zocor and Mevacor. Merck then paid the subsidiary to use those patents. The payment stream allowed Merck to allocate taxable income to Abbey within the partnership, while not comparably reducing the income it reported to shareholders under accounting rules. Because of differences between U.S. and United Kingdom tax laws, Abbey never had to pay taxes on most of that income either, effectively permitting it to disappear between different tax jurisdictions.

The arrangement, internally code named "Project Ryland," for a restaurant near Merck's Whitehouse Station, N.J., headquarters, was the subject of a September page-one article in The Wall Street Journal.

The settlement announced by Merck could be bad news for Dow Chemical Co., which is in litigation with the government in U.S. district court in Baton Rouge, La., over its use of a nearly identical partnership deal. There, the IRS and U.S. Department of Justice claim the company improperly lowered its taxes by roughly $130 million by shifting income to a consortium of European banks. Dow says the arrangement was legitimate financing and is suing the government to retain the money. Dow didn't return a call requesting comment.

Merck said the $2.3 billion settlement represents its expected "final net cash cost" from the pact. The agreement is actually for $2.9 billion, the company said, but $1.2 billion is interest, and therefore tax-deductible, and $200 million had already been paid to the government. Of the total settlement, $100 million represents penalties, which prompted some observers to point out that Merck will still come out ahead.

"It's a huge settlement," said David Weisbach, a tax-law professor at the University of Chicago. But the tiny portion devoted to penalties "means there remains a strong incentive to engage in shelters even if they end up not working. Without effective penalties, they might as well take risky positions."

In an interview, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson defended the agency's approach. Although he wouldn't comment on the Merck case specifically, he said: "Any credible observer would admit that we've strengthened our enforcement in the corporate arena and high-income individuals." He added: "It's not cheap to keep litigating something year after year....You could go for broke on each and every case and litigate it until the end, but that is not sound tax administration."

In a statement, Merck said it decided to settle "so as to remove the uncertainty and cost of potential litigation."

Merck previously booked reserves for the items. It said it doesn't expect the settlement to have a material impact on 2007 earnings, or to take any charges related to the settlement.

NARROW ESCAPE How A Chastened KPMG Got By Tax-Shelter Crisis (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Timothy Flynn, a top executive at KPMG LLP, was driving to a nephew's graduation in May 2005 when he got a phone call from the chairman: The firm faced imminent criminal indictment over tax shelters it used to sell.

Then a different sort of shock. One week later, the chairman, Eugene O'Kelly, learned he had a brain tumor that left him just months to live. Mr. Flynn, a down-to-earth accountant who once led KPMG's human-resources department, was suddenly thrust into its top job, where he faced an urgent task: to somehow persuade the government not to indict. He knew that criminal charges against the firm would probably kill it, as they did Arthur Andersen after the Enron scandal.

Mr. Flynn took a gamble. KPMG had for years stoutly denied any impropriety, calling its tax advice legal. But days after taking the helm, Mr. Flynn met with Justice Department officials and acknowledged that KPMG had engaged in wrongdoing.

He got no promises in return, and the admission could have sunk the firm. Instead, it provided flexibility to the prosecutors, who were aware that the collapse of one of only four remaining accounting giants could harm the financial markets. Two months later, the government gave KPMG a deferred-prosecution deal, holding off indicting if KPMG paid a $456 million penalty and met other conditions.

KPMG now is emerging from what some at the firm call a near-death experience. Last month a judge, satisfied with the firm's reforms so far, dismissed the deferred criminal charge. Mr. Flynn has put in place stronger controls, and a former federal judge now oversees KPMG's ethics and compliance efforts. Mr. Flynn also banned a type of incentive pay that many believe helped fuel the sale of improper tax shelters. For the most part, he has managed to retain partners and clients. In November, he was able to report that the firm's revenue had grown 2% in the fiscal year ended Sept. 30.

KPMG isn't out of the woods. It still faces lawsuits from tax-shelter clients. And though the firm hasn't been indicted, some of its former executives have, and their trial in September could cast the firm in a harsh light. Defense attorneys plan to argue that the shelters had approval from top management. KPMG says, "There's no evidence whatsoever to suggest that the management committee was aware that there was fraudulent conduct involved in the sale of tax shelters."

DOJ_NMG_0132667

A government-appointed monitor of KPMG gives Mr. Flynn a vote of confidence. He has proved to be "the right person at the right time," says the monitor, Richard Breeden, a former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. Flynn grew up in a tightknit family with six children in the Minneapolis suburb of Bloomington. An Eagle Scout and high-school wrestler, he attended the nearby College of St. Thomas, his father's alma mater, and, along with two brothers, followed his father into accounting.

In 1979 he took a $13,700-a-year job in the local office of Peat Marwick & Co., a predecessor of KPMG, eventually impressing superiors with his technical accounting skills and management knack. Frequently described by those who meet him as earnest, Mr. Flynn, says former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt, is like "the parish priest who became pope."

Test of Skills

A test of his skills came in 2002. As Arthur Andersen was imploding after an obstruction-of-justice indictment, accounting firms rushed to snap up its clients and partners. KPMG initially fell behind in this scramble. Mr. Flynn and Jack Taylor, then vice chairmen of KPMG's audit business, refocused the effort. First, they made a priority of signing up Andersen partners, figuring clients would follow their auditors. Then, dividing the country between them, they spent the next three months on the road, meeting with about 1,000 Andersen partners in all.

One, Dan Doherty, recalls the approach. While executives from other accounting firms simply left messages at his home, he says, Mr. Flynn took the time to talk to his wife and showed a "clear empathy for the circumstance we were in." It "wasn't just this mad rush of recruiting.... I never felt I was in the back of the line," he says.

Mr. Doherty joined KPMG. In all, about 200 Andersen partners did. KPMG snagged 395 Andersen clients, second only to Ernst & Young's haul, according to research firm AuditAnalytics Inc.

But soon, KPMG had troubles of its own. The once-staid accounting world had changed, with big firms using their audit relationships with companies to pitch more-lucrative services. Among them were tax shelters: elaborate sets of financial transactions designed to shield income from taxation.

For example, some shelters created paper losses on foreign currencies, which wealthy individuals who bought the shelters could use to offset taxable gains -- despite having never really put any money at risk. KPMG developed a sophisticated marketing operation, including a cold-call center in Fort Wayne, Ind., to push its tax products, according to a 2003 Senate report.

As the Internal Revenue Service stepped up probes of such shelters early in this decade, KPMG's accounting-firm rivals stopped offering them and settled with the government. KPMG sold shelters longer than others and insisted there was nothing wrong with its products, a stance that angered the IRS, the Justice Department and some senators.

Shifting Strategy

KPMG began to shift strategy in early 2004. Under Justice Department investigation, it forced out people who worked on the shelters and started to work toward a resolution with the government. But as the process dragged on, in late May 2005 the U.S. attorney in Manhattan sent KPMG a letter saying an indictment was imminent.

Then came the shock of Mr. O'Kelly's tumor. He stepped down, and the firm promoted Mr. Flynn, now 50 years old. He took over as chairman just three days before a meeting with Justice Department officials set for Monday, June 13.

At 7 a.m. the Saturday before, executives huddled in the Washington offices of law firm Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. Among those there to plot strategy were Mr. Flynn, new deputy chairman John Veihmeyer, and a former federal judge who'd recently joined KPMG, Sven Holmes. KPMG still hadn't made a final decision on whether to admit wrongdoing, or, if so, what form an admission would take.

One adviser, Mr. Flynn recalls, warned that an admission, once made, couldn't be rescinded. Others raised the risk of civil liability. But Mr. Holmes says he told Mr. Flynn bold action was called for, because "you only get one chance to make a first impression in a meeting like this."

All were aware Arthur Andersen had faced a similar decision in 2002. Andersen later had its conviction overturned -- in one sense, a vindication of its defiance. It was a Pyrrhic victory, as by then, partners and clients had fled and Andersen was out of business.

"I think we have to just admit wrongdoing and accept responsibility," Mr. Flynn says he finally told the KPMG group. The firm agreed that, as an executive with no direct involvement in the shelter sales, Mr. Flynn was the right person to deliver the message. Though he was on the management committee when KPMG was selling shelters, Mr. Flynn was at human resources during much of the period and was never a tax partner.

On Monday morning, he attended the meeting with the Justice officials and -- sharply changing KPMG's position -- admitted it had sold shelters that helped people evade taxes. Justice officials basically just listened.

Later that week, after a Wall Street Journal report that the Justice Department was weighing an indictment, KPMG issued a statement taking "full responsibility" for "unlawful conduct by former KPMG partners" in offering tax services. Not long afterward, Justice Department lawyers let the KPMG side know they were willing to discuss a settlement.

DOJ_NMG_0132668

Now KPMG had to fight to retain clients. Executives took to the road for long stretches. Mr. Veihmeyer's wife sent clothes to him by courier as he traveled. Over the summer of 2005, Messrs. Flynn and Holmes contacted more than 100 audit clients.

One was General Electric Co., KPMG's biggest audit client and one that paid it more than $109 million in fees that year, according to AuditAnalytics. Mr. Flynn met with GE directors. According to a person who attended, his message amounted to: "There's some stuff here, it's really ugly, it happened, and here's what we're going to try to do with this situation."

GE stuck with KPMG. A spokesman for GE says it is "pleased that KPMG and its leadership have aggressively addressed the compliance issues raised in the government's tax case."

KPMG was lucky in one way. Midsummer is late in the year for big companies to make auditor switches, because it can take months to negotiate terms of an audit engagement.

Clients weren't the only concern. Many KPMG partners were angry. Any exodus of partners would make it harder to keep audit clients.

Then in early August, a memo purporting to be from unnamed current and former KPMG board members circulated. Saying Mr. Flynn lacked "backbone," it blasted management for admitting wrongdoing and abandoning partners involved. "While the leadership may believe the path to pursue is the survival of the firm at all costs, we don't," the memo said. "The actions being taken will probably result in the demise of the firm anyway."

Mr. Flynn says the memo was "hurtful" and its claims were "lies." To calm partners, he personally reached out to hundreds of them, often singling out younger ones. Michael R. Gervasio, a young tax partner in Chicago, says he was impressed as much by Mr. Flynn's persistence as by what he said. Mr. Flynn phoned eight times over two days before finally connecting with Mr. Gervasio at home at 10 one night. "We really want you to stay," Mr. Gervasio recalls being told. He did.

Later that month, August 2005, KPMG won a new lease on life: The Justice Department announced a deferred-prosecution agreement. Besides the $456 million penalty, it required KPMG to stop selling prepackaged tax products, stop doing tax returns for most individuals, shed its benefits and compensation practice, and submit to federal monitoring through September 2008.

Special Meeting

Mr. Flynn called a special meeting of partners. Such sessions typically were staged. This time, Messrs. Flynn and Mr. Veihmeyer set up computer kiosks so people could submit questions anonymously.

"Why should we trust you guys now?" asked one question at the meeting in Dallas, which had drawn nearly all of the then-1,607 partners. Others asked why the penalty shouldn't be paid just by tax partners. Mr. Flynn said they all had to "sink or swim" together, and a big fine was the price they must pay to "get their firm back."

The firm says that from June 1 to Sept. 30, 2005, just 18 partners left, excluding normal retirements and some forced out because of the tax shelters. One thing that helped keep people aboard was a post-Enron boom in auditing. Auditors now had to do more and take more responsibility -- and they demanded bigger fees to do it.

KPMG also kept most of its clients. From June 2005 through the end of the year, it lost just three companies with stock-market values above $1 billion, according to AuditAnalytics.

Mr. Flynn set about changing how the firm was run. He scrapped an incentive-pay system blamed for encouraging partners to push the tax shelters.

In a two-day January 2006 board meeting, he urged directors to rethink KPMG's governance, and they crafted 14 changes. The head of legal and compliance, currently former Judge Holmes, is now one of the firm's top four executives. The chairman and deputy chairman no longer sit on the nominating committee, limiting their ability to fill the board with their allies. The board now has a lead director who is a counterweight to the chairman.

Mr. Breeden, the monitor, says KPMG has developed a good governance system, "but it needs more seasoning to be sure that it works as well in practice as it should in theory."

Although KPMG reached a $154 million settlement with investors it sold tax shelters to, it still faces suits from several dozen investors who opted out of the settlement. It has been quietly settling some of these.

KPMG remains in a wrangle over its refusal to pay legal fees for former executives who were indicted. In that and other cases, lawyers opposing KPMG say it is a sharp-elbowed litigator, as antagonistic as ever. Michael Avenatti, who represents tax-shelter investors suing KPMG, says, "They interpret court orders in the narrowest sense and to the utmost extreme to benefit their positions." KPMG says it defends itself "as appropriate and in a professional manner."

One former critic is impressed with changes at KPMG. Former SEC Chairman Levitt once called KPMG a "rogue operation." Mr. Levitt, who has offered informal counsel to Mr. Flynn, says that the chairman "stepped into a troubled situation and by sheer strength of personality and character saved that firm from destruction."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Urges Firms To Lobby Free Trade (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, February 15, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday urged the nation's manufacturers to lobby Congress in what he said would be a difficult battle to extend President Bush's special trade authority.

The authority, which expires on July 1, allows the president to negotiate trade agreements that must be considered by Congress on an expedited basis that bars any amendments.

"I think it's going to be a tough fight," Cheney said in a speech to the National Association of Manufacturers. "We're strongly supportive of it. It's very important for us to continue to have that authority, but we're going to need help on Capitol Hill."

On another business topic, Cheney said the president would veto legislation that would make it easier to form unions. Labor activists have said they believe they can get the Employee Free Choice Act through the Democratic-controlled Congress. But they have acknowledged that it might not be signed into law under the current administration.

The legislation would require formation of a union after a majority of workers signed authorization cards. Under current law, 30 percent of workers can request an election to form a union, a process that usually takes from six weeks to six months, said AFL-CIO organizing director Stewart Acuff. Currently, a company would have to agree to allow a union to be formed based on a majority signing authorization cards.

The proposal, which was to come up for a vote Wednesday in the House Education and Labor Committee, would also impose stronger penalties on employers who violate labor laws and allow for arbitration to settle first contract disputes. Leading business lobbies such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce oppose the legislation, saying workers should vote on forming unions by secret ballot rather than signing cards or petitions.

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said employers routinely threaten and coerce employees when they try to form unions.

"The Employee Free Choice Act levels the playing field to give workers a fighting chance to have a union and bargain for better wages and benefits," Sweeney said. "It puts in place real penalties for employers that violate workers' freedom to make their own choice about a union."

In Cheney's brief speech, which was followed by a question-and-answer session, the vice president said the administration was making inroads in a dispute over China's currency policy. U.S. manufacturers contend the Chinese yuan is undervalued by as much as 40 percent, making Chinese goods cheaper in the United States and U.S. products more expensive in China.

Cheney called on the Democratic Congress to make tax cuts permanent, saying it's time for skeptics to acknowledge that tax relief has driven U.S. economic growth. He pushed the president's energy, immigration and health care initiatives that were outlined in last month's State of the Union address, and pledged to work with Congress to reduce the use of earmarks — a common Capitol Hill practice of slipping pet projects into spending bills.

The group of businessmen were especially receptive to his comments on trade.

The administration won passage of the Central America Free Trade Agreement in 2005. But, Cheney said, it was one of the hardest votes he has been involved in during his six years as vice president.

The 217-215 House vote on CAFTA showed how tough it has become to get a trade deal through Congress. It required personal appearances on Capitol Hill by Bush and Cheney and — with Democrats united in opposition — some arm-twisting of wavering Republicans to avert what would have been a devastating defeat.

"Our ability to move forward and to continue to advance the trade agenda that we've had in the past is dependent on having trade promotion authority extended," Cheney said.

Democrats, White House Clash On Trade (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

For a time yesterday, it seemed as if a new bipartisan spirit was flowering between the Bush administration and Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill over trade policy. Until, that is, flowers themselves entered the conversation during a Valentine's Day hearing.

The U.S. trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, told the House Ways and Means Committee that she was eager to find a compromise that would satisfy Democrats demanding stricter labor protections in proposed trade deals with Colombia, Peru and Panama. She cited the benefits of expanded trade, noting that U.S. exports are booming, the economy is growing and unemployment is low.

The chairman of the committee, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) praised Schwab for agreeing to discuss the labor issue, adding his hopes that Congress would soon pass the trade deals.

But then Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs the trade subcommittee, chided Schwab for focusing exclusively on U.S. exports: What about imports? What about the people losing factory jobs as cheap goods flow in from countries where workers, he said, are exploited?

"Imports do matter," Schwab assured him. "They matter to people who went out and bought roses today for their sweetheart, where they were able to buy inexpensive flowers at Safeway or Costco, where maybe a few years ago it would have been much more expensive to buy long-stemmed roses. That's trade."

Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. (D-N.J.) took no comfort from Schwab's point. "Those very flowers come from countries that have child labor and forced labor, and that's why the prices are cheaper," he said. "And if we don't concern ourselves about that, then we are not the country we pretend to be."

That exchange illustrated the significant divide that remains over trade policy, even as Bush administration officials meet behind closed doors with House leaders to try to hash out a compromise.

Democrats, eager not to be painted as protectionists, have in recent weeks toned down their rhetoric, with leaders saying repeatedly that they want to see a new round of trade pacts approved. The Bush administration, keen to win congressional approval for recently negotiated pacts with Peru, Colombia and Panama and intent on securing deals with Korea and Malaysia, has been speaking of compromise on labor protections, the most contentious issue of the debate.

But beneath that amiable talk, substantial disagreement remains over details, according to sources in the administration and on Capitol Hill and as evidenced by the sometimes sharp exchanges during yesterday's hearing.

Previous trade deals, such as the North American Free Trade Agreement, have included side letters that say countries must not tolerate forced or child labor and must allow labor groups to form unions. But much to the consternation of U.S. labor unions, those conditions have been subject to a more lenient enforcement standard than applies to other parts of the pacts, such as those governing the lowering of tariffs.

Democratic leaders have long insisted that trade deals include core labor standards enunciated by the International Labor Organization, an arm of the United Nations: the abolition of child and forced labor, no discrimination in employment, and the right to collective bargaining.

The administration has sought to finesse the issue, discussing with congressional staff members the possibility of adding language in which governments promise to abide by similar standards but with a different kind of enforcement mechanism.

In an interview yesterday, Levin, the trade subcommittee chairman, said that would not fly: "Now, we're in the majority, and they have to step up to the plate," he said. "They haven't so far."

When, during the hearing, Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Tex.) pressed Schwab to embrace ILO standards, she demurred. "I have made a commitment to this committee to try to bridge the divide on labor standards," she said.

Schwab said the committee should be "upbeat" about data released by the Commerce Department on Tuesday showing that the U.S. trade deficit reached a record $764 billion in 2006. Looking beyond that headline, she said, will show that exports are booming to countries with which the United States has trade deals, creating jobs for Americans.

"Upbeat," Doggett repeated scornfully. "You believe that we just need to stay the course."

Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) dismissed talk of low unemployment, asserting that parts of her district have a jobless rate pushing 14 percent.

"In Ohio, workers -- fact or fiction -- believe that their jobs are gone because of the trade policies of our government," she said. What, she asked, was Schwab doing to "ease their worry"?

Schwab acknowledged a perception problem, adding that the majority of Americans have benefited from trade.

"There is a reality," Tubbs Jones replied. "People have lost jobs because of trade."

Just In Time, Senate Passes Spending Bill (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 (AP) — The Senate on Wednesday passed a $464 billion spending bill that closes out last year's unfinished budget business while providing clues about how the new Democratic Congress and President Bush will do business.

The bill, passed 81 to 15, sticks to Mr. Bush's overall budget caps but finds numerous ways around them to add money for education, health care, food inspection, mine safety and other programs favored by Democrats and many Republicans.

It pulls together nine unfinished spending bills for foreign aid and every domestic agency budget except the Homeland Security Department. Its passage winds up work that should have been completed months ago for the budget year that started on Oct. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0132671

In the interim, Congress passed several stopgap measures to keep the government running.

The Democratic chairmen of the appropriations committees led House-Senate negotiations over the first several weeks of the year to produce the bill, which freezes most agencies at 2006 levels.

If Congress had not acted this week, food inspectors, Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and air traffic controllers faced furloughs, while more than 200,000 low-income people could have lost housing subsidies.

The measure now heads to Mr. Bush, who has signaled that he will sign it even though it does not include $3 billion needed for a 2005 round of military base closings. The money would help pay for the redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases and to prepare closed bases for development .

Democrats want to debate that spending next month when Congress considers a White House request for $100 billion for the Afghanistan and Iraq wars. They also want to tack on extras, like $4 billion or so in farm disaster aid, when the appropriations committees debate the measure.

The White House, meanwhile, wants to keep the Iraq spending bill as free as possible from such add-ons, but it is likely to have to accept some Democratic priorities as the price of getting the bill passed.

Then will come the fiscal 2008 appropriations cycle, during which Democrats are certain to transfer some of the proposed $50-billion-plus increase requested for the Pentagon budget, not including war costs, to domestic programs, which are almost frozen under Mr. Bush's budget proposal.

Among the beneficiaries of the measure approved Wednesday is the National Institutes of Health, which would receive a $620 million budget increase, or about 2 percent. The F.B.I. would get a modest $200 million increase in its $6 billion budget, while the maximum Pell Grant for college students would increase by $260, to $4,310.

The rapidly growing veterans health care budget got a 13 percent increase. And United States contributions to fighting AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas would rise 40 percent, to $4.5 billion.

The bill provides increases for underperforming schools and community health centers, and grants to state and local law enforcement agencies. Amtrak's budget would be frozen at $1.3 billion instead of having to absorb a $400 million cut proposed by President Bush.

Senate OKs $464 Billion Spending Bill (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

The Senate yesterday passed a $464 billion spending bill that closes out last year's unfinished budget business while providing clues about how the new Democratic Congress and President Bush will do business.

The bill, passed 81-15, sticks to Mr. Bush's overall budget caps but finds numerous ways around them to add to programs favored by lawmakers, such as education, health care, food inspection and mine safety.

The mammoth bill pulls together nine unfinished spending bills funding foreign aid and every domestic agency budget except the Department of Homeland Security.

The bill provides small but welcome funding increases to agencies that have been limping along at or below last year's funding levels in the four months since the budget year started Oct. 1. Without the measure, food inspectors, FBI agents and air traffic controllers faced furloughs, while more than 200,000 low-income people could have lost housing subsidies.

Democrats put off some costs, chiefly $3 billion to implement a 2005 round of military base closings, for a $100-billion-plus war-funding bill to be debated next month.

The measure now heads to Mr. Bush, who has signaled he will sign it despite unease over the temporary cuts to the base-closing program. The money would help pay for the redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases and to prepare closed bases for economic-development projects and other uses.

The base-closing cuts amount to a shift from the Pentagon budget to domestic accounts, and they are a sign of things to come as Democrats move ahead on the budget front.

Next up is Mr. Bush's $100 billion Iraq and Afghanistan war-funding request, which is widely expected to draw Democratic extras such as $4 billion or so in farm disaster aid when the appropriations committees debate it next month. The White House wants to keep the Iraq funding bill as free as possible from such add-ons, but it is likely to have to accept some Democratic priorities as the price of getting the bill to Mr. Bush's desk.

Then will come the fiscal 2008 appropriations cycle, during which Democrats are certain to transfer some of the proposed $50 billion-plus increase for the Pentagon budget -- not including war costs -- to domestic programs, which are almost frozen under Mr. Bush's budget.

The bill passed yesterday clears away budget work that should have been completed months ago but was delayed because of election-year pressures.

Among the beneficiaries in the spending bill is the National Institutes of Health, which would receive a $620 million budget increase. The FBI would get a modest $200 million increase in its $6 billion budget, while the maximum Pell Grant for lower-income college students would increase by $260 to $4,310.

The rapidly growing veterans health care budget got a 13 percent boost. U.S. contributions to fight AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas would rise 40 percent, to $4.5 billion.

The bill provides increases for underperforming schools and community health centers, and grants to state and local law-enforcement agencies. Amtrak's budget would be frozen at $1.3 billion instead of absorbing a $400 million cut.

Congress Passes Spending Bill; House Clears Way For Iraq Debate (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Congress cleared and sent President Bush a $463.5 billion spending bill that bears the imprint of the new Democratic majority and presages budget battles over defense and domestic priorities.

Veterans' medical services, education and health care will see spending increases even as $3.1 billion is cut from Mr. Bush's 2007 request for military-construction funds to accommodate base closings overseas.

Senate Republicans had protested the cut, but 23 of them joined Democrats on a 71-26 procedural vote Tuesday that sealed passage of the bill, which will dictate spending for the final eight months of this fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

The final Senate vote came late today as the House continued debate on a resolution challenging Mr. Bush's decision to send at least 21,500 more U.S. troops to try to curb sectarian violence in Iraq. The twin events underscore how central defense spending will be to the 2008 budget debate this spring, and how emotions over the Iraq war can make the debate more difficult for both parties.

The administration's $481.1 billion defense budget represents an 11.3% increase, not counting an additional $141.7 billion for costs of the Iraq war and other overseas military operations, such as Afghanistan. By comparison, Mr. Bush's promises just a 1% increase in domestic non-defense appropriations; with passage of the bill now and the resulting effect on 2007 spending, the White House concedes that increase will be half what it said a week ago or 0.5%.

In shaping their budget, Democrats will surely trim from the president's defense request to pay for domestic priorities. The debate is more complicated this year because of the emotions of Iraq, changes in the defense industry, and pressure for emergency funds to meet demands from Gulf Coast states still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D., N.D.) must navigate in a chamber divided by Iraq, and with only a one-vote majority in the absence of Sen. Tim Johnson (D., S.D.), who is recovering from a stroke.

"I've got a 50-49 majority until Senator Johnson gets back," Mr. Conrad says. "Can you imagine holding those 50 on the war costs alone?"

The huge expenditures for Iraq have reflected a major government investment not in the high profile ships, fighters and tanks of past military buildups, but more in trucks, body armor, and communications equipment needed for a mobile Army in this type of war.

For example, Wisconsin's Oshkosh Truck Corp. saw its defense sales rise to $1.3 billion in 2006 from $774 million in fiscal 2004, a 68% increase. As midlevel defense contractors have commanded a greater share of the budget, there is potential competition with larger players such as Lockheed Martin Corp., which takes the lead in new weapons systems such as the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which the U.S. Air Force is trying to fund in part through the president's latest Iraq war supplemental request.

A third pressure point is the aftermath of Katrina, and Democratic promises to do more to help states facing huge reconstruction costs. The administration has opened the door by incorporating some domestic disaster aid into its Iraq supplemental, and that also sets up competition with defense funds.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) said Katrina would be a priority this spring, and housing issues affecting Gulf Coast states reflect larger pent-up demand for more federal action on low-income housing elsewhere.

Antipoverty groups have supported provisions in the bill that would redistribute $460 million in housing assistance, and while some cities will be net losers, supporters argue in many cases idle funds will be put to work.

"The old approach shorted hundreds of local agencies and caused them to cut their programs, even as other agencies piled up millions of dollars in unspent funds," said Bob Greenstein, of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities in Washington. "Under the new approach, such cuts will be avoided and more families in need will be served, because the funds will be distributed far more efficiently."

Senate Belatedly Passes Spending Bill For 2007 (WP)

By Paul Kane

DOJ_NMG_0132673

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Four and a half months after the legal deadline, the Senate gave final approval to a 2007 spending plan that funds almost half the federal government and averts any chance of a government shutdown.

By an 81 to 15 vote, the Senate approved a $463.5 billion measure that Republicans had threatened to block out of pique for being denied a chance to offer amendments. In the end, Republicans gave in and overwhelmingly supported the spending bill, which funds a litany of popular domestic programs through Sept. 30.

Before the vote, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said that his fellow Republicans were not willing to risk a partial government shutdown over complaints about how Democrats were running the chamber.

"This is funding for about half the government," he said. "We've got to get it done and move on."

That acquiescence by Republicans puts off until next month the first big showdown between the White House and Democrats on spending, which will come as part of deliberations over President Bush's anticipated request for additional funds for the war in Iraq.

Congressional Democrats blame Republicans for leaving them a fiscal mess from last year, when Congress approved just two of the 11 appropriations bills and forced them to craft an omnibus bill that would fund a large chunk of the government for the remainder of fiscal 2007.

"Today's action is another step towards cleaning up the fiscal mess left by the 109th Congress," said Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.).

The fiscal year began on Oct. 1, a deadline that Congress almost always misses, but both Democrats and Republicans acknowledge that mid-February is a particularly late time to pass the remaining spending bills. Bush is expected to sign the measure by Friday, when a temporary spending bill expires.

Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) and Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), chairmen of the Senate and House Appropriations committees, reached agreement on the $463.5 billion bill that would eliminate billions of dollars worth of earmarks, the special-interest provisions inserted into appropriations bills usually with no oversight.

The spending plan would maintain funding for most federal agencies at their 2006 level, but it would add billions of dollars in funding for Democratic priorities such as veterans' health care and Pell grants for higher education.

The additional funding for Pell grants would mean an increase of $260 per year, up to $4,310, for students, according to congressional estimates. The National Institutes of Health will have an additional 500 research grants to administer because of almost $620 million in increased funding.

The spending bill does not include the standard cost-of-living adjustment in congressional pay, leaving a rank-and-file member's salary at $165,800.

When the House recently passed what is called a continuing resolution, the Republican leadership protested vehemently that they were not allowed to offer any amendments to the spending measure.

Senate Republicans made similar protests last week when they took up the bill.

Though they backed down on the spending bill, Lott warned that Reid would face an insurrection if he continued to disallow GOP amendments.

"He's trying to turn the Senate into a mini-House," said Lott, a Republican leader.

A Lack Of Will (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

The Senate Republican leadership met behind closed doors this week to ponder Majority Leader Harry Reid's audacious power grab on the massive catchall appropriations bill. They decided they could not filibuster the bill for fear of being blamed for closing down the government, but they still wanted enough votes opposing cloture to make an impression. That would seem a formula for defeat, and indeed it was.

The cloture vote to end debate on the bill Tuesday was 71 to 26, with 23 Republicans -- including the party's two leaders -- voting with Reid. The GOP was accepting a bill that perpetuates earmarks, masks additional domestic spending under the disguise of fiscal responsibility and establishes a precedent of prohibiting the opposition party from amending an appropriations bill.

The Republican defeat would have been a plausible outcome if Democrats held a commanding Senate majority, even as large as their edge in the House. In fact, the Senate divide is 51 to 49, with Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota hospitalized and Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut barely a Democrat. What ails Senate Republicans is lack of principle and lack of will, two reasons they lost the 2006 elections.

But it was not really a CR. It was an omnibus appropriations bill changing money levels.

After the bill passed the House under procedures that prevented any serious attempts at amendment, Republican Tom Coburn of Oklahoma went to the floor as the Senate's leading spending watchdog. He said that "to make the claim that there are no earmarks in this bill is an outright falsehood that the American people should not accept." He added: "There's no transparency with these earmarks. Most Americans will never know how they got there. The lobbyists will know, the members [of Congress] will know, the campaign checks that come from them will know, but the regular American Joe won't know."

Earmarks aside, Coburn declared that it is "a lie" that "we stay within the budget" in the omnibus bill because $3.1 billion in defense funds have been transferred to domestic programs. He correctly predicted that this money will be appropriated for defense again in the next supplemental money bill "for things that absolutely have to happen with our troops."

So, the omnibus actually represents a spending increase.

Finally, an HIV testing program for pregnant women, sponsored by Coburn, a physician, has been eliminated. That looks like vindictiveness toward Coburn, whose campaign against excessive spending has antagonized colleagues on both sides of the aisle. To call his broad-based "baby AIDS testing" program an earmark betrays animus.

But a proposal to restore money for popular HIV testing or any other amendment cannot be offered because of a parliamentary ploy by Reid.

The arcane technique of "filling the tree" with superfluous amendments, first used a quarter-century ago by a Republican majority leader (Howard Baker), prevents any changes from being offered on the Senate floor and has contributed to the degeneration of the Senate as a deliberative body. In his brief tenure as majority leader, Reid has filled the amendment tree twice -- first on the Iraq resolution and now on the omnibus money bill. Never before had this been done on an appropriations bill.

That left Republicans with these options: bow to Reid, or block the money bill with a filibuster as today's deadline for funding the government approached. But Republicans have never quite recovered from their political disaster in the 1995 shutdown of government and do not want a repetition. Thus, Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and Minority Whip Trent Lott, while deploring Reid's tactics, voted for cloture on Tuesday -- the white flag of surrender.

Republican sources say the leadership did not want to hurt senators facing uphill reelection contests in 2008 by risking a government shutdown. That is an admission of weakness by the Republican minority as the new Congress faces its first legislative tests. With only 49 unadulterated Democrats in their seats, Harry Reid showed he could stare down the GOP.

Bush Steps Up Hill Lobbying (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

Even as Congress debates President Bush's controversial proposal to increase U.S. troops in Iraq, the White House has been quietly negotiating with key lawmakers to try to advance some of its leading domestic priorities with the hope of rounding out a legacy now defined by an unpopular war.

Bush has dispatched Cabinet officials to Capitol Hill in recent weeks to kick off talks with both Democratic and Republican Senators and House Members on immigration reform, health care legislation, energy proposals, No Child Left Behind reauthorization and Social Security and entitlement revisions. The campaign began in earnest after Bush's Jan. 23 State of the Union address.

A knowledgeable White House official this week said the administration is lobbying lawmakers more intensely than in recent years, not only because Democrats now control the Congressional agenda but because the window is narrowing to pass Bush's priorities with just two years remaining in his second term. Bush officials also recognize that this year is their best hope to advance controversial bills such as immigration reform, given the politics of the 2008 presidential election already is taking hold.

"It's a harder environment, and there is less goodwill," the White House official acknowledged. "Therefore you have to do more outreach, more hand-holding. And, you don't get as much for it."

Many of the now-majority party Democrats in Congress remain skeptical of the administration, especially after six years of virtual neglect on legislative deal making. And while some Congressional Democrats say any increase in outreach by Bush is welcome, they have yet to be convinced that the White House truly is negotiating in good faith.

"They are beginning to relearn the art of compromise," one Democratic Senate aide said. "But don't expect Capitol Hill to throw open its arms. Bush has burned too many bridges with Democrats."

The obvious skepticism doesn't appear to be deterring the Bush administration, however.

Among those spearheading the discussions with the Hill are Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on immigration reform; Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and Transportation Secretary Mary Peters on energy and climate change initiatives; Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman on budget and entitlement and Social Security reform; and Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt and National Economic Council Director Al Hubbard on health care initiatives.

"They get an A for effort, especially in the last few months," said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.). "I've had more Cabinet members in my office since the first of the year than in the last four years, which I appreciate."

Sources indicate the administration's outreach has touched both sides of the Capitol, but given the political landscape on the Hill, the Senate may provide a better opportunity than the House for White House initiatives given the compromising nature of the chamber, and the narrow political margins that could provide better opportunities for a deal.

Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) said Bush officials have a short period of time to work with Democrats and advance a truly bipartisan domestic agenda this Congress. Wyden has been leading a group of Democratic and Republican Senators trying to negotiate with the White House on reforming the nation's health care system, a move he acknowledges will require tough compromise on both sides.

"There's a real window between now and say late October for bipartisan work on key domestic issues," Wyden said. "But the White House is going to have to move and Democrats and Republicans are open to it."

Bush spent a large share of his annual State of the Union address on his domestic agenda, a break from recent years when he has focused almost entirely on the war on terrorism and the Iraq War. At the time, the administration got mixed reviews from Congress, with some calling his proposals dead on arrival and others offering hope for success.

Even so, the focus on the home front did little to distract a Congress almost entirely centered on the state of Iraq, and Bush's plan to deploy 21,500 more troops to the region. Bush's public approval ratings have continued to hover in the 30 percent range, largely because of his policies related to the conflict, and even members of his own party have criticized his Iraq policies.

The White House official said that even with Iraq dominating the headlines and Congress' attention of late, "the Cabinet can quietly work this other stuff."

Jim Manley, spokesman to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), acknowledged that Cabinet secretaries have been making the rounds on the Hill, but said the president has yet to follow through and play an active enough role working with Congress and its new leadership. Manley said while Bush may have a chance to move some priorities like immigration reform, he will have a tough time finding a welcome audience for some of his other proposals such as health care and Social Security reform.

"There are different conversations going on over different areas, but there's no significant increase in overall outreach to the Hill," Manley said.

Reid was one of a handful of Senators and House Members who went to the White House on Wednesday afternoon to meet with Bush — a session at which Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) planned to discuss the president's proposed supplemental spending request for the war, as well as the future of immigration reform and the Democrats' technology and innovation agenda. Reid also was expected to make clear that he wants and expects Bush to provide regular face time with Hill leaders, and wants substantive meetings that invite an exchange of ideas, Manley said.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), ranking member on the Budget Committee, said he doesn't know what degree of success Bush will have for his domestic agenda this Congress, but he agreed officials "certainly have been communicating." He said he's had several White House Cabinet and sub-cabinet secretary meetings in recent weeks, and also has been engaged in talks on entitlement reform with the administration and Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.).

"Efforts are being made, I know that," Gregg said.

At least on the Bush administration's hopes for overhauling Social Security and entitlement programs this Congress, there may be a heavy lift ahead. Despite the recent outreach, Conrad in a recent hearing with Portman expressed frustration over the state of the White House talks, saying "there will not be a conclusion because then you are only asking one side fundamentally to compromise."

"If both sides aren't prepared to compromise, there will not be resolution during this administration, and that would be a tragedy," Conrad told Portman.

But Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) said that at least one of Bush's proposals is likely to move this year, saying he believes immigration reform — with the White House's recent lobbying — may have its best shot yet at winning the Congressional nod. Martinez, who on Tuesday was en route to a meeting with Chertoff on immigration, said the administration's newfound attention to its domestic priorities gives him confidence that "we can pull together on a common vision for where we want to go."

"They are more engaged than they have been at any time than they were last year," Martinez said. "They are out and about."

Democrats, Bush Should Take 'Yes' For Answer, Start Entitlement Talks (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

It's time for the Bush administration and Democratic Congressional leaders to stop talking about talking about entitlement reform — and actually start talking about reform itself.

There's agreement on both sides that beginning soon, the costs of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid benefits for the baby boom generation will put unsustainable burdens on taxpayers and the economy — and that something must be done about it.

Top administration officials including Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman and White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten all have told Congressional Democrats they want to hold talks on entitlement reform "without preconditions."

A half-dozen specific proposals have been made for bipartisan negotiations on the problem. In fact, a meeting between Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and President Bush was scheduled for Jan. 17 to begin work on a plan hatched by Sens. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

But the meeting was postponed when House Democrats "got skittish," one insider said. And then Vice President Cheney made statements on "Fox News Sunday" on Jan. 14 that Democrats took to mean the administration was ruling out tax increases as part of the solution, and the meeting wasn't rescheduled.

On top of that, Bush — who said back in 2005 that he was "open" to raising the income cap on payroll taxes — said in an interview with ABC on Jan. 30 that "I've got a veto that will prevent [Democrats] from raising taxes." That only confirmed to Democrats that the administration does have preconditions.

This whole situation reminds me of a major turning point during the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962. On the brink of World War III, President John F. Kennedy got two conflicting messages from Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev —one private and conciliatory, one public and hostile. Kennedy decided to take "yes" for an answer, leading to a stand-down.

Democrats ought to take the "everything's on the table" messages they're getting — and keep getting, in public and private — from Paulson, Portman, Bolten and Bush as a "yes" and get on with actual talks about what everyone agrees is an impending crisis that can only be dealt with on a bipartisan basis.

Democrats do feel they've conceded upfront — Conrad told me in an interview that "it is going to take more savings on the spending side than on the revenue side" to solve the problem — but that the administration is refusing to concede in advance that "revenue" has to be increased.

At the same time, while Bush resists raising taxes, Democrats are just as hostile to his proposal for private investment accounts in Social Security. That's even more of a "precondition" on the Democratic side.

Besides distrust and ideology, talks may be complicated by disagreements about the scope and order of talks — and perhaps the shape of the table.

In the House, Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) is said to be enthusiastic about broad-gauge entitlement reforms, but Budget Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.) wants to start with shorter-term budget issues.

In the Senate, Conrad thinks that Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security and health care reform all have to be considered as part of the negotiations even though Social Security reform is conceptually the easiest.

"To me, it just doesn't work" to do Social Security first, Conrad told me. "You can't give people a sense of urgency because the system doesn't go broke until 2017 or 2018 and, frankly, if economic growth continues to be strong, 80 percent of the problem goes away."

It's true that Medicare and Medicare represent five times the fiscal burden of Social Security. On the other hand, if negotiators could agree on a Social Security compromise this year, it could set the stage for more difficult agreements later.

Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) are preparing a Social Security proposal that includes middle-ground answers to that "third rail" controversy — some additional revenues, a private savings system operating on top of (not in place of) guaranteed Social Security benefits, and reducing benefits for future retirees by indexing based on longevity and income.

It's significant that the seniors' lobby, AARP, has declared that it understands Social Security can't be secured without some reduction in future benefits. That's a major new concession that Congress should take advantage of this year.

In 2006, Bush proposed establishment of a bipartisan entitlement commission — an idea Democrats rejected. Now, Sens. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) and Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) are back with commission proposals, but Gregg and Conrad prefer direct talks between Congress and the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0132677

So there is still some need for talks about talks, but the main thing is to get on with real talks. Sen. Reid, call the White House.

Senate GOP Offers Its Agenda (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

Senate Republicans today will unveil their legislative blueprint for the 110th Congress, a seven-point agenda laden with traditional GOP initiatives from tax cuts to a stronger national security designed to redefine them as the party of reform.

GOP Senators, in the minority for the first time in practically 12 years, are hoping the agenda will help guide them back into the majority in just two years. Republicans believe that they lost control of the House and Senate in the 2006 elections because they lost sight of the party's principles and failed to follow through on articulating their vision to the electorate.

Republican leaders will lay out seven "challenges" Congress must address over the next two years, beginning with the war on terror and including fiscal restraint, tax relief, health care, energy security, judicial nominations and immigration reform. Senators do not intend to tick off specific bills they plan to introduce but will discuss their general goals and how to meet them, sources said.

GOP Senators have been working to put together their agenda since early January when they held their first closed-door retreat in the aftermath of losing control of Congress. Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) spent the past two months surveying Senators about priority legislation, hoping to set an outline to guide the party as it seeks to reclaim the gavel in 2008.

"Looking forward, Republicans will once again become the party of big ideas to help solve America's problems at home and abroad," Kyl and Conference Vice Chairman John Cornyn (Texas) wrote in a letter to be circulated to their colleagues today. "We will immediately begin to pursue our agenda and will reach out to Democrats in a bipartisan way whenever possible to accomplish them."

Republican Senators will call for "redoubling our efforts" to maintain a safe homeland and find victory against terrorism. The agenda also calls for restoring smart spending and eliminating wasteful spending, preventing tax increases and continuing tax relief, and expanding health care insurance opportunities and choice. The Republicans also pledge to promote energy security through production, conservation and alternative resources, renew a commitment to fair and timely votes on judicial nominations, and reform the nation's immigration policies by securing the border and restoring "the rule of law."

Sources familiar with the platform said all the GOP Senators had a hand in developing it, released both privately and publicly heading into the first weeklong recess of the Congressional session. Republican leaders anticipate Senators will discuss the new agenda with their constituents over the break and think about specific legislation they'd like to incorporate into the overarching document.

Democrats hold a razor thin 51-49 hold on the chamber, a margin that requires bipartisan buy-in on controversial matters.

With that in mind, Kyl and Cornyn give their Conference high marks for holding firm on their priorities so far this Congress, saying: "We have worked cooperatively with majority Democrats while sticking to our principles and ensuring that the legislation that passes the Senate is based on what is best for the American people, not just narrow partisan interests."

White House Looks For Faster Top-secret Clearances (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — The White House is considering making it easier for people to obtain top-secret security clearances by eliminating some time-consuming background checks, says the Bush administration's point man on clearances.

The goal, says Clay Johnson III, deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget, is to speed up a process that, according to a series of government reports, wastes millions of dollars and endangers public safety by leaving thousands of defense, homeland security and intelligence jobs unfilled for more than a year.

Johnson plans to report to Congress today that the executive branch is making "significant progress" toward clearing a backlog of uncompleted clearance applications that government contractors and others say exceeds 350,000.

Three million federal workers now require security clearances for jobs ranging from routine computer system maintenance to sensitive analysis of spy satellite photos. All require at least a background check of personal and work history, foreign travel and finances. Top-secret clearance currently requires interviews with neighbors, references and current and former spouses.

A committee is considering eliminating interviews with neighbors and character references in cases where a candidate is cleared by other parts of the investigation, such as checks of criminal and financial records, Johnson says. "Do we really need to talk to five neighbors (of a candidate)? Do we really need all the colleges (the candidate attended)?" he asks.

Change 'overdue'

Clearances are "long overdue" for an overhaul, says Rep. Tom Davis, of Virginia, the top Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. Davis' district in the Washington suburbs includes thousands of government workers and contractors.

The delays in approving security clearances cost taxpayers "millions and millions," Davis says, as work goes undone and civilian contractors who already have clearances command higher salaries and big hiring bonuses.

Johnson's report today is required by a December 2004 intelligence-reform law that said 80% of clearance applications should be investigated, granted or rejected within 120 days.

Despite Johnson's claim of significant progress, contractors who supply workers for jobs that require clearances aren't seeing much improvement, says Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, an industry group. Evan Lesser, whose website, ClearanceJobs.com, caters to workers with clearances, says the backlog of uncleared applications is about 350,000 — virtually unchanged over the past two years.

"The system continues to be something that needs adult supervision," Davis says.

David Alston agrees.

Alston, 47, an information specialist from Iselin, N.J., outside New York City, thought he had landed a job late last year working on an Air Force e-mail system.

Alston had experience in the system the Air Force used. He didn't, however, have a current security clearance. To get one would take a year or more, the Air Force contractor who posted the job told Alston. Sorry, the contractor said, he would keep looking.

"It's maddening, unbelievably frustrating," says Alston, who has found temporary work as a limousine driver. "There are a ton of good (government) jobs out there. But if you don't already have a clearance or unlimited time to get one, you can pretty much forget about it."

Contractors pay a premium for workers with current clearances, often offering higher salaries and signing bonuses. That can cost an extra $10,000 to $40,000 per employee per year, all of which gets passed on to taxpayers, Davis says.

Delays in clearances are harming national security, Davis says. As more government departments have hired private contractors to do added work after 9/11, delays often mean some jobs don't get done.

One Pentagon office, the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency, has a more than 540-day backlog, according to a report filed last month by the Senate Intelligence Committee. Congressional and outside panels have criticized the agency, which analyzes images from spy satellites, for previous intelligence failures

Unless they bring a security clearance with them, contractors set to work for any agency also have to get in line. "There's no way (the backlog) doesn't impact on security," Davis says.

Outdated procedures

Critics of the clearance backlog say outdated security requirements are partly to blame.

World War II and Cold War-era rules still require extensive background checks for recruits who were born outside the USA or who have close family members overseas, says Tim Roemer, a Democratic former House member who was on the commission that studied pre-9/11 intelligence failures.

Those rules make it difficult for intelligence agencies to tap first-generation Americans with families in the Middle East, South Asia and other places where background checks are difficult, Roemer says.

"The intelligence community has to go from a risk-averse (clearance) system to a risk-management system," says Roemer, now president of the Center for National Policy in Washington.

The rush to clear the backlog, however, may be producing problems of its own.

Last year, the Government Accountability Office examined a random sample of 50 background investigations for top-secret clearances and found that 47 lacked one or more pieces of key documentation. In one case, investigators failed to pursue information suggesting that one applicant had had extramarital affairs and defaulted on "several thousand dollars" in loans.

In another case, an applicant who was known to have visited relatives "in an Asian country" was unable to supply their names or, in one case, a relative's home city. There was no record that the investigator followed up.

Justice Kennedy: Yes To Judicial Pay Hikes, No To Cameras At High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 15, 2007

In a rare appearance Wednesday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy made an impassioned plea for increasing judicial salaries and against allowing cameras in the Court.

DOJ_NMG_0132679

The failure of Congress to give federal judges meaningful raises in recent years is "threatening the excellence of the judiciary," Kennedy said, adding that the traditional linkage between the salaries of judges and members of Congress "has hurt the judiciary very badly."

The Judiciary Committee says Kennedy's appearance marked the first time "in modern history" that a sitting justice has testified before the committee on legislative matters.

As for cameras in the Court, Kennedy said more than once, "We don't want it!" to the committee, whose ranking Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill last month that would require cameras at Court proceedings. "Please, senator," Kennedy continued, pointedly urging the Senate not to introduce the "insidious temptation" for justices to shape their comments and questions from the bench into catchy sound bites.

Kennedy has made similar points in the past, but his impassioned tone before the senators reached a level he usually reserves for students he lectures about the rule of law. The topic for the hearing was billed as "judicial security and independence," but the two-hour session ranged far and wide in subject matter.

Kennedy said that when the committee first asked Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. if a justice could testify, it gave the Court "some pause." But the justices decided it was worth doing. "This is an important time for the judiciary," Kennedy said, making it clear that the salary issue was foremost.

While recognizing "the intangible rewards of public service," Kennedy said the current salaries are undermining the ability to recruit judges from "the finest ranks of the practicing bar." Current pay for federal district court judges is $165,200, appeals judges are paid $175,100, associate justices earn $203,000, and the chief justice gets $212,100 a year. He angrily noted that Supreme Court law clerks often earn more than justices the first year after they leave the Court.

Justice Stephen Breyer, Kennedy said, told him recently that the ability to teach was another intangible benefit of being a federal judge. But Kennedy said that, ironically, judges -- whose pay used to exceed that of professors -- are being lured off the bench into academia. Without mentioning his name, Kennedy cited David Levi, who announced in January that he will be leaving his post as the chief judge of the Eastern District of California to become dean of the Duke University School of Law.

Committee Chairman Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said he had already introduced a bill calling for a cost-of-living increase for judges, and he agreed with Kennedy that congressional reluctance to give judges raises without also enacting raises for themselves should end. "The courts should not be held hostage to Congress," Leahy said.

Specter also pledged that legislation to fix the pay situation would pass in this session of Congress.

Specter went on to urge Kennedy -- and through him, the full Court -- to see the wisdom of requiring cameras in the Court, telling the justice that "the court's functions ought to be better understood." But Specter also linked his campaign for cameras with his longstanding grievances about the Court's recent run of overturning acts of Congress. Specter singled out, as he often does, the Court's 2000 decision in United States v. Morrison, in which the Court struck down a part of the Violence Against Women Act. Allowing cameras to broadcast oral arguments, Specter suggested, might help the public comprehend rulings like Morrison.

In his reply, Kennedy, with remarkable frankness, pushed back against Specter's point, telling him that linking the Morrison case with the need for cameras was "a non sequitur . ... It doesn't follow."

Kennedy acknowledged that the Court "probably should do more in the way of teaching" about its workings but said camera access was not the way to do it. With fervor, Kennedy said oral arguments are "a way of using the attorney to have a conversation with ourselves and with the attorney" -- a dynamic that would be ruined by the presence of cameras.

"We are judged by what we write," Kennedy said, not by questioning during oral argument.

Specter seemed taken aback by Kennedy's strong resistance. If Congress did pass his bill, Specter said in a conciliatory tone, "it would be our opinion," which could then be overtaken by "your opinion." Specter did not explain the comment.

On another subject, Specter asked Kennedy to account for the Court's reduced docket of argued cases -- 75 to 80 per term, or roughly half the number it was deciding 20 years ago. Kennedy said he was somewhat mystified himself why the Court was not agreeing to resolve more conflicts between the circuit courts of appeal. But he said the dearth in recent years of new and complex federal statutes -- which often generate multiple cases -- is one possible explanation for the smaller docket. Another, he said, is that "we understand the boundaries of the administrative state," requiring fewer decisions on deference to executive agencies and other administrative law issues.

Kennedy did note that the Court had recently granted review in a batch of new cases, which he said signifies that "we're climbing back" toward a docket closer to 100 cases per term.

Security Needs Swell Federal Work Force (FEDTIMES)

By M.Z. HEMINGWAY

Federal Times, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132680

The ranks of federal employees will grow again under President Bush's proposed 2008 budget. In all, the budget proposes a net increase of 13,000 employees in 2008.

Much of the hiring would be for homeland and national security programs: border protection, intelligence, military support and counterterrorism, among others.

The Homeland Security Department's Customs and Border Patrol would get money to hire an additional 3,000 Border Patrol agents.

And Customs and Border Patrol would get 300 more CBP officers to manage ports of entry. That number should be several thousand higher to meet staffing needs at ports of entry, said Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union.

"The relative handful of additional positions for CBP officers contained in this budget proposal pales in comparison to the pressing need for more staffing at the nation's land, air and sea ports of entry," she said in a statement.

Homeland Security's Citizenship and Immigration Services is seeking an additional 600 adjudication and support employees to process applications for immigration benefits and services. There also are increases for aviation and transportation security.

The Commerce Department has plans to hire 3,400 employees. Of those, 985 would go to the Patent and Trademark Office to help reduce the time it takes to process patent and trademark applications, which has been increasing. And the Census Bureau would boost its ranks by 2,200 as it prepares for a practice census in 2008 and begins opening field offices for the 2010 census.

The Health and Human Services Department is seeking more than 400 additional employees for the Food and Drug Administration's program on generic-drug safety, another 400-plus employees to fight bioterrorism and prepare for pandemic influenza at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and another 100 staff at health care facilities run by the Indian Health Service.

The Justice Department asks for 231 new FBI counterterrorism and intelligence agents, but the overall department work force will decline, mostly at the FBI and federal prison system.

The Transportation Department's Federal Aviation Administration plans to bring on an additional 400 personnel for the air traffic control and safety work forces and to help with contract oversight.

But some agencies would lose employees. The biggest loss would be at the Agriculture Department, which would lose about 4,700 staff positions.

The Forest Service would lose 2,126 staff, a cut of $363 million. "We'll most likely manage reduction through natural attrition and by not bringing on seasonal workers," said Forest Service budget director Lenise Lago.

Bush proposed a cut of 2,000 full-time employee equivalents at the Natural Resources Conservation Service. But agency spokesman Terry Bish said the numbers reflect the lack of a new farm bill, through which the agency is funded. The current farm bill expires this year.

"We need to have a farm bill before we can put a real [employment] number out there, and it's in negotiation right now," Bish said.

Generic Drugs Law Plans Threaten Makers (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Christopher Bowe

Financial Times, February 15, 2007

Big pharmaceutical companies are facing a barrage of legislative proposals that could have a dramatic impact on the industry's future earnings power and open doors to one of its biggest threats: generic drug manufacturers.

A proposal set to be unveiled on Wednesday by Hillary Clinton, the Democratic presidential hopeful, and a bipartisan group of lawmakers would allow generic drugmakers to manufacture cheaper versions of biotechnology drugs produced by companies such as Amgen and Genentech.

The proposal, which aims to cut the cost of high-priced biotech drugs, would empower the Food and Drug Administration, the US chief drug regulator, to approve the generic versions of biotech drugs, also known as follow-on biologics. Opponents, led by the Biotechnology Industry Organisation (Bio), say the proposal raises safety questions and threatens to hamper the willingness of branded biotechnology companies to innovate.

"I think it is natural that those who pay for healthcare – whether it is the government or insurance plans or individuals or employers – are looking for savings. What we have to be careful about is that we don't put the savings cart before the safety horse," says Jim Greenwood, chief executive of Bio.

Although the proposal was introduced and failed to pass under the Republican-controlled Congress, some analysts say increasing pressure from voters about the high cost of drugs could give new impetus to proposals that might strengthen the generic industry and lead to cheaper drugs.

A separate effort by a bipartisan group of lawmakers in the Senate that would prohibit big branded drugmakers from paying generic rivals to stay out of their markets is also gaining traction. If passed, the law would close the door on a practice that some regulators have complained allows branded drugmakers to thwart competition and keep drug prices artificially high.

The fight between branded drugmakers, including biotechnology groups, and generic drugmakers centres around two issues: the requirements determining how quickly a so-called biogeneric is approved, and what exactly constitutes a generic version of a biotech drug.

Both issues stem from branded drugmakers' argument that biologic drugs are reproductions of human proteins, whose structures are complex, never clearly defined and dangerously variable in their production from company to company. Biologics are made by using living cells that are genetically triggered to produce a specific protein identified to help an illness.

The generic drug industry counters that it is not as complex as biotech drugmakers contend and that they can safely produce their own "generic" versions of the branded biologics to treat disease. However, they add that in order to be able to offer them at lower-cost generic prices the US regulators must give them a fast-track approval process.

Generic versions of traditional pharmaceuticals are approved without the need for long, expensive clinical trials, but biotech drugmakers argue that the variability in producing proteins from live cells warrants that generic drugmakers should prove in expensive clinical trials that their protein is equivalent.

Last year, European regulators laid guidelines for approval of follow-on biologics. But without new legislation in the US, many analysts estimated that biogenerics might not reach the world's biggest drug market until at least 2010 as the FDA carefully worked to codify rules on how to approve follow-ons to biotech treatments.

Legislation Calls For Cheaper Biotech Drugs (USAT)

By Julie Schmit

USA Today, February 15, 2007

Congressional support is building to bring generic competition to life-saving biotech drugs that can cost thousands of dollars a year.

Legislation introduced Wednesday in the House and Senate would give the Food and Drug Administration the ability to approve cheaper copies of biotech drugs. Biologics, such as insulin and cancer drug Herceptin, are based on living cells, while traditional drugs are made from chemicals.

But biologics have been immune from generic competition partly because the FDA doesn't have authority to approve copies.

Sponsors of the legislation include Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y.; Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.; and Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

The proposal is likely to face opposition from biotech companies. They say true generics aren't possible because biologics come from complicated living organisms. Small manufacturing changes can also produce significant changes in final products, they add.

Biotech supporters also say that the FDA should require generic makers to do rigorous testing to prove to the agency that the copies are safe and effective. That usually isn't required for generic versions of traditional drugs. Such tests make up the bulk of the estimated $1 billion needed to bring a biologic to market, says James Greenwood, CEO of the Biotechnology Industry Organization.

The legislation says the FDA could approve "comparable" copies without rigorous testing if the FDA is satisfied that they would produce the same effects in patients.

Despite the measure's bipartisan backers, Citigroup analyst Paul Heldman said in a research note Wednesday that its passage in 2009 is more likely than this year.

Even with a new law, biologic copies are not likely to be as cheap as traditional generics, says Eric Bolesh of consulting firm Cutting Edge Information.

Small Business Administration Scolded For Katrina Response, Disaster Plan (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132682

WASHINGTON — Poor planning, staff training and logistics hampered the Small Business Administration's response to the 2005 Gulf Coast hurricanes, resulting in a backlog that reached more than 200,000 loan applications, the Government Accountability Office said Wednesday.

In a 41-page report on the beleaguered agency, the GAO cited recent improvements under new Administrator Steven Preston but said the SBA still lacks a timetable for completing a disaster management plan. It scolded the agency for not relying more on simulations and models of catastrophes.

Asked if the SBA is prepared for the next big disaster, the GAO's William Shear told the House Small Business Committee, "We don't know yet."

The SBA came under heavy criticism in the months after Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans and the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, 2005. Small businesses, homeowners, members of Congress and even some agency employees complained about a computer system that broke down repeatedly and restricted access to a small number of staff even when it was running. Former administrator Hector Barreto resigned in April.

Preston said Wednesday that vast improvements have been made to the computer system. He said the agency has 2,200 staffers in its disaster loan program, compared with about 800 before Katrina. Another 750 are trained and able to respond within 48 hours.

The average processing time has been reduced from 74 days to 14, and 98% of approved applicants have received low-interest loans or chosen not to borrow, thanks in part to a streamlined case-management system. "We are now able to connect a loan and a document to a face and a story," Preston said.

That was disputed by Donna Colosino, co-owner with her husband, Matt, of a small power equipment company in New Orleans. Their company was swamped by more than 12 feet of water when a nearby levee failed after Hurricane Katrina. She said they have received only $10,000 of their approved $250,000 loan but must provide receipts up to the full amount and will soon be required to make payments on it.

In New Orleans, she said, such a story "wouldn't raise an eyelash." Lawmakers, however, said they would demand answers from the SBA within two weeks. Her story, said Rep. Charles Gonzalez, D-Texas, "could be very, very representative of what's going on out there."

"They're still being passed from one case manager to the next," said Rep. Nydia Velázquez, D-N.Y.

The SBA has approved 160,000 of 422,000 applications for a total of $10.8 billion, with about 22,000 still pending. More than half the applicants were turned down, mostly because of poor credit or projected inability to repay. In most of the pending cases, homeowners or businesses haven't decided on their next move, Preston said.

Even so, local banks are getting more business from storm victims who have given up on the SBA. Their interest rates are higher than the SBA's usual 3%, but "The businesses need the cash more than they need the low cost of capital to survive," said Edward Francis, chief commercial officer of Hancock Holding of Gulfport, Miss.

Colosino could have gotten a bank loan "within weeks after the storm," Francis said.

Serving In The House And Keeping Up With A Household (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

In this new, kid-centric House of Pelosi, Rep. Debbie Wasserman-Schultz is not a bit self-conscious about trying to raise her young family from afar while serving in Congress.

It didn't faze the Florida Democrat, for instance, to be pulled out of a meeting with Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) in order to arrange a ride for her son to baseball practice -- in Florida. (She got her dad to do it.) Nor when she conducted Saturday business meetings at her daughter's dance studio.

Not even when she volunteered to lead her daughter's Brownie troop -- and then planned all the meetings around the congressional schedule.

Although a record 87 women serve in Congress today, there are still only a handful who are faced with balancing the pressures of politics and mothering young children. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi did not run for Congress until her children were grown, often the case with women who have served in Congress. The House floor may have been packed with kids on the day the members were sworn in, but most were the offspring of the gentlemen of the House.

Among the few female members with little ones: Freshman Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) resolved her balancing act by moving her 3-year-old son to Washington, where he attends the House child-care center. Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), a single mom, opted to leave her 4-year-old daughter back in Ohio, where extended family can care for the girl, a spokeswoman said.

Wasserman-Schultz, 40 and in her second term, may have it the roughest, trying to be hands-on mother 1,000 miles away to three children -- 7-year-old twins and a 3-year-old. She says her husband, a banker, does heroic work to hold the family together -- but an enormous amount of logistical planning falls to her.

She is running the Brownie meetings, she said, because "I don't want my kids to feel I didn't make every effort." And she says her children have indeed noticed that the House is now working a five-day week and that she's around even less.

Wasserman-Schultz was forced to defend her choices when she first ran for Congress in 2004 and her female opponent suggested that Wasserman-Schultz should not be elected because she would not have enough time to devote to Congress because of her children.

"She was trying to make me look bad," Wasserman-Schultz said.

Now Wasserman-Schultz proudly incorporates her response to the complaint in her speeches: "I may not always have a pen in my purse, but I always have crayons."Taking Up the Torch for the Late Lawmaker

The day before Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.) died of cancer this week, he reintroduced legislation commonly known as a "Patients Bill of Rights" with Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), six years after their last alliance on the issue went up in flames.

Norwood -- long a proponent of giving patients the right to sue health plans -- first introduced the measure in 1998. In 2001, he teamed up with Dingell on a different version of the bill, but it lost Democratic House support when Norwood abruptly jumped ship and agreed to a GOP compromise to avoid a presidential veto.

Dingell said yesterday that Norwood "was a friend and a decent guy, and if this is what he wants, I'm going to try and do it for him."

Last month, Norwood wrote an opinion piece published in Georgia weekly newspapers stating: "There is no reason we can't pass the original, uncompromised bill with a veto-proof majority. . . . If the Democrats can use their new majority to pull that off, they will and should score big with the public."Frankly, Never Short on Quips

Rep. Barney Frank (D), the outspoken liberal congressman from Massachusetts, last week got a little personal with North Carolina conservative Rep. Patrick McHenry (R) -- with whom he has clashed before.

In a tense exchange on the House floor about whether Pelosi should get a government plane to commute to California, McHenry demanded to know why Congress should allow "one person to use a 737 for a $300,000 transcontinental flight." As an angry Rep. Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.) stepped up to defend Pelosi, Frank unexpectedly went to a microphone and shouted out a reference to the old TV show "Fantasy Island" and its 3-foot-11 character, Tattoo.

"I just wanted to explain I hadn't really been expecting to be here," Frank bellowed to startled members. "But as I was walking by I thought I heard someone yelling, 'Da plane, boss, da plane,' " Frank said, mimicking what Tattoo would shout on the show.

The floor broke into distinct but uneasy laughter, as many realized Frank was referring to McHenry's diminutive height. A spokesman for McHenry later called Frank one of the "sharpest minds on Capitol Hill" and said he was sure Frank was just trying to lighten the moment.

Frank explained: "When I invoked one of the great moments in American cultural history . . . I did have Mr. McHenry in mind. I was inspired by his total persona and all of its aspects."Fighting Global Warming, One Office at a Time

Here's how it works: By contributing $642 to two renewable-energy projects in his home state, Welch will offset his offices' use of old-fashioned energy -- and therefore, theoretically, make no net contribution to greenhouse gases.

Welch figured energy used at his offices necessitated the emission of 56 metric tons of carbon a year (the equivalent of 10 cars on the road) and calculated the cost to offset the emissions.

Since he is forbidden to use funds from his federal office budgets, Welch will pay the $642 out of pocket. "We're prohibited from having expenditures that would clean the air," said the lawmaker who aims to fix that.

Welch has introduced legislation to authorize congressional offices and federal agencies to account for their environmental impact through such offset programs.Honoring Young Ted at 75

Hard to imagine: The youngest of the Kennedy clan, the scion who glided into Congress in 1962 at age 30 to complete the term of his brother who was elected president, will turn 75 this month. To celebrate, 750 former aides and politicos will honor (and roast) Sen. Ted Kennedy tomorrow night at the reunion of sorts in Russell Building's Caucus Room. This is only the second time the staff has gotten together -- first for his 25th anniversary in the Senate, now for his 45th.A Catering Lawyer Who Can Parse House Ethics Rules

Just when you thought there couldn't be any more exceptions to the new House ethics rules, comes the "toothpick" caveat -- and a business to capitalize on it.

While members and staff are prohibited from receiving gifts or meals from lobbyists or those who employ them, they may accept "food or refreshments of a nominal value" such as the kinds of food offered at receptions. Sean Clancy, a tax lawyer at Patton Boggs who owns a year-old catering business, quickly sent an e-mail last weekend to 1,000 prospective clients touting Just Fresh Bakery Cafe & Catering, and its "toothpick rule-compliant" menu.

"We don't stick a toothpick in a sandwich and say it's not a meal," he explains. "These are bite-size pieces. We want to stay within the letter of the law, and at the same time point out the ridiculousness of it all."

There's Much Huffing Over Puffing On Hill (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Smoking has become the hot topic on Capitol Hill.

Who is, who isn't, and where the lawmakers puff -- closeted or not -- are among the whispers in the hallways and on the presidential campaign trail.

There have been at least 35 news reports about Sen. Barack Obama's long battle with a cigarette habit, and how the Illinois Democrat has been chewing Nicorette to kick that habit as he runs for president.

And in the latest installment, staffers for Rep. Keith Ellison tattled to Capitol Police that Rep. Tom Tancredo was smoking a cigar inside his congressional office.

"We already have the biggest air-purifying unit you can get, and I would be happy to try to make sure that it's even less odiferous around here, but I'm not going to stop because we still have the right to do so," Mr. Tancredo, Colorado Republican, told The Washington Times.

An officer investigating the report informed Mr. Ellison, Minnesota Democrat, that smoking is allowed in the private offices, the Hill newspaper first reported yesterday.

Calling his office in the Longworth building "our own little castle," Mr. Tancredo said he would have preferred a personal visit from his next-door neighbor.

Mr. Tancredo, seeking the 2008 Republican nomination for president, added, "He can get an air-purifying system for his office."

Mr. Ellison's office did not respond to calls for comment yesterday, but spokesman Rick Jauert told the Hill that he first called the Capitol superintendent when he noticed smoke "coming through the walls." That office referred Mr. Jauert to the police, and he informed his boss that he had made the report.

Mr. Tancredo said he has never met Mr. Ellison, who has gotten his fair share of headlines.

In November, Mr. Ellison became the first Muslim in recent times to be elected to Congress. Then, Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican, protested Mr. Ellison's use of the Koran for his swearing-in. In a letter to constituents, Mr. Goode complained that if strict immigration laws are not enacted, "more Muslims" will be elected and will demand "the use of the Koran."

The dust-up created national headlines and highlighted philosophical differences on immigration policy.

Mr. Tancredo noted that the only time he has even referenced Mr. Ellison was to defend his use of the Koran.

But the Colorado congressman has a friend in Mr. Goode, who delivered a gift to Mr. Tancredo's office after learning of the cigar incident.

Mr. Tancredo said that he knew the envelope from Mr. Goode contained a cigar, but that he hadn't yet read the letter. He opened the note and read it to a reporter for The Times.

"We have a policy in my office of allowing one to smoke from tobacco country if he or she so chooses," Mr. Tancredo read from the letter, pausing to stifle laughter. "We extend this courtesy to an outstanding presidential candidate. Hope you can use it in your office. If you can't, come on up to mine."

Others, including Minority Leader John A. Boehner, have felt like pariahs lately, especially since Speaker Nancy Pelosi banned puffing in the Speaker's Lobby off the House floor.

Mr. Boehner, a chain-smoking Ohio Republican, told reporters gathered for the Washington Press Club Foundation dinner last week that he isn't fond of Mrs. Pelosi's decision.

"We can still smoke out on the balcony. But, Nancy, it was 20 degrees out there. I think I want a seat on your global warming committee," he told the California Democrat.

As for Mr. Obama, reporters seem obsessed with him kicking the habit.

Maureen Dowd of the New York Times opened her latest column thus: "Barack Obama looked as if he needed a smoke and he needed it bad."

DOJ_NMG_0132685

After a long Chicago Tribune story about Mr. Obama's smoking, ABC News did a piece on its Web site about Michelle Obama demanding that her husband quit those Marlboros before embarking on a rigorous campaign for the White House. Both articles quoted numerous health advocates and pundits analyzing whether a candidate should admit to such vices.

Reporters trailing Mr. Obama to Iowa last weekend made sure to note this comment by the presidential hopeful: "I've been chewing Nicorette all day long."

An article on Slate.com last month even speculated that should Mr. Obama quit, he would lose his trademark deep voice -- identified by the Web site as "authoritative but comforting, rich and resonant and wise."

FEDERAL DIARY; Working, Or Not, With Everyone's Safety In Mind (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Washington weather has long vexed the directors of the Office of Personnel Management and yesterday's gray icy slush was no exception.

Linda M. Springer, the OPM director, was up at 4 a.m., listening to a last round of reports on the weather, road and mass-transit conditions. As with her predecessors through the years, she was trying to look out for federal employees and keep the government open for business.

"When will it be safe for federal workers to commute into their offices? That is the bottom-line question for me," Springer said yesterday.

Springer began sorting out her options at 9 p.m. Tuesday after she received her first reports on the sleet and ice storm moving into the region. That same day, the OPM had closed the government early, at 2 p.m., after weather forecasts showed it might be wise to get as many employees as possible off roads before dark.

After the Tuesday night call, Springer asked the staff at the OPM's situation room to develop information that would help her choose among three options for the next day: open the government on time, but with an unscheduled leave policy in effect; open late with unscheduled leave; or not open. (Unscheduled leave is a way for employees to take time off without prior approval from a supervisor.)

Early yesterday, she chose to open the government after a two-hour delay, after hearing predictions on the path of the storm and assurances that roads and mass transit "would be in much better shape than at the normal start time."

With a two-hour delay, many employees were more likely to have safer commutes, she decided. "We're saying you [the public] can count on normal functions and services after that two-hour delay, but individuals can recognize their own individual situations at their residence and their commute area to make a decision to take a day of leave," Springer said.

Although federal agencies did not have head counts of how many employees came to work yesterday, officials acknowledged that some offices were thinly staffed.

"It's quiet," Nicol Andrews, a spokeswoman for the Agriculture Department, said. "But there are plenty of us around to make sure the trains are still running."

The judgment on whether to open or close the government can be easily second-guessed by employees, especially when schools close. Yesterday, on Federal Diary Live at washingtonpost.com, employees posted messages saying their commuter buses had been canceled or were running only on emergency routes. Others said that downtown streets were not properly cleared for morning commutes and that slippery streets were sometimes dangerous to cross.

With about 300,000 federal employees in a region that stretches from southern Maryland to West Virginia, the OPM cannot make weather-related decisions lightly because of economic and workforce productivity concerns. The federal payroll is about $76 million a day in the Washington area, and some companies and nonprofit groups take their cues from the OPM on when to open for business.

February, in particular, seems to be a troublesome month for OPM directors.

In 2003, a huge snowstorm, measured at 16 inches to 24 inches, walloped the region over the President's Day weekend, closing federal offices for a day. In 2005, the government opened on time Feb. 24, only to close at 1:15 p.m., after road conditions took a turn for the worse as a storm dumped six inches of snow in some parts of the region.

As the then-acting OPM director, Dan G. Blair, said: "I wish it was a pure science, but it is not. It's always a best guesstimate."Whistle-Blower Bill Approved

A bill that would expand whistle-blower protection rights to federal employees in intelligence agencies and federal contractors was approved yesterday by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. The vote to send the measure to the House floor was 28 to 0.

DOJ_NMG_0132686

Parts of the bill are designed to clarify congressional intent as to what type of whistle-blowing is protected. An amendment, approved on voice vote, would permit whistle-blowers to take their cases to the U.S. appeals court in their area, ending the sole jurisdiction of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, not far from the White House.

Advocates for whistle-blowers argue that the federal circuit court has interpreted the laws in a way that makes it almost impossible for federal employees to defend themselves from reprisals when speaking out on waste, fraud and abuse.

"The Government Reform Committee lived up to its name today," said Tom Devine, legal director for the Government Accountability Project, an advocacy group. "Now it is up to the House leadership to do the same thing."

Minimum Wage, Minimum Tax Cuts (NYT)

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

In the coming week, the House is expected to pass a bipartisan bill aimed at scaling down the unwise tax cuts that the Senate has demanded in exchange for raising the federal minimum wage. The House measure contains only modest tax cuts, worth $1.3 billion over the next 10 years, and is focused on the small businesses that are most likely to be harmed by a higher minimum wage, like mom-and-pop restaurants. We would have preferred a straightforward minimum wage increase. But the House bill is a reasonable response to the Senate's refusal to move forward without tax cuts.

Whether senators will find the moral clarity to see it that way is another matter.

In Round 1 of this year's effort to raise the minimum wage, the House passed a clean bill, raising the wage from the pitiful $5.15 an hour, where it has been stuck for 10 years, to $7.25 by 2009. In Round 2, the Senate refused to follow the House's lead. Acting as if the midterm elections had never happened, it passed a bill that pairs the wage increase with special-interest tax cuts priced at $8.3 billion over the next 10 years.

The ultimate cost would probably be much higher because most of the proposed tax cuts were designated as "temporary." If those temporary measures were renewed — and temporary tax cuts are almost always renewed— the 10-year cost of the Senate's bill would reach $47.5 billion.

And that's not the only way the Senate bill is objectionable. Many of the Senate's proposed tax cuts would do more for big business, which is largely unaffected by a rise in the minimum wage, than for the typical small business. Big chain stores and big landlords would be the hands-down winners from proposed tax breaks for building new retail stores and new restaurants, and for improving existing structures.

Moreover, the tax cuts that small businesses may be able to latch onto are overly broad, rather than narrowly targeted. As such, they conflict with many senators' recent pledges to close the tax gap, the estimated $300 billion in taxes that are owed but unpaid. It's common knowledge that much of the gap is due to unreported cash and overstated deductions from self-employed people, family businesses and family farms. It makes no sense to grant broad tax cuts to taxpayers in that group until lawmakers find ways to ensure that they are paying their fair share to begin with.

Needed Fixes For No Child Left Behind (NYT)

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

The No Child Left Behind Act of 2002 — which requires states to close the achievement gap between rich and poor students in exchange for more federal dollars — is the most far-reaching educational reform since the country embraced compulsory education in the early 20th century.

But it is unlikely to succeed unless Congress strengthens the law and puts a lot more money behind it when it moves to reauthorize No Child Left Behind later this year.

The bipartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind, financed by several private foundations to evaluate the law's effect, has come up with a list of 75 specific and much needed suggestions on how to improve teaching, learning and student performance, and on what the states need to do better to help schools meet the law's requirements.

The report calls for the development of rigorous, voluntary national standards that would more effectively prepare students for success at college and in the workplace. The report also points out glaring problems with the way states collect data on both school and student performance. Those systems appear to be in chaos, where they exist at all. The report calls on the federal government to pony up an additional $100 million to help states build such systems.

The commission also argues that the reform effort will not get anywhere until the country manages to train, hire and retain far more high-quality teachers. In a departure from the past, the report calls for teachers to be evaluated not just based on their educational credentials, but also on how effectively their students learn.

In a suggestion that's long overdue, the report recommends that colleges and universities, which rely on federal funds, be required to increase the number of graduates qualified to teach in underserved areas like math and science. At the same time, it suggests that school districts with high turnover rates be required to develop plans to train and retain their best teachers.

This report reflects the growing and welcome consensus that No Child Left Behind, and the quest to improve public schooling for all children, are here to stay. What remains is for Congress to write some of these important new provisions into law and to put enough money behind them to make them work.

Cheating On Tests (WP)

EDUCATORS who are successful in turning around troubled schools say the first step is collecting reliable data. A true measure of performance is the only way to identify problems and map improvement. Yet, five years into the No Child Left Behind Act and its mandate for accountability, too many states are still gaming the system by administering weak tests. They boast about high scores, but their claims are as phony as the performance of their students.

Ending this fraud is among the reforms being pushed by a blue-ribbon commission on No Child Left Behind. The group, led by former health and human services secretary Tommy G. Thompson (R) and former Georgia governor Roy E. Barnes (D), points out that setting intentionally low test standards allows students to post better results and lets states escape sanctions under the law. It also makes comparing the performance of students between states impossible and presents a misleading picture of how well schools and their students are doing. This hypocrisy has become an annual event in which states post the results of achievement tests that in many cases differ widely from the results of benchmark tests given by the National Assessment of Educational Progress.

Although the commission correctly diagnosed the problem, it has fallen short with its call for the federal government to require tougher tests from the states or for states to voluntarily use a national model. It's time for the United States to move in the direction taken by other countries in formulating and administering a national test. All students, no matter where they live, should have to show proficiency in certain skills and knowledge. The reason no such test exists has more to with politics than with education. Presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton both tried to get national standards introduced, but their efforts were quashed by conservatives committed to local control of schools and by liberals averse to more testing. Children's rights trumps states' rights, and geography should not matter in how well prepared students are. Shouldn't reading in the third grade be the same in Mississippi as in Maryland? Even more urgent, given the competition the United States faces in a global economy, shouldn't an eighth-grader from Georgia or Pennsylvania have the same math skills as any counterpart in Singapore or Denmark?

There are other good reasons for introducing a national test, including the economic (money would be saved in the development and use of one test) and the pragmatic (switching the debate from what to test to how to teach). The arguments for a national test are so strong that some states are looking to form partnerships with others in developing common tests. As Congress begins to debate the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind, it should ask this question: Why wouldn't the nation want, finally, to know how well all of its students perform?

Fed Chairman Optimistic About Economy (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, February 15, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke offered a mostly upbeat assessment of the economy Wednesday, citing improvements in inflation and housing in comments suggesting the Fed will leave interest rates alone for a while.

Wall Street liked the message and propelled stocks sharply higher. The Dow Jones industrials gained 87.01 points to close at a new high of 12,741.86.

Bernanke said that at present, interest rates are at a level that is "likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation."

"Overall, the U.S. economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace this year and next, with growth strengthening somewhat as the drag from housing diminishes," he said as he delivered the Fed's economic report for the first time to a Democrat-controlled Congress.

The Fed has held a key interest rate steady at 5.25 percent since August, giving borrowers a reprieve.

Before that, the central bank steadily had raised rates for two years, the longest ever stretch of increases, to fend off inflation.

Many economists said Bernanke's testimony to the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee buttressed their belief that the Fed will continue to hold rates steady for much of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0132688

Still, Bernanke was not prepared to declare victory over inflation just yet. Thus, he did not close the door on the possibility of further rate increases down the road.

The Fed chief was careful to hedge his bets and pointed out risks that could upset the generally good economic outlook.

One is that inflation might flare, which is why the Fed is keeping open the option of a rate increase.

It will "be some time before we can be confident that underlying inflation is moderating as anticipated," Bernanke said. If inflation does not wane as the Fed expects, policymakers are "prepared to take action," he said.

On the other hand, there is the risk that a deeper than expected residential real-estate bust could yet unfold, which could hurt overall economic growth, Bernanke said.

A former college professor, Bernanke marked his one-year anniversary at the Fed on Feb. 1. President Bush tapped him to succeed Alan Greenspan, who rose to iconic status in his 18-plus years as chairman.

The committee chairman, Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., a 2008 presidential hopeful, and some colleagues said they thought Bernanke was doing a good job in managing the world's largest economy.

Even so, Democrats were vocal about their concerns about the middle class.

"So while some in this country might believe that our economy is chugging along quite well .... there seems to be an increasing gap between the average citizen and those at the top of our economic ladder," said Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J. "And the disparity that continues to grow in my mind is widening at an alarming rate."

Democrats, who are in control of Congress for the first time in 12 years, accuse Bush of not doing enough to narrow economic inequality. Finding ways to close that gap between low- and high-income workers is a Democratic priority.

Bernanke said bolstering education and helping workers acquire new skills should help the situation.

On trade, Bernanke said he is not happy with the United States' record-high deficits but suggested erecting protectionist barriers would do more harm than good.

China, he said, needs to do more to move to a flexible currency policy. Critics contend that Beijing is keeping its currency artificially low, hurting U.S. exports and contributing to the loss of U.S. factory jobs.

When asked about Japan, a huge competitive force for the troubled U.S. auto sector, Bernanke said the Fed has seen no evidence that Japan is manipulating the yen to keep its value low.

Bernanke refused to weigh in on tax policy, much to the dismay of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "I think you are ducking it, in all due respect," Schumer said.

When Bernanke took over last year, there was debate about whether the central bank could get the economy to slow sufficiently to thwart inflation, but not so much as to fall into recession.

"You inherited an economy that was approaching a tipping point, and so far you have managed not to push it over," said Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky. Bunning was the only senator who had voted against Bernanke's nomination as Fed chief.

In its latest economic projections, the Fed said that it expects the economy this year to grow between 2.5 percent and 3 percent — as measured from the fourth quarter of last year to the fourth quarter of this year. That would be slower than a previous Fed forecast and less than the 3.4 percent growth logged for all of 2006.

"Core" inflation, meanwhile, should ease to between 2 percent to 2.25 percent, which would be down from 2.3 percent last year. Core inflation excludes the more volatile categories of energy and food.

The unemployment rate may rise to a high of 4.75 percent, which would still be low by historical standards.

Fed Chairman Remains Optimistic About Economy (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told Congress today that the Fed is generally satisfied with the state of the economy and is more worried about inflation than sagging economic growth.

But in portraying the best of all possible economies, Bernanke suggested that the Fed would leave interest rates alone until it sees some warning signs of either inflation or a turndown in economic growth.

The stock markets, apparently reading Bernanke's testimony as a sign that the Fed's next move on rates would be down rather than up, reacted positively. The Dow Jones Industrial Average marched ahead nearly 100 points as he began his testimony.

The Fed last raised its benchmark short-term rate in June, the last of 17 consecutive policy meetings in which its Federal Open Market Committee raised rates by 0.25 percentage points. Starting in mid-2004, rates rose from 1% to their present 5.25%.

Delivering his semi-annual message on the state of the economy to the Senate Banking Committee, Bernanke acknowledged that the Fed's most closely watched measure of inflation was running higher than its informal 1% to 2% "comfort zone."

But he said the Fed predicted that this measure — the price index for personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy — would decline to a rate of 2% to 2.25% this year and to 1.75% to 2% next year.

But after its most recent meeting last month, Bernanke pointed out, the Open Market Committee "indicated that its predominant policy concern is the risk that inflation will fail to ease as expected and that it is prepared to take action to address inflation risks if developments warrant." On the whole, Bernanke painted a picture of the best of all possible economies.

Economic growth, propelled by strong consumer spending, was solid despite the collapse of the housing market, he said. As for housing, he said home sales have leveled off after months of declines, and mortgage applications have picked up.

The housing sector's decline would probably mean that consumers could no longer be able to borrow against the increasing values of their homes to spend more than they earned.

But he still predicted that "consumer expenditures appear likely to expand solidly in coming months." Analysts said Bernanke's testimony, while emphasizing the risks of inflation over those of sagging economic growth, was marginally less hawkish on inflation than some of the Fed chairman's recent statements.

"The Fed is in its usual late-cycle stance," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist for High-Frequency Economics, "fretting about inflation risks but waiting for the unemployment rate to turn up, giving the green light for lower rates. We don't think this represents a real change in stance."

Bernanke Calms Worries Over Rates (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke alleviated recent fears of higher interest rates by signaling growing confidence that inflation is headed lower as economic growth remains moderate.

But Mr. Bernanke, speaking before the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee, said yesterday that he remained concerned that tight labor markets and limited spare capacity could yet force inflation higher -- suggesting that interest-rate cuts are not yet being contemplated.

Markets had expected more-hawkish testimony -- that is, more concern about inflation -- in part because several Fed policy makers last week suggested rates could rise again. The more-balanced tone of Mr. Bernanke, whose opinion counts considerably more, sent both stock and bond prices sharply higher. The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 87.01 points to a new record close of 12,741.86 and the 10-year Treasury bond yield, which moves in the opposite direction to price, fell to 4.73%.

"There are some indications that inflation pressures are beginning to diminish," Mr. Bernanke said. "A waning of the temporary factors that boosted inflation in recent years will probably help foster a continued edging down of core inflation," which excludes food and energy.

Two factors in particular should nudge down core inflation, he said. Oil prices have dropped, and that will, indirectly, relieve some cost pressure on a range of goods and services. Second, tenant rents, which determine both renters' and homeowners' shelter costs in the main inflation measures, should rise more slowly as demand shifts to homes from apartments and the supply of rental units rises.

The forecasts of the members of the Federal Open Market Committee, which sets interest rates, also displayed greater confidence about inflation. They see core inflation, as measured by the price index of personal-consumption expenditures, falling to between 2% and 2.25% by the end of this year from 2.2% in December, and then further, to between 1.75% and 2%, by the end of 2008. That's at, or below, the 2% level that many policy makers consider stable prices, and within the 1% to 2% "comfort zone" other policy makers prefer.

In spite of this, Mr. Bernanke said the Fed "has continued to view the risk that inflation will not moderate as expected as the predominant policy concern." He didn't explicitly say that that concern could yet lead to higher interest rates. But by reiterating the bias to worry about higher inflation rather than weak growth, Mr. Bernanke also indicated that rates are unlikely to be cut anytime soon. The Fed has kept its short-term interest rate target at 5.25% since last June and markets expect it to stay there through the middle of this year. After Mr. Bernanke spoke, futures markets priced in a higher probability that the Fed would cut its rate target to 5% by December.

Despite the more-sanguine inflation forecast, Mr. Bernanke suggested that the Fed must remain vigilant on inflation because the economy is operating close to, and possibly above, its normal capacity. "Upward pressure on inflation could materialize if final demand were to exceed the underlying productive capacity of the economy for a sustained period," he said. "The high level of resource utilization remains an important upside risk to continued progress on inflation."

DOJ_NMG_0132690

That said, FOMC members actually expect slower growth this year, at 2.5% to 3% in the 12 months through the fourth quarter, than they did last July, when their forecast was for 3% to 3.25%. Mr. Bernanke attributed this to a larger-than-expected decline in homebuilding. He suggested that homebuilding could remain a drag on growth through the end of 2008, telling one senator that it could take that long to bring the inventory of unsold homes down to normal levels.

Bernanke Doesn't Expect Interest Rate Change Soon (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve is unlikely to change interest rates anytime soon, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke suggested Wednesday, striking an upbeat tone about the economy, but he voiced continued concern about inflation.

Bernanke said the economy is likely to grow at a "moderate pace" in 2007 and 2008. That comes despite a dramatic slowing in housing that has so far had little dampening effect on consumers, the lifeblood of the economy, Bernanke told the Senate Banking Committee on the first two days of his twice-yearly testimony on the economy.

"There are some indications that inflation pressures are beginning to diminish," he said during the more than three-hour hearing. "The monthly data are noisy, however, and it will consequently be some time before we can be confident that underlying inflation is moderating as anticipated."

Bernanke's comments strengthened expectations that Fed policymakers are in a wait-and-see mode. The Fed's view of ebbing inflation means further interest rate rises are unneeded, while a strong economy suggests rate cuts aren't necessary at this time, either.

"The Fed is, at this point, comfortable to sit on the sidelines," Daniel Jester, an economist at Moody's Economy.com, said in a note to clients. The economic consulting firm anticipates the Fed will leave interest rates unchanged for the rest of the year.

The Fed last month left its target for short-term interest rates, which influence the cost of borrowing for everything from mortgages to credit cards, unchanged at 5.25%, the highest in six years. The Fed has left rates alone for five consecutive meetings after raising them 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006.

Bernanke said the decline in inflationary pressures was in part because of an easing in oil prices, which he noted were "notoriously difficult to predict," making them a "key source of uncertainty to the inflation outlook."

He also said tightness in the labor market suggests wage pressures could accelerate as businesses seek to attract and retain talent from a limited pool of workers. If companies respond to higher payrolls by raising prices, rather than absorbing the added costs, inflationary pressures would rise.

Regarding housing, the Fed chairman repeated that there were "tentative signs of stabilization." But even if the slide in housing demand is over, efforts by home builders to reduce inventories will "weigh on economic growth over the next few quarters," he said.

Bernanke called housing a key risk to the economy, noting it is hard to forecast the future course of the market and its effects on consumers. So far, consumers have been resilient in the face of the housing slowdown, Bernanke said.

Fed Chief Suggests Rates Will Hold Steady (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said today that inflation is improving as the economy expands at a moderate but manageable pace — the balancing point that the Fed tries to hit as it regulates interest rates.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks, delivered this morning to the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee, indicated that the central bank is likely to hold its benchmark interest rate steady for some time.

Wall Street cheered his words. Shortly after the prepared text of the speech was released at 10 a.m., traders began a rally that gained strength throughout the day. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 87 points to 12,741.86, its highest closing level ever. Bond prices also rose.

Mr. Bernanke said that recent readings on the strength of the economy suggest that the Fed's current policy "is likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation." The Fed has left short-term interest rates at 5.25 percent since August.

Still, Mr. Bernanke noted that runaway inflation remains the Fed's primary concern, and he asserted that it "is prepared to take action to address inflation risks if developments warrant."

In recent weeks, the Fed has slightly shifted its tone on inflation. The language in the regular statements the central bank issues when it votes on interest rates has become somewhat softer since the summer. While Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials still express concern about rising prices, their words have become less cautionary.

DOJ_NMG_0132691

In its most recent statement, issued late last month, the Fed demonstrated a growing confidence that inflationary pressures were easing. “Readings on core inflation have improved modestly, and inflation pressures seem likely to moderate over time,” the Fed’s statement said.

As long as inflation continues to stabilize, the Fed has little reason to raise or lower interest rates. After the January statement, analysts speculated that the Fed would remain on hold for much of the year.

“Bernanke struck a firm and reassuring tone,” said Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with Bank of America. “For the present, we believe the Fed remains comfortably on hold.”

Nothing in Mr. Bernanke’s testimony today hinted that the Fed would soon change its posture. He spoke of a robust and expanding economy that has so far appeared to avoid any widespread damage from a collapse.

“The U.S. economy appears to be making a transition from the rapid rate of expansion experienced over the preceding several years to a more sustainable average pace of growth,” he said, according to a prepared text of his remarks. “However, the weakness in housing market activity and the slower appreciation of house prices do not seem to have spilled over to any significant extent to other sectors of the economy. Consumer spending has continued to expand at a solid rate, and the demand for labor has remained strong.”

Looking ahead, Mr. Bernanke struck an optimistic tone about both inflation and the prospect for growth. “Over all, the U.S. economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace this year and next, with growth strengthening somewhat as the drag from housing diminishes,” he said. “The projections of the members of the Board of Governors and the presidents of the Federal Reserve Banks are for inflation to continue to ebb over this year and next.”

But in typical Fed fashion, he added numerous caveats to the forecast. “The risks to this outlook are significant,” he said, referring to the Fed’s projections for growth. He added: “It will consequently be some time before we can be confident that underlying inflation is moderating as anticipated.”

He briefly touched on the growing trade imbalance the United States has with the rest of the world, remarking during a question-and-answer session after his prepared remarks that he believes the current level of the trade gap to be unacceptable. “I’m not happy with it,” he said. Yesterday, the Commerce Department said that the trade imbalance — the difference between what Americans import and what they export — reached a record for the fifth consecutive year. The biggest chunk of the $763.3 billion deficit last year was because Americans purchased far more goods and services from China than the Chinese purchased from the United States.

When asked whether he was satisfied with Chinese trade policies, and in particular how the way that nation sets the value of its currency, Mr. Bernanke said, “They’ve moved in the right direction, but, no, I don’t think that they’ve done enough.”

Mr. Bernanke was one of several senior government officials who traveled to China late last year to press for less restrictive trade policies. One of the top issues the United States has pressed with China is the value of its currency, which many economists say is understated. An undervalued Chinese yuan makes foreign goods more expensive there.

Bernanke Says Fed Unlikely To Alter Rates (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke indicated yesterday that the central bank is likely to hold interest rates steady, prompting a rally on Wall Street that pushed the Dow Jones industrial average to a record high.

The Fed chief told the Senate Banking Committee that he and his colleagues believe inflation is too high and that they're concerned it might stay that way. But it's more likely, Bernanke said, that a cooling economy will dampen price pressures this year.

Therefore, Fed policymakers don't think they will have to hike rates further to bring inflation down this year and next, Bernanke said. Conversely, they don't think they need to cut rates anytime soon to spur growth.

"The current stance of policy is likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation," Bernanke said, presenting the Fed's first economic report to Congress this year.

Those words were "music to the ears of both stock and bond investors," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist for PNC Financial Services Group. "The Fed doesn't see the economy in any real trouble."

The Dow closed at 12,741.86, up 87.01 points, or 0.69 percent, on top of a 102-point gain Tuesday. Yesterday's close beat the record set Feb. 1.

Bernanke outlined expectations of a "Goldilocks" economy -- not too hot, not too cold, with moderating inflation -- said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies. "The general theme of his testimony was on the neutral side. . . . I think that's what the markets have been celebrating."

DOJ_NMG_0132692

Democratic and Republican senators also welcomed Bernanke's message, and praised his performance since succeeding Alan Greenspan as Fed chairman a year ago.

"I believe that you have done a very good job in gaining the respect and confidence of the markets and your colleagues on the Federal Reserve Board," the committee chairman, Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), told Bernanke. "The Fed's monetary policy, most notably its decision to stop raising interest rates in June, has played a very important role in some recent positive economic developments."

Fed policymakers have held their benchmark short-term interest rate steady at 5.25 percent since June. Many analysts predict the rate will stay at that level through the rest of the year.

However, after the Commerce Department reported yesterday that retail sales were flat last month, some traders boosted their bets that the Fed will cut interest rates by the end of the year to boost growth. The sales figures added to other recent data showing the economy entered the new year with less momentum than previously thought.

Many analysts now estimate that the economy grew at a sluggish pace in the last three months of the year, close to a 2 percent annual rate -- well below the robust 3.5 percent pace estimated recently by the Commerce Department. The agency will update its estimate at the end of this month.

Bernanke indicated he is comfortable with the latest news, as it fits with the Fed's forecast that a period of moderate economic growth will force inflation lower.

"The U.S. economy appears to be making a transition from the rapid rate of expansion experienced over the preceding several years to a more sustainable average pace of growth," he said.

The economy has grown more than 3 percent a year for the last three years. This year, the economy will grow 2.5 to 3 percent, the Fed's top policymakers forecast in their report to Congress.

They predicted this slowdown would cause core inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, to drift gradually from 2.2 percent last year to below 2 percent by 2008. The Fed has no formal target, but Bernanke and several of his colleagues have said they prefer to hold core inflation within a "comfort zone" of 1 to 2 percent.

Fed policymakers also foresee unemployment edging up a bit but remaining low this year and next. The jobless rate was 4.5 percent at the end of last year. The Fed expects it to average 4.5 to 4.75 percent at the end of this year, and to stay about there in 2008.

Bernanke attributed most of the slowdown to the housing slump. But he said that weakness does "not seem to have spilled over to any significant extent to other sectors of the economy."

Indeed, the economy is following the Fed's script so well, Bernanke "might want to do a touchdown dance at their next meeting," said Ethan S. Harris, chief economist at Lehman Bros.

Fed Sees Soft Landing For Economy (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, February 15, 2007

Stocks and bonds jumped on Wednesday after Ben Bernanke laid out a fundamentally benign analysis of the US economy in his twice-annual testimony to Congress.

The Federal Reserve chairman painted a picture of recovering growth, moderating inflation and reduced economic risks that evoked memories of the “Goldilocks” economy of the late 1990s – so-called because it was neither too hot nor too cold.

Mr Bernanke struck a temperate tone on inflation, reiterating the Fed’s view that it was still a bigger risk than growth but he made no effort to prepare the ground for another interest rate rise.

Instead, he dropped a heavy hint that rates might stay on hold at 5.25 per cent for some time, saying: “The current stance of policy is likely to foster sustainable economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation”.

The absence of more hawkish language on inflation and interest rates, and recognition of the continued risks to growth from housing, was greeted with relief by investors, who had been troubled by recent talk from some Fed officials.

The S&P 500 index rose 0.76 per cent to 1,455.30 on Wednesday, while Treasury bonds also moved higher, with 10-year yields falling 7.6 basis points to 4.736 per cent.

The futures market priced in a greater chance of a rate cut this year, while the dollar fell 0.7 per cent against the euro, 0.8 per cent against sterling and 0.2 per cent against the yen.

Earlier, Mr Bernanke’s UK counterpart, Mervyn King, struck a tougher tone as he released the Bank of England’s quarterly inflation report, which forecast that inflation would overshoot its target at the two-year forecast horizon unless it raised rates again.

“Just as 3 per cent inflation [in December] didn’t mean that the end of the world was nigh, so 2.7 per cent [in January] does not mean we can ignore concerns about inflation ahead,” he said.

Mr Bernanke was showered with praise by senators from both parties, who credited his decision to halt the Fed's rate-tightening cycle after the last increase in June 2006 with engineering a soft landing.

"You are getting good grades from everyone, and I concur," said Chuck Schumer, Democratic senator for New York.

The Fed chairman told senators that the tendency of forecasts prepared by Fed policymakers was for growth between 2.5 per cent and 3 per cent this year, and 2.75 per cent and 3 per cent next, with core inflation on its preferred measure of 2 per cent to 2.25 per cent this year and 1.75 per cent to 2 per cent next – a level most policymakers would probably be comfortable with.

Mr Bernanke said a "waning of the temporary factors that boosted inflation in recent years" – including pressure from higher oil prices and rising rents – would "probably help foster a continued edging down of core inflation". But he said the high level of resource utilisation remained "an upside risk to continued progress on inflation".

The Fed chairman said he was following closely signs of distress in the high-risk mortgage market but said: "I do not think at this point it has implications for the aggregate economy."

Probed on the US trade deficit, he said: "I am not happy with it."

Economists Differ Over Consumers (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — Despite tight labor markets and rising wages, some economists caution that consumers are likely to pare their spending ahead.

The debate was highlighted by Wednesday's report that U.S. retail sales were flat in January, though December figures were revised somewhat higher. Auto sales fell last month, while department store sales were bolstered by redemption of holiday gift cards.

"The 2006 holiday selling season was a good one. But by virtue of all that selling, consumers have set a high hurdle," Ken Mayland, of Clearview Economics, told clients. "The consumer sector of the economy faces some 'challenges.' "

Consumer spending, which accounts for about two-thirds of the economy, has proved remarkably resilient in the past several years, despite terrorist attacks and high energy prices. One big aid was a five-year boom in the housing market, letting Americans tap into home equity for extra cash.

More recently, consumers have been buoyed by a low 4.6% unemployment rate, which helped push wages up, and a dip in energy prices. Prices have been edging back up, however, with crude oil rising from about $50 a barrel on Jan. 18 to $58 a barrel Wednesday.

Still, in testimony to Congress Wednesday, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke gave an upbeat outlook for consumer spending, noting it expanded at a brisk 3.5% rate in the second half of 2006, a figure he called even more striking given the fall in the housing market.

Bernanke said consumer spending should expand solidly, though a little less rapidly than income, if consumers "respond to the slow pace of home-equity appreciation by saving more."

Bill Hampel, chief economist at the Credit Union National Association, notes that savings growth at credit unions grew unexpectedly. "For much of the year we'd been telling credit unions, 'It looks like we're on track for the slowest growth year at credit unions since World War II.' The last quarter of the year, it picked up," he says.

Scott Hoyt of Moody's Economy.com expects a decline in consumer spending growth and a "small and gradual increase in the savings rate" as consumers are less able to rely on home price appreciation to meet their immediate needs or long-term wealth goals.

While spending could slow, economists aren't predicting the demise of the consumer.

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, says consumer spending gains will probably decelerate. But with the tight job market "and if gasoline prices stay where they are today, consumers should muddle through the next few quarters."

Bernanke Frowns On Tax Cuts (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 15, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke urged action yesterday to balance the budget and curb income inequality through better education, saying such goals should take priority over tax cuts.

DOJ_NMG_0132694

"I can't speak to the overall combination of taxes and spending, other than to say that they should be in balance. But I will go so far as to say that I think that there's a significant return to investing in young kids," the Fed chairman told Sen. Bob Casey, Pennsylvania Democrat, in response to a question about whether Congress should vote to extend tax cuts or increase funding for the Head Start program for poor children.

Mr. Bernanke said taxes have an "important" role to play in narrowing the widening income gap between rich and poor through income-transfer programs, and Congress needs to balance that goal against the desirability of tax incentives that spur innovation.

"The tax code has an important role to play in generating more equality," he said, although "entrepreneurs and the people who take risks -- we have to give them incentives to take risks" as well.

He said the benefits from raising revenues by letting President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010 must be weighed against the growth impact from higher taxes. He strongly urged Congress to strive to improve the government's balance sheet and said his biggest worry is the government is not prepared to finance baby boomers' retirement starting in 2011.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks before the Senate banking committee were received warmly by Democrats and were his most forceful testimony on political matters since he took office a year ago.

He was praised by committee members for adroitly steering the economy to a "soft landing" that has maintained robust growth with lower inflation. His willingness to go further in recommending action against income inequality and other economic problems appeared to reflect increased confidence after a successful year in office.

At the urging of nearly every Democrat on the committee, Mr. Bernanke elaborated on a speech he gave last week outlining the reasons for the increasing income gap between wealthy Americans and most wage earners.

Like his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, Mr. Bernanke blamed the gap primarily on differences in education and skill, with the most-successful workers those who can employ advanced technology and education to compete in the global marketplace.

"The very important drivers of economic growth and prosperity in this country include free and open trade and technological progress. It's very important to allow those forces to continue to operate in our economy," he said. "However, we do have to recognize ... they may create greater income possibilities for some than others.

"To retain support for policies of free trade, open borders, technological change, flexible labor markets, we need to make sure that the gains and benefits from these powerful growth-producing forces are broadly shared and that people understand that these things are good for the American economy and good for people generally in the economy."

Mr. Bernanke endorsed setting minimum international labor standards in trade agreements, such as banning child or slave labor. But he questioned whether increased unionization would reduce the income gap and said Congress should focus most of its efforts on ensuring equal access to good quality education and job skills.

"My wife is a teacher. I've been in education for a long time. I was on the school board for many years," he said. "We've been worrying about educational quality for a long time, and it's a difficult thing to achieve."

While the U.S. maintains a "substantial leadership" position in college-level education and research and development, he said, it is falling short at providing adequate education at lower levels, especially in math and science.

In discussing risks to the economy, Mr. Bernanke said the substantial drop in housing last year had less of an impact than expected. "We've not seen substantial spillovers from the housing slowdown to consumer spending or to other parts of the economy," but "it's early to say that this problem is over."

A "significant concern" is recent "distress in the subprime area" of the mortgage market, where default levels have surged to recession levels, he said.

"I'm obviously following it very carefully, both in terms of the impact it has on the borrowers and also, you know, see what effects it has on lenders as well. I don't think that it has at this point implications for the aggregate economy in terms of the ongoing expansion, but as I said, it is an important issue for those sectors."

Referring to recent announcements of losses in mortgage trading and lending at HSBC Bank and the New Century Corp., a major subprime lender, Mr. Bernanke said: "Evidently, there are some loans that have been made that are not turning out well and to the detriment of both the lenders and the borrowers. We will certainly be watching that carefully and trying to provide guidance and oversight to minimize that risk going forward."

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Soothed by Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin Bernanke's suggestion that interest-rate increases aren't in the offing soon, investors bid up the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record.

DOJ_NMG_0132695

The Dow Jones Transportation Average and the Dow Jones Utility Average also hit records, the first time since 1998 they have done so on the same day as a record close for the industrial average. Before yesterday, such a Dow-averages trifecta had happened only 19 times since 1929.

The Dow industrials rallied 87.01 points, or 0.7%, to 12741.86, for a 190-point jump in two days. The industrials are up 2.2% this year. It was 28th record close for the blue chips since the start of October and the second record this month.

The trifecta of records reflects the breadth of the recent stock rally. Most analysts see that as a sign that the gains can continue, with the economy just strong enough to buoy corporate profits at an array of companies, but not in danger of overheating.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rallied 11.04 points, or 0.8%, to 1455.30, up 2.6% this year. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index gained 28.50 points, or 1.2%, to 2488.38, up 3% on the year.

The market has faced a conundrum lately, with disagreement on Wall Street about whether the Fed's next move would be a rate cut to spur economic expansion or a rate increase in response to data showing some areas of surprising strength, such as job growth and rising wages, which could lead to inflation.

In testimony to the Senate Banking Committee yesterday, Mr. Bernanke said the Fed's current rate policy likely will foster "a gradual ebbing of core inflation" in the months ahead. For many investors, his comments marked the clearest sign yet that the Fed won't raise borrowing costs to rein in spending by consumers, businesses and investors, which would hurt stocks.

"I think the direction of the Fed's next move should be settled by now," said Merrill Lynch economist David Rosenberg, who says the central bank is likely to cut rates in the second half. "It's just a matter of the timing and magnitude of the next move, not the direction."

As the Dow industrials rose, the transportation average rallied 105.40 points, or 2.1%, to 5117.27, while the utility average gained 1.97 points, or 0.4%, to 477.07.

Bond prices also rallied, pushing down yields, as is often the case when investors become less afraid of inflation, which erodes the value of the interest payments they receive.

A drop in oil prices also aided the stock market's rally. Oil futures for March delivery dropped $1.06, or 1.8%, to $58 a barrel, off 5% this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange, after the federal Energy Information Administration released weekly data showing unexpectedly robust stockpiles.

Strategist Bob Hoye of the Vancouver research firm Institutional Advisors said the stock market will face a big challenge beginning in the spring as weather warms and families begin to take more car trips. That will increase fuel demand and, potentially, commodity prices as well, which could renew inflation fears.

Yesterday's stock rally "may be a news item for the day, but it's only part of a longer cyclical rally in bonds and stocks, Mr. Hoye said. "We're going to see that rally tested."

In major U.S. market action:

Bond prices rose2. The 10-year note gained 21/32 point, or $6.5625 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.731%. The 30-year bond rose 1 5/32 to yield 4.827%.

The dollar weakened3. The dollar fell to 120.74 yen from 121.17 yen. The euro rose to $1.3129 from $1.3037.

Gangbuster Market Made $8.8 Trillion Recovery (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 15, 2007

NEW YORK — The record-setting run on Wall Street is starting to add up to real money.

The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 index, the broadest measure of the U.S. stock market, has recouped all of its dollar losses suffered in the 2000-02 bear market. As of Wednesday, it had rebounded 100% and regained $8.8 trillion in market value — more than the combined annual GDP of Japan, Germany and the United Kingdom — since its Oct. 9, 2002, low.

Confirming the strength of this so-called U.S. "wealth" measure were the record highs set Wednesday by a swath of other domestic stock market indexes. For the first time since March 17, 1998, the Dow Jones industrial, transportation and utilities averages all set records on the same day, suggesting that the economy is in good shape.

And further confirmation of the market's broad, inclusive participation came in the form of a record close for the NYSE composite index, which measures the performance of all U.S. common stocks, foreign shares and real estate investment trusts listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

"Each time you see another index hit a new high, it validates what is going on and confirms that the rally is, indeed, broad-based," says Steven Foresti, managing director and head of investment research at Wilshire Consulting.

The broad U.S. stock market has risen four consecutive years after losing nearly half of its value from 2000 to 2002. The continued gains on Wall Street, however, are worrisome to some because the market is now enjoying its second-longest streak ever without either a 2% or 10% correction from a prior high. There is also growing concern that investors may be getting overly optimistic about the market's moneymaking abilities.

But even Stack admits that the market continues to defy skeptics and move higher because all the ingredients of a bull market remain in place. The big drivers — stable interest rates and a not-too-hot, not-too-cold economy — were reinforced Wednesday by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke in testimony on Capitol Hill.

"Investors have deciphered all the economic data and have given a thumbs up across the board," says Timothy Vick, senior portfolio manager at Sanibel Captiva Trust. He says investors are now more confident that the Fed will not raise short-term interest rates this year, which makes stocks far more attractive.

McCain Leads Chase For Senate Support (POL)

By Jonathan Martin And Daniel W. Reilly

The Politico, February 15, 2007

In 2000, it was easier to troll for favorable quotes about John McCain among his Democratic colleagues than to find Republican senators ready to say nice things about a man they had served with for years. In the end, McCain snared a grand total of four endorsements from GOP senators for his presidential campaign.

Almost a year until the first primary, McCain has already outpaced his 2000 total. He has six endorsements, and his campaign promises more soon.

That McCain is already on the way to doubling his 2000 take is a vivid illustration of the onetime maverick's ability to make amends with colleagues and the conservative establishment that many of them represent.

A Politico survey among the 49 Republican senators also found three senators backing former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney for president.

Meanwhile, Sen. Sam Brownback enjoys the support of his fellow Kansan, Sen. Pat Roberts. Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has been late in starting the courting process, but an aide said to "stay tuned for some upcoming announcements" of support from the Senate.

Thirty-two Republican senators said they were still undecided on whom to support, and four said they expected to sit out the primary process.

While McCain is winning more support than before, interviews with senators and key aides showed he continues to confront deep ambivalence among many colleagues. Some remain resentful over personal clashes through the years; then there are McCain's views in favor of campaign finance reform and against spending on local projects backed by home-state senators.

"I know … I am not the most popular guy with many on the Appropriations Committee because of our different views on earmarks and that whole process," McCain acknowledged in an interview.

His political strategist, John Weaver, agreed that McCain remains a tough sell for some Senate colleagues. "That's just the way life is," Weaver noted, saying McCain was running "a reality-based campaign" for the backing of fellow Republicans. Attempting to turn the tables on Romney's camp, however, Weaver added that there are "a number of governors who won't support one candidate or the other."

When it comes to endorsements, the inevitable question in modern presidential politics is: Who cares? In earlier generations, endorsements from high-profile politicians often meant delegates and organizational support, something that is no longer the case. Still, McCain may have more of a stake than most in this year's endorsement derby. As someone eyed warily by many conservative activists at the state and local level, he can benefit from the blessing of more-trusted figures.

Among the more notable people pulling an about-face on McCain is Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss. In 2000, Lott was a sometimes caustic opponent. This year, he was an early arrival in McCain's camp and is part of a small inner circle of pro-McCain senators who meet to plot strategy.

"Times change, things change and experiences change people," explained the man who lost his hold on the majority leader post after some key senators and the White House defected in the wake of Lott's racial comments at the 100th birthday party of former Sen. Strom Thurmond in 2002.

"When you've come back up out of the valley you're different," Lott said in an interview. "I believe in resurrection."

Lott also believes in his ability to count votes, as demonstrated by his audacious bid to regain a Senate leadership post after last year's elections. As with that campaign, Lott said his task whipping up support for McCain is challenging but bears promise. Like Weaver, he admitted that some in the body can't bring themselves to support their sometimes-prickly colleague, but adds that "you'd be surprised at some of those who may be rising above."

DOJ_NMG_0132697

Lott wouldn't reveal names but said with a smile that "some of them may even be appropriators."

There's a couple of those whom McCain definitely won't be getting.

On Thursday, Romney's campaign announced that Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, and Sen. Bob Bennett, R-Utah, will serve as the former governor's chief liaisons to the Senate. Both Craig and Bennett serve on the Appropriations Committee.

The powerful spending panel also includes many of the GOP's most politically important senators, including Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, New Hampshire's Judd Gregg, Alabama's Richard Shelby and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas.

Another conservative not helping the McCain cause will be Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina. Though just a freshman, DeMint has already carved out a name for himself in the body for his outspokenness, particularly on fiscal issues. He came out for Romney last month and has been lobbying his fellow conservatives, including other junior senators like Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and John Cornyn of Texas, on the former governor's behalf.

A Senate Republican aide with knowledge of the endorsement derby said Romney's wooing has been based more on his ideas and policy vision while McCain's team has focused on "the inevitability factor" and it being McCain's "turn."

"We are making headway," Craig said of his efforts to woo his Senate colleagues. "I am not going to talk numbers, but I am very pleased with the reception I am getting."

Craig said that he already has a good number of commitments from fellow senators and that he thinks "we will have a good number (of Romney supporters) here in the final analysis."

One Romney adviser off the Hill went so far as to predict that the Romney camp would have "as many or more endorsements from the Senate as McCain."

Bennett and Craig are hoping to reel in more of their colleagues when Romney attends a small gathering of senators in March.

One senator who Romney would love to have in hand by then is Gregg. Though endorsements haven't traditionally counted for much among the proudly independent Granite State electorate (Gregg's support for Bush in 2000 did nothing to stem his 18-point loss), the backing of New Hampshire's senior senator would serve as another indicator that Romney is consolidating the Anybody But McCain vote.

Despite buzz around Capitol Hill that it's only a matter of time before his boss gets behind Romney, Gregg's chief of staff and top political adviser Joel Maiola said the rumors "continue not to be true."

Gregg, Maiola said, has had discussions with a number of candidates, including McCain and Romney, and many of these people are "still in play."

"He's another month away," from an endorsement, Maiola said.

Facing his own tough 2008 re-election, New Hampshire's junior senator, John Sununu, won't weigh in on the White House contest.

With DeMint out for Romney and Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina again behind McCain, Sen. Chuck Grassley of Iowa is the only other Republican senator from an early primary state who is still uncommitted. He told Iowa reporters last week that he would likely not make an endorsement anytime soon.

Grassley isn't alone in keeping his powder dry in the early running.

"I think the dust needs to settle on the issues," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabaman who previously has tangled with McCain. "We need to find out what these (guys) are going to fight for and die for."

Other senators said the role of endorsements in the Senate is overinflated.

"My biggest role in all of this is that I will have one vote in the Louisiana Republican primary," said Louisiana Sen. David Vitter, who has yet to make a decision on whom to support.

Still, Vitter didn't mind handicapping the race. "I think the nomination race is going to be focused on McCain and someone who will be the alternative to McCain," Vitter said. "And Romney has made a lot of headway towards becoming that alternative."

This is exactly, of course, what the Romney camp wants to hear.

Still, it recognizes the inherent strengths in the upper chamber, even for a senator whose had as many run-ins with colleagues as McCain.

"This is very much like 1988 where (former Sen.) Bob Dole was very much the Senate insider and any other candidate will have a hard time (picking up) endorsements," said a Republican strategist supporting Romney. The former governor, this source said, "is taking the George H.W. Bush role, trying to line up lots of House support," recognizing that those in the upper chamber are "either on McCain's side or frozen into neutrality."

Weaver, McCain's strategist, responded that they were also "well on track in the House" and "working it very, very hard." He also hinted that Romney's early cultivation of support from House members was more about perception than anything else.

"We're more concerned not so much as to influence the chattering class in Washington, but to influence voters."

Still, Weaver couldn't resist one dig at the former chief executive and chair of the Republican Governors Association. "How well are they doing among governors?" he asked of Romney's campaign.

To date, Romney has the support of only one of the nation's 22 GOP governors.

Senate endorsement don't mean very much to anyone but those inside the beltway. Most republicans have lost confidence in Senate republicans, and aren't going to look to any Senator for leadership on who to back for President.

by tashi on 02.14.2007 at 10:42 PM

He's done. Wishy washy guy who allowed himself to be swiftboated when the Bushies said his wife was a drug addict and adopted Bengladeshi daughter was really a black love child in 2000. Right, Mr. Integrity and straight talk? Mr. Wimp. Now he's just a lowbrow arsecreecher (German for brown noser, but more active. He actually wiggles around in there). And then ther eis his temper. Why didn't he express it when he had a right to be angry?

by Kasey on 02.14.2007 at 09:40 PM

McCain is getting to cozy with the far right. He had amazing lefty support in 2000 that has disappeared.

by polarbear on 02.14.2007 at 07:52 PM

Senate endorsements are more important during the primary season, and perhaps more important for Republicans. Still, thinking about the order in which things have to occur, McCain cannot win the Republican primary without securing the support of the Republican base. But then, McCain cannot win the general election without attracting substantial crossover votes from Democrats. Especially in this election cycle, the more successful he is at one, the less successful he will be at the other. McCain's support for the surge would have to be rewarded by events for McCain to attact many crossover votes.

Reagan Library To Host GOP Debate In May (AP)

By Brooke Donald

AP, February 15, 2007

(AP) Always fond of invoking Ronald Reagan, the 2008 crop of Republican candidates will get a prime chance to associate themselves with the Gipper's legacy. Former first lady Nancy Reagan said Wednesday she was inviting the leading GOP candidates to the first-ever debate at her husband's library in Simi Valley.

The Ronald Reagan Presidential Library plans to host the debate on May 3. It will feature questions submitted through a Web site.

"Ronnie always hoped the library would be a place where policymakers will debate the future," Nancy Reagan said in a statement. "This presidential debate provides the opportunity to fulfill his wishes."

Debate participants were not immediately announced. Nearly a dozen Republicans have announced their candidacies or have indicated they are considering a bid for the nation's top job. The early front-runners include Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

The debate will be moderated by MSNBC and aired on the cable news channel, as well as simulcast online through the Web site of The Politico newspaper, Politico.com.

People watching online will be able to submit questions to the candidates via the site, according to a release on Politico.com.

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) _ House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn, one of the most powerful Democrats in South Carolina politics, will not endorse a presidential candidate during the 2008 primaries as part of a promise made months ago to party leaders.

"I'm staying out of it," Clyburn told The Associated Press this week as several Democratic White House hopefuls prepared to visit his home state.

Clyburn did much of the arm twisting that landed South Carolina's January 2008 primary ahead of every other state except Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada.

"I used a lot of political capital keeping that primary in South Carolina when two other states went after that," Clyburn said. "I promised people at that time that if they were to come to South Carolina and participate in that primary I would not participate in any effort." He said he wanted to ensure all candidates "have a fair shot at winning the state."

DOJ_NMG_0132699

An endorsement from the former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and the state's senior member of Congress could carry a lot of weight in South Carolina, where 49 percent of primary voters are black. In 2004, Clyburn endorsed Dick Gephardt before his longtime colleague quit the race; he then backed John Kerry. Former Sen. John Edwards, a South Carolina native, won the state primary.

WASHINGTON (AP) _ Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards said Wednesday that he would immediately pull about a third of U.S. combat troops out of Iraq if he were president.

Congress should also cut military funding to force President Bush to do so, Edwards said.

Edwards is going a step farther than rivals Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, who want to cap the number of troops in Iraq to prevent Bush's increase, but are reluctant to cut funding while soldiers are on the ground.

"At this point, the escalation is under way, so blocking it is not enough," Edwards told reporters in a conference call. "So what I'm doing today is calling on Congress to take the next step, which is to cap funding."

Edwards spoke as the Democratic-controlled House of Representatives debated a measure opposing Bush's decision to send 21,500 troops to Iraq to help the 130,000 that were already there at the beginning of the year. Edwards said the non-binding resolution being debated is not enough.

Edwards proposed capping troops at 100,000 and says all combat forces should be out of Iraq within 12-18 months.

However, Edwards said he would not go as far as another Democratic primary rival, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who wants Congress to cut off funds to end the war. Edwards said the war needs to end in a "smart, orderly way."

WASHINGTON (AP) _ Illinois Sen. Barack Obama has a staunch defender for his presidential bid in his wife, Michelle, who won't stand for any criticism of her husband.

Michelle Obama says it's his time to run, even though others have questioned whether a first-term senator is ready to be president.

"We've heard this spewed from the lips of rivals," the candidate's wife told about 1,000 donors at a Chicago fundraiser Sunday night. "Every phase of our journey, he is not experienced enough, he should wait his turn. He is too young, he is not black enough, he is not white enough ... he is too articulate.

"Don't be fooled by these claims because they are mere distractions," she continued. "Distractions to keep us focused once again on what is not possible. Distractions that keep us mired in fear so that we are unable to focus on the real issues that are dragging us down as a nation. What we need right now is a leader. And a leader is more than a set of finite experiences."

She said that only in politics would insiders look at her husband's resume _ a Harvard-trained lawyer, best-selling author and former state senator _ "and dare to have the audacity to say he is not ready."

Mrs. Obama said she is excited about the campaign and aware that "politics is a full contact sport."

"Senator John McCain is a principled leader whose unwavering determination to improve the lives of Americans is admirable," Swift said of the Arizona Republican in a statement issued by his presidential exploratory committee.

Swift, then lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, became acting governor in 2001 after Paul Cellucci resigned to become U.S. ambassador to Canada. She had been planning her own gubernatorial campaign in 2002 when Romney returned to Massachusetts from the Olympic Winter Games in Utah and made clear he planned to seek the GOP nomination.

A year earlier, he had said he would not challenge Swift, labeling her the party's "standard-bearer."

Down in the polls, Swift ended up stepping aside after political missteps that included using aides to baby-sit and a high-profile clash over a proposed highway toll increase.

Romney was the fourth in a series of Republican governors who led Massachusetts from 1991 through 2006. The first, former Gov. William F. Weld, has endorsed Romney. Cellucci has endorsed former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Romney will address the graduates on May 5.

Robertson has not endorsed Romney, and Regent University does not endorse political candidates, Regent spokeswoman Sherri Stocks said.

"At Regent, we often invite a variety of leaders to speak to our campus," Stocks said.

Founded in 1978, Regent has some 5,000 students studying on campuses in Virginia Beach and Washington, D.C., and also via online distance education.

Last year, Sen. John McCain, another Republican hopeful, spoke at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University.

Giuliani, Saying He Is Running For President, Offers His Views On The War In Iraq (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani yesterday removed any lingering doubts that he was running for president, and, without mentioning President Bush by name, offered pointed criticism on how the Iraq war has been handled.

He said that the United States went to war with far too few forces and was wrong to dismantle Saddam Hussein's military and government, and he conceded that if more information had been available about Iraq's weapons, Congress never would have approved the war.

Mr. Giuliani has behaved like a presidential candidate for months, forming an exploratory committee, raising money, building a campaign staff and making appearances around the country. But until now, he has repeatedly stopped short of a definitive statement of his intentions — even joking about his nondeclarations in recent days.

Republican activists and consultants, citing his early withdrawal from the 2000 Senate race, said he needed to put to rest fears that he might not follow through. But in characteristic fashion, Mr. Giuliani said he would do things on his own timetable.

But on "Larry King Live" on CNN yesterday, Mr. Giuliani twice said, "Yes, I'm running," according to a transcript provided by CNN before the interview was broadcast. Asked if he would make a formal announcement of the kind favored by other candidates, he said, "I guess you do."

On the issue that looms largest over the campaign, Iraq, Mr. Giuliani used the interview to offer a harsh assessment of the Bush administration's decision-making. His comments more closely aligned him with his chief rival in Republican primary polls, Senator John McCain of Arizona, who has supported the war, as Mr. Giuliani does, but has criticized its conduct.

"I would remove Saddam Hussein again," Mr. Giuliani said. "I just hope we'd do it better and we'd do it in a different way."

Most important, he added, the United States, which has had 120,000 to 160,000 troops at a time in Iraq, should have gone in with "maybe 100,000 to 130,000 more."

In addition, "I would have us not disband" the Iraqi military or purge the government of Baath Party members, because "that meant getting rid of the entire civil service," he said, adding: "The country had no infrastructure."

"There was a real doubt as to whether we could do this nation building," he said, and as it has turned out, "we're not going to do it."

Mr. Giuliani has often stood closely by the president on national security issues since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and yesterday declined to blame the administration or any official by name. "Of course there were mistakes," he said. "Lincoln made mistakes. Roosevelt made mistakes. Eisenhower made mistakes."

Mr. King asked if Mr. Giuliani would agree that the Senate would have voted unanimously against the war if it were known that Mr. Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction.

"Yes, I guess," he said, but he added that such a vote would say nothing about whether the war was right.

Leaving Iraq now would give neighboring Iran "a major, major ability to expand their activities," he said.

He added, "Two Shiite countries right next to each other, slaughtering, you know, where one group at least is slaughtering Sunnis."

Western intelligence services have attributed most of the violence in Iraq — against both Americans and other Iraqis — to Sunnis, although the role of Shiite militias has grown.

Campaigning for other Republicans last year, Mr. Giuliani offered a full-throated defense of the war and said that Democrats simply did not understand the threat posed by terrorists. As recently as last weekend, speaking to the California Republican Party, he said that the nation was fortunate to have a leader as decisive as Mr. Bush, who Mr. Giuliani said understood what was at stake.

But in the last month, Mr. Giuliani has tempered that support by saying that Americans must be prepared for the idea that the war will not go well, even with the president's recent addition of 21,500 more troops.

"I'm not confident it's all going to turn around," he said yesterday. "Who knows that? I mean, you never know that in the middle of the war. I'm confident that we have to try to make a turnaround and we just can't walk out."

Most Republicans still support the war, polls show — as do their party's three leading presidential candidates, Mr. McCain, Mr. Giuliani and Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor — but most independent voters and Democrats oppose it.

Mr. Giuliani's warnings of setbacks and criticism of war planning could serve him well politically if things continue to go badly in Iraq.

On abortion, an issue that sets him apart from much of his party, he declined to say whether it would bother him if the Supreme Court were to overturn the landmark decision Roe v. Wade.

"I don't think it would hurt me or help me," said Mr. Giuliani, who has long said he favored keeping abortion legal. "It would be a matter of states making decisions."

He has said lately that he would appoint "strict constructionists" to the bench, a phrase taken by many conservatives — and, yesterday, by Mr. King — to mean judges who would not support the Roe decision.

"I don't know that," he said. "You don't know that."

When Mr. King asked him to define what a strict constructionist is, Mr. Giuliani said, "There are a lot of ways to explain that," and did not elaborate.

Rudy Confirms: 'I'm Running' (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon

Long Island Newsday, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- All that's left now to make it official is a throng of sign-waving supporters in a made-for-TV setting.

Rudolph Giuliani Wednesday night finally gave the two-word confirmation he had resisted for a week -- "I'm running" -- for president, that is.

Even veteran broadcaster Larry King wasn't exactly sure what he heard, since Giuliani had come up with several different formulations in the last week that came oh-so-close to saying the same thing.

"So, you're running?" King asked for a third time.

"Yes, I'm running," Giuliani said.

So the only suspense now is about the where and when of a full-fledged announcement.

Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton used a Web video. Barack Obama traveled to the land of Abraham Lincoln on Saturday and addressed supporters in freezing temperatures. Republican Mitt Romney went to Michigan -- plenty far from Washington (he's running as an outsider). John McCain hasn't declared.

At least one politico has suggested Ground Zero, certainly a central part of Giuliani's campaign but also politically risky, looking too much like politicizing the nation's worst tragedy.

Giuliani To Seek Advice From FEC About Speaking Fees (WP)

By John Solomon And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani has continued to make paid speeches at a standard fee of $100,000 since forming his presidential exploratory committee last November, mixing personal business with campaigning in a way many of his rivals in the race cannot.

Presidential candidates who are not federal officeholders are allowed to take money for speeches, as long as they are not raising campaign money at the event, distributing campaign material or delivering an overtly political speech.

But campaign aides said yesterday he will wait to collect his fee for a speech he gave last night until his campaign has discussed the arrangement with the Federal Election Commission and determined how best to handle a handful of speaking engagements already scheduled through the spring.

Giuliani, who has filed an official statement of candidacy with the FEC but has not formally entered the race, spoke in San Diego at a seminar also headlined by famed motivational speaker Zig Ziglar and football coach Marty Schottenheimer. His talk was titled "Courage Without Compromise." Giuliani's aides said he will not accept any more requests for paid speeches.

"Mayor Giuliani is committed to traveling across the country to talk to voters about his vision for the future of the country," campaign spokeswoman Katie Levinson said. "All decisions about his schedule will be made based on what makes sense as he moves toward making an official announcement about a run for the presidency."

Past speechmaking by presidential candidates has attracted the attention of election regulators. In 2003, Democrat Wesley K. Clark returned money for motivational speeches after published reports questioned whether the payments amounted to improper campaign contributions.

Clark said yesterday that he believed his speech fees were legal but ultimately gave them back to avoid giving opponents an issue, and that he worries that putting such fees off limits only hurts candidates who are not wealthy or members of Congress.

"I don't have any problem with Rudy Giuliani giving paid speeches, and I think it is important for America to have a way for people to run for national office without being independently wealthy or taking time out from their constituents. And earning a living with paid speeches is one way to do it," he said. "I just lived off savings, and every month the bank balance went down."

Senators in the presidential field, such as Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), are prohibited by Senate ethics rules from accepting speaking fees.

"Federal officeholders have the ethics rules and honoraria restrictions that apply to them. And state officeholders often face strict limits on accepting fees. So it is true that those people who are in private sector have more latitude to speak in private settings," Michael Toner, an FEC commissioner, said yesterday.

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R) and former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.), who like Giuliani are private citizens, have not accepted speaking fees since joining the presidential race, their campaigns said.

Edwards, "actually canceled a paid appearance that had been scheduled long before he became a candidate," spokeswoman Kate Bedingfield said.

Yesterday's San Diego speech came at the end of a five-day campaign swing though California. The event was closed to the news media, though the public could attend for as little as $4.90 a ticket, according to the promotional materials.

Two weeks ago, Giuliani gave a similar speech in Atlanta at a seminar that also featured former secretary of state Colin L. Powell. In coming weeks, Giuliani is scheduled to speak in Delaware, Houston and several other venues, according to Internet advertisements released by his promoter, Get Motivated Seminars.

The former New York mayor has made a profitable career of speaking at seminars around the world. Eric Money, a recent Oklahoma State University graduate, arranged to bring Giuliani to the school last March for $100,000 and, as is customary, agreed to fly the mayor to town on a corporate jet, for an additional $47,000.

"He cost a lot of money, obviously, and some people were surprised at that, and a little taken aback," Money said yesterday. "But he's a big name and was a possible presidential contender, and in the end, I thought his whole leadership message was very appealing."

Money said his only regret about the speech was that Giuliani did not shed any light on his presidential ambitions, or about his views of the 2008 campaign.

No Apology Needed (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

Far be it from me to get in the middle of a liberal purge, but would anybody mind if I pointed out that the calls for Hillary Clinton to apologize for her support of the Iraq war are almost entirely bogus?

I mean, have the people calling for her apology actually read the speeches she delivered before the war? Have they read her remarks during the war resolution debate, when she specifically rejected a pre-emptive, unilateral attack on Saddam? Did they read the passages in which she called for a longer U.N. inspections regime and declared, “I believe international support and legitimacy are crucial”?

If they went back and read what Senator Clinton was saying before the war, they’d be surprised, as I was, by her approach. And they’d learn something, as I did, about what kind of president she would make.

The Iraq war debate began in earnest in September 2002. At that point Clinton was saying in public what Colin Powell was saying in private: emphasizing the need to work through the U.N. and build a broad coalition to enforce inspections.

She delivered her Senate resolution speech on Oct. 10. It was Clintonian in character. On the one hand, she rejected the Bush policy of pre-emptive war. On the other hand, she also rejected the view that the international community “should only resort to force if and when the United Nations Security Council approves it.” Drawing on the lessons of Bosnia, she said sometimes the world had to act, even if the big powers couldn’t agree.

She sought a third way: more U.N. resolutions, more inspections, more diplomacy, with the threat of force reserved as a last resort. She was triangulating, but the Senate resolution offered her a binary choice. She voted yes in order to give Powell bipartisan leverage at the U.N.

This is how she’s always explained that vote, and I confess that until now, I’ve regarded her explanation as a transparent political dodge. Didn’t everyone know this was a war resolution? But now, having investigated her public comments, I think diplomatic leverage really was on her mind. I also know, from a third person, that she was spending a lot of time with Powell and wanted to help.

On Nov. 8, 2002, the Security Council passed a unanimous resolution threatening Saddam with “serious consequences” if he didn’t disarm.

The next crucial period came in March 2003, as the U.S. battled France over the second Security Council resolution. Clinton's argument at this point was that inspections were working and should be given more time. "It is preferable that we do this in a peaceful manner through coercive inspection," she said on March 3, but went on, "At some point we have to be willing to uphold the United Nations resolutions." Then she added, "This is a very delicate balancing act."

On March 17, Bush gave Saddam 48 hours to disarm or face attack. Clinton tried to be critical of the Bush policy while being deferential to the office of the presidency. She clearly had doubts about Bush's timing, but she kept emphasizing that from her time in the White House, she knew how unhelpful it was for senators to be popping off in public on foreign policy.

At one press event in New York, she nodded when Charles Rangel said Bush had failed at the U.N. But when reporters asked Clinton to repeat what Rangel had just said, she bit her tongue. On March 17, as U.S. troops mobilized, she issued her strongest statement in support of the effort.

Clinton's biggest breach with the liberal wing actually opened up later, in the fall of 2003. Most liberals went into full opposition, wanting to see Bush disgraced. Clinton — while an early critic of the troop levels, the postwar plans and all the rest — tried to stay constructive. She wanted to see America and Iraq succeed, even if Bush was not disgraced.

When you look back at Clinton's thinking, you don't see a classic war supporter. You see a person who was trying to seek balance between opposing arguments. You also see a person who deferred to the office of the presidency. You see a person who, as president, would be fox to Bush's hedgehog: who would see problems in their complexities rather than in their essentials; who would elevate procedural concerns over philosophical ones; who would postpone decision points for as long as possible; and who would make distinctions few heed.

Today, the liberal wing of the Democratic Party believes that the world, and Hillary Clinton in particular, owes it an apology. If she apologizes, she'll forfeit her integrity. She will be apologizing for being herself.

GOP Hopes To Catch A Wave In California (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 15, 2007

During a swing through Northern California this week that included a close encounter with a mechanical milker, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani snitched a bite of blackened chicken quesadilla off a woman's plate at Mimi's Diner in Fresno.

In Southern California next week, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., will appear in the Los Angeles area with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to promote his climate-change policies and talk about how they can be taken national.

Both stops are precursors of a seismic shift taking shape in presidential politics -- California as a top priority for Republicans.

The nation's largest state has always been a sunny ATM for presidential candidates of both parties. In 2004, President Bush got 10 percent of his campaign funds there and Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., got 20 percent, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

But at the polls, the Golden State has been resoundingly Democratic. In the four general elections since 1992, the Republican presidential nominee has lost California every time, by 11 to 13 percentage points. Bush campaigned there vigorously in 2000 and 2004, with his strategist Karl Rove telling reporters, "If you play in the state, all kind of things are possible."

Still, no one would call California a swing state.

This year though, the state suddenly looks alluring to Republicans -- and not just for the cash or dreams. The Republican presidential campaigns are suddenly giving the state intense attention for two reasons:

* California is poised to move its presidential primary from June, when it was irrelevant, up to Feb. 5, creating a potential jackpot near the start of the nominating contests.

* Giuliani and McCain are pro-business candidates with moderate images in the mold of Schwarzenegger, a Republican who easily won re-election in November. Golden State experts say that if either one heads the GOP ticket, he could put the state in play for the general election -- a seismic change in an electoral map where the same states get disproportionate attention in election after election.

McCain's chief strategist, John Weaver, sees California as "a golden opportunity for the GOP to reclaim the national mantle," and asserts that Arizona senator "is the one guy who can do this while holding the base together."

McCain has been lobbying state legislators to move up the primary and has hired top members of his strategy, field, advertising and communications teams from Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign last fall.

McCain's backers believe his Western philosophy, appeal to Hispanics and rapport with military families and retirees will pay off as well.

DOJ_NMG_0132704

"Even if the Democrats just had to battle it out and spend dramatic resources and time out there, that would be a psychological victory," said a Republican strategist familiar with McCain's plans. "But that's not why we would do that. We want to win it."

He'll have to become the nominee first, though, and California could be decisive in the primaries.

Giuliani just finished a four-day swing through the state, drawing a giddy reception from 850 Republicans at the state party's convention and making Iowa-like retail stops, including a stroll through a farm equipment show with the reigning Dairy Princess.

California is already a milestone in his campaign, because it was there that he told reporters offhandedly last weekend that he was "committed" to the race, his most definitive comment yet about his presidential intentions.

The man known as "America's mayor" will have field directors and a political director just for California and is already announcing endorsements, including Rep. David Dreier, R-Calf., who until January was chairman of the House Rules Committee and has tentacles throughout the state.

"The response to the mayor's message has been nothing short of exciting," said Katie Levinson, communications director for Giuliani's exploratory committee. "There is a sense of enthusiasm about him as a candidate that has really been fantastic."

Both McCain and Giuliani are working hard in high-tech Silicon Valley and the agricultural Central Valley. "The key is that California is fundamentally a Western state, except for Los Angeles and Hollywood," said a Republican strategist following the race closely.

A notable exception, however, is California voters' overwhelmingly support for abortion rights. If Schwarzenegger had been anti-abortion, analysts agree, he probably would not have been elected.

Polls in California, like everywhere this early, are mostly a reflection of name recognition. A poll of 600 likely California Republican primary voters, conducted by American Research Group from Jan. 11 to 17, placed Giuliani at 33 percent, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia at 19 percent and McCain at 18 percent. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney was at just 3 percent. The margin of error was plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Undaunted by the poll, Romney's press secretary, Kevin Madden, vowed that the former governor will "have the organization established and the financial resources required to compete successfully in every district across California."

The state moved closer to center stage Tuesday when its Senate passed a bill moving the primaries for both parties to Feb. 5, very shortly after the Iowa caucuses on Jan. 14 and the New Hampshire primary on Jan. 22. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez said he expects to get the measure to the governor's desk within 10 days. And Schwarzenegger, a strong backer of the earlier primary, has vowed to provide local election officials with the additional resources they'll need.

"We hope all the candidates will come to California and do more than just take our money," said Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. And looking toward the general election, the professor added: "A socially moderate Republican, under the right conditions, could be very competitive in California."

New York legislative leaders are also talking about moving their primary up a month to Feb. 5, and New Jersey officials are talking about doing the same, meaning that a Mongo Tuesday could be in the works.

In California, Cain said the biggest challenge for the GOP in the general election would be Iraq, and McCain's outreach to Christian conservatives could hurt him in a state never particularly beholden to the religious right. But the professor said Giuliani would have a strong shot if he follows the Schwarzenegger playbook.

"California is a blue state, but it's light blue," Cain said. "We know where the middle of the spectrum is in California."

He warned, though, that California has so many expensive television markets that the winnowing process may be faster and more brutal than in the traditional opening-round states. "Candidates will assess whether they have any chance whatsoever in California and not invest money if they don't," Cain said.

And Mark DiCamillo, director of the California-based Field Poll, provides a reality check by noting that Republican candidates have typically done 10 to 12 percentage points worse in California than nationally.

"If there's momentum for the Republican and weakness for the Democrat in California, it would be exhibited even more across the country," DiCamillo said. "California would be the least of the Democrats' concerns."

If Rudy wins the GOP nomination (don't hold your breath), Hillary will beat him in Sunny C, my home state.

DOJ_NMG_0132705

Why? Because to become the Republican candidate, Rudy will have to move too far right for most Californians, a lesson learned by Arnold after he became governor.

On the other hand, no matter what position John McCain takes on the issues, he will crush Slick Willie's slick understudy. It's all about INTEGRITY -- not exactly her long suit (or Rudy's, for that matter).

Hugh E. Scott, Vietnam veteran, ex-USAF pilot, lifelong registered Republican, Goldwater conservative, McCain supporter in 2008, author of "George Dub-ya Bush, THE PHONY FIGHTER PILOT" and the creator/editor of the investigative website, www.King-George.biz

If Mr. Giuliani fails to win the GOP nomination, I think George Bush would do well to consider sending him as a special envoy to Baghdad.

Rudy obviously relishes -- and seems to cultivate -- his reputation as an urban tough guy. What better way to see if this reputation is deserved?

Edwards Stakes Out His Turf On Iraq Policy (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 15, 2007

Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) yesterday jumped back into the Iraq debate with more specifics on how the U.S. should extricate itself from the region, casting himself as the 2008 presidential contender most opposed to the war.

Edwards called on his former colleagues to go further than their non-binding criticism of President Bush's "surge" plan, recommended a lower troop ceiling than other Democrats have and charged that the original congressional authorization no longer applies to the war.

In an Iraq debate increasingly directed by sitting members and 2008 contenders such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), the 2004 vice presidential candidate, who supports a funding cutoff for the Iraq "surge," also said he would not support such a cut-off for existing operations.

"I believe we need to end the war in Iraq, but I believe it should be done in an orderly way, a smart way, so that we increase the chances of stability as we're leaving," Edwards told reporters. "So I'm not for immediate and total withdrawal."

Edwards's latest plan for Iraq includes a readiness standard similar to one House Democrats and anti-war groups are drafting as a follow-up to this week's non-binding resolution. Under the Edwards proposal, Congress would block troops from leaving for Iraq without adequate training and equipment.

The Carolinian has "done a good job articulating his critique," according to Tom Matzzie of MoveOn.org Washington, a leader of the anti-war coalition marshaling support for the readiness standard. Yet Matzzie said Edwards faces significant challenges in aiming to influence policy on which he cannot vote: "Most people are focused like a laser on the fight in Congress. … Democrats have this narrow hold on power that we want to leverage."

Edwards's strategy earned a rapid rejoinder from ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's (D) campaign, which interpreted the opposition to ending the war through immediate de-funding — Vilsack's preference — as a compliment.

"Sen. Edwards bluntly acknowledged today that Tom Vilsack has the strongest plan to end the war in Iraq," Vilsack spokesman Josh Earnest said in a statement. "Capping troop levels in Iraq is nothing more than staying the course with a Bush-led military strategy that has failed our troops and failed our country."

Clinton, Obama, Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) and other Democratic White House aspirants have proposed a pre-surge-level troop cap of about 130,000 soldiers to prevent Bush from deploying more combat forces. Edwards yesterday said added forces already have begun work in Iraq, diminishing the impact of such caps. He suggested a troop ceiling of 100,000.

That number is consistent with a previous vow Edwards made to withdraw immediately about 40,000 troops should he win the presidency. He also contended that the 2002 war authorization, for which he voted but has since apologized for approving, no longer covers Bush's continued presence in Iraq.

Democrats should force Bush "to come back to Congress to seek additional authority, which I don't think he'll get," Edwards said. He said that removing Saddam Hussein from power and disarming weapons of mass destruction — which Iraq did not possess — were the missions that lawmakers authorized in 2002.

By contrast, Clinton last week characterized her own vote to authorize as a granting of leverage for weapons inspectors to enter Iraq, but not an approval of preemptive conflict. In a speech last month, she proposed requiring a new congressional authorization if the Bush administration does not meet a broad set of benchmarks for stability in Iraq.

Dodd and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), whom Edwards name-checked yesterday, previously had asserted that the 2002 authorization does not apply to the current mission in Iraq, as had Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine), who is considering a challenge to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine).

"The original mission Congress authorized … is no longer operative," Allen said during a floor speech last week.

Kaine To Back Obama's Bid For Democratic Nomination (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

RICHMOND, Feb. 14 -- Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) plans to endorse Sen. Barack Obama for president Saturday, pledging early support from a Southern Democrat as the Illinois senator begins his campaign for the White House.

Kaine will sign onto Obama's presidential team ahead of the senator's appearance at the Virginia Democratic Party's annual fundraiser Saturday night, according to sources familiar with Kaine's decision. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they do not want to preempt the formal announcement.

Kaine's press secretary, Kevin Hall, declined to confirm the governor's intentions. A spokesman for Obama was not immediately available for comment Wednesday. Asked about Obama, Kaine grinned and said, "It's going to be a great day Saturday."

Kaine, who like Obama is a Harvard-educated civil rights lawyer, has made no secret of his admiration for the senator. Obama campaigned for Kaine in 2005 and joined him on the stump last year on behalf of U.S. Sen. James Webb (D). Obama's mother was from Kansas, where Kaine grew up.

In an interview with Washington Post editors and reporters last month, Kaine praised the other Democrats running for the 2008 presidential nomination as being part of "a deep field." He spoke effusively about Obama's personal charisma and abilities.

"Sen. Obama is just in a completely different category than anybody I've ever stood on a stage with," Kaine said in the Jan. 31 interview. "There is just a feeling of, you know, kind of a projection of hope on him from an audience that is just unreal. It's unreal."

Kaine said his time on the campaign trail with Obama has convinced him the first-term senator "is a person who has been through experiences that have given him sound judgment."

Shaun Kenney, a spokesman for the Republican Party of Virginia, said Kaine's endorsement of Obama would be in keeping with the political principles of both men.

"I don't think it's surprising that a governor who has proposed billion-dollar tax increases will endorse one of the most liberal members of the United States Senate," Kenney said Wednesday.

For Obama, an endorsement by Kaine on Saturday is an early victory in the competition for critical support among the nation's governors and in the South.

Virginia has for years been a Republican bastion for presidential candidates. But the victories of Kaine, Webb and former governor Mark R. Warner (D) have convinced many in the party that the state could be up for grabs in the 2008 election.

"Pundits might not say it's a complete tossup," Kaine said. "I just don't think it's a state to be taken for granted. And I don't think any smart presidential candidate will take it for granted."

Kaine had declared his intention to support Warner's presidential bid before his predecessor bowed out of the race late last year. In the recent Post interview, Kaine joked that Warner's decision opened the floodgates of interest from Democratic candidates.

"I had a complete pass and nobody was bugging me as long as Mark was running," Kaine said. "Since Mark got out, yeah, people have called me."

Kaine's decision to declare his intentions about Obama's candidacy almost a year before the first presidential primaries departs from recent tradition in Virginia. Warner endorsed Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) just a few days before the Virginia presidential primary, which Kerry won.

Also, it sets him at odds with some of his former political advisers. Kaine's 2005 campaign manager, Mike Henry, is the deputy campaign manager for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid. Mo Elleithee, who was communications director for Kaine's campaign, is also working for Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Making the announcement Saturday allows Kaine to tap into Obama's popularity among Virginia's Democratic activists.

Obama's speech at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner is expected to attract more than 3,000 Democrats to the Greater Richmond Convention Center, more than double the record for the event's history, according to state party officials.

Barack Obama's On-Point Message Man (WP)

By David Montgomery

DOJ_NMG_0132707

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

On Saturday in the Lincolnesque setting of Springfield, Ill., when Barack Obama delivered his full-throated appeal to the ideals of a new generation, a lot of sharp players of the political game thought they detected something Axelrodesque.

All those "Let us" sentences in the middle, as in, "Let us be the generation . . . " -- "That's Axelrod," thought political strategist Donna Brazile.

The clever rhetorical judo of Obama's oft-quoted line, "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change!" -- "That seemed very classic Axelrod," said David Wilhelm, former chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Nineteen months to the presidential election, and already the campaign has an A-Rod!

He is David Axelrod, a former newspaper reporter who has worked on past campaigns for no fewer than five of the Democrats racing to the White House, a form of political ubiquity that only enhances his reputation. This time, he's with Obama.

A measure of his status in the top tier of Democratic spinners, scripters and fixers is that when his peers detect something subtle and good, they presume Axelrod must have had a hand in it.

Of course Axelrod won't take credit for specific lines. Consultants are supposed to stay in the background. "One thing I came to realize early in the process of working with Barack was, he was always going to be the best writer in the room," Axelrod says. "If you appreciate words and the power of them, he's a wonderful person to work with. . . . I'd say 80 percent of what he did on that platform on Saturday was in that initial draft," which Obama had e-mailed to Axelrod at about 4 a.m. Thursday.

"It's more a matter of riffing back and forth than it is of my delivering any particular piece of this," Axelrod says.

Spoken like a true consultant: Indispensable, invisible.

A candidate's media consultant is the resident storyteller, the finicky language guy, the message masseur. His job is to convey the candidate to the world. Television advertising is still king, but nowadays there are so many channels of presentation, from choreographed speeches and less formal jousting with reporters -- "You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit," scolded Obama -- to Internet pitches designed to make each voter at home in his pajamas feel special.

Campaigns are narratives annotated with policy discursions. Every candidate tells a story about who he is and why he runs. The consultant's job is to take that story and make it so engrossing that the voters won't be able to put it down.

"I wanted to win or lose based on who I am and not some concoction that somebody told me the public wanted," says Deval Patrick, whom Axelrod served in his successful race to become the first African American governor of Massachusetts last year, Patrick's first campaign. "I talked to a lot of different media consultants and so forth who were brought to me by someone who knew there was such a thing as a media consultant. Of all of them, David seemed to me to be the one most determined to respect my commitment to be myself."

"What he brings to the table," says Brazile, who watched Axelrod in action on Eleanor Holmes Norton's 1990 campaign for the District's delegate to Congress, "is the ability to help a candidate not only find their voice but also their roots. Their soul. David understands how to push through all the paper to get to the person."

Axelrod, 51, says he found a story he believed and thought voters would, too, when he and Obama, 45, became friends years ago, when the recent Harvard Law School graduate was in Chicago for a voter registration drive. He worked on Obama's 2004 Senate race.

Meanwhile, over the years Axelrod also made issue ads during Hillary Clinton's 2000 New York Senate race; served Tom Vilsack's 1998 and 2002 races for governor of Iowa; worked on Sen. Christopher Dodd's (D-Conn.) 2004 reelection; and worked on John Edwards's 2004 presidential race.

"I like each one of them," Axelrod says. The Edwards experience was a little awkward when Axelrod lost responsibility for making ads but continued as a campaign spokesman. Axelrod says there were tensions not with Edwards but with others inside the campaign whom he declined to identify. A spokesman for Edwards said he had nothing further to add to Axelrod's account.

After the heady blur of Obama's three-day "announcement tour" in Illinois, Iowa and New Hampshire, with those made-for-TV images of the candidate in all his fired-up handsomeness addressing adoring crowds -- Can any campaign ever match the horizonless possibilities of Announcement Day? -- a more difficult phase has begun.

The media are already getting cranky, clamoring for programmatic specifics, seizing on the gaffe about "wasted" lives of soldiers killed in Iraq.

Axelrod skipped the New Hampshire leg of the tour and returned to his Chicago office to edit videos from the tour for uploading to the candidate's Web site.

The former Chicago Tribune newsman says he still appreciates the role of the media. But he is also helping to guide a campaign that is finding ways to sidestep the media in ways that Richard Nixon and Bill Clinton could only fantasize about. Like his rivals, Obama is using the Internet ever more elaborately, inviting supporters to blog, interact and create their own "my.barackobama.com."

DOJ_NMG_0132708

"There's an awareness that we have this channel, and we can talk in a direct and unfiltered way to our supporters," Axelrod says. "We're just in many ways introducing Barack to the American people." And then, purposely or unconsciously, he reveals that the storytelling is a battle: "We will be deploying all the possible avenues for doing that."

He grew up middle class in New York City, where he remembers being 5 years old and hoisted onto a mailbox to watch John F. Kennedy at a campaign rally for president. At 9 he handed out leaflets for Bobby Kennedy's New York Senate run. He remembers the thump of the newspaper landing outside his apartment door.

He attended the University of Chicago because he could think of no better political town.

While he was in college, his father, Joseph, a psychologist who at the age of 9 had helped other children escape the pogroms of Eastern Europe, committed suicide.

Two days after graduation, he started at the Chicago Tribune. He became a political writer, columnist and city hall bureau chief, feasting on the brash shenanigans of his adopted home town. In one column he observed, "Insults have always been a staple of Chicago politics. The town has a rich history of name-calling. Charges of thievery, homosexuality and dementia all have been part of the high-level political debate in recent years."

But he felt the "sense of mission" draining out of journalism in the 1980s, and a business mentality beginning to take hold. Also, "I thought I might tire of chasing people down the hall to get them to tell me what I already knew." He watched the bow-tied idealist Paul Simon emerging as a Senate candidate in 1984, and thought, "This is the kind of guy who inspired me."

After that first campaign, which he co-managed with Wilhelm, he worked on Harold Washington's reelection campaign for Chicago mayor. One of his steady clients is current mayor Richard M. Daley, expected to win easy reelection to a sixth term later this month despite a City Hall corruption scandal in which Daley has not been implicated.

"He has fairly strong feelings about why he's in politics and an idealistic streak that we consultants like to think we can keep," says Anita Dunn, a Democratic political strategist. "I think he has kept it."

Not that Axelrod is a softy. "He goes negative when negative is required," says Wilhelm.

In his 1996 memoir "Bare Knuckles and Back Rooms," Ed Rollins, the Republican strategist, put Axelrod at the head of a list of "Guys I Never Want to See Lobbing Grenades at Me Again."

In the tough 1999 race for mayor of Philadelphia, when Axelrod represented John Street against Sam Katz, an attack ad Axelrod oversaw was criticized in a Philadelphia Inquirer analysis for being "filled with unsubstantiated assumptions" that were "probably misleading." Axelrod says he remains "really comfortable with the attack we made." Street won the election.

Axelrod is conflicted about the profession he left journalism to enter. "I believe there is nobility in politics," he says. "I believe there is great good that can be done."

But in the next breath he adds: "I know my business and the technology of politics and polling and focus groups, all of what we do, in some ways contributes to an atmosphere of cynicism. I try to fight that. I can't say I'm totally blameless. I think everyone in this business has a hand on that bloody dagger."

Over the years he developed a sub-specialty in urban politics, particularly representing African American mayoral candidates, including Street, Anthony Williams in Washington, Dennis Archer in Detroit, Michael White of Cleveland and Lee Brown of Houston.

Through all the national political work, Axelrod says he was never tempted to leave Chicago, where he and his wife, Susan, raised their three children, now adults. He likes to quote Wilhelm saying upon leaving Washington, "I'm going back to Chicago where at least they stab you in the front."

Now he is charged, along with one of his partners, David Plouffe, Obama's campaign manager, with helping to convey another African American candidate to a wider public. Brazile says Axelrod has a gift for that sometimes delicate task.

"He understands the African American community must see themselves in the candidate, not just their successes, but also their struggle," Brazile says. "And David gets that. I think he spends a lot of time on the basketball court with brothers, because he understands the language and how to connect."

Indeed, Axelrod is a devoted pickup hoops player, with an excellent outside shot, but "don't pass to him if you ever expect to see the ball again," Wilhelm says.

The night Obama won his 2004 Senate primary, Axelrod checked the returns. Obama won the very same precinct where in 1983, a hostile mob of whites protested a visit to a Catholic church by Washington and presidential candidate Walter Mondale.

"I said to [Obama] that Harold Washington is smiling down on us for the progress we've made," Axelrod recalled. "I'm not naive, I'm not Pollyanna-ish, I understand we still have racial tensions and divisions in our country. . . . One of the qualities that he brings is the ability to transcend some of these divisions, and I think America is ready for that."

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 15, 2007

Of the thousands of people who gathered in the plaza of the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., for Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign announcement last Saturday, only a handful were protesters rather than supporters.

But there were 50 or so waving signs and chanting, "No abortion, no Obama." Their voices might become a consistent presence as the senator makes his way around the country in his bid to win the White House.

Abortion foes in Illinois, following the lead of registered nurse Jill Stanek, are targeting Obama (D-Ill.) for a number of "present" and "no" votes he cast on anti-abortion legislation during his time in the Illinois state Senate.

It is hardly unusual that a Democratic candidate would receive unfavorable attention from anti-abortion groups. But Stanek and other anti-abortion crusaders in Illinois are targeting Obama because he voted on a package of legislation collectively known as the Illinois Born Alive Infants Protection Act.

The legislation came about after Stanek, then a nurse at Christ Hospital in the Chicago suburb of Oak Lawn, witnessed late-term abortions "where babies were being aborted alive and shelved to die in the soiled utility room" of the hospital, in her words.

Stanek, who said she held one of those infants until it died after about 45 minutes, began reaching out to public officials, testifying before both state and national lawmakers.

From 2001 to 2002, Obama voted either "present" or "no" on the legislation. In his floor speeches at the time, he cited in particular his concerns about the constitutionality of the definition of a "born alive infant" and the inclusion of potential civil and criminal penalties for doctors in these situations. He also warned that the bill might compromise the relationship between a woman and her doctor.

The measure failed in the Illinois statehouse in both 2001 and 2002.

In one speech in the spring of 2001, Obama said he agreed in principle with the need to protect infants, but argued that the measure went too far in its definitions of fetal viability.

"This is an area where potentially we might have compromised and … arrived at a bill that dealt with the narrow concerns about how … a pre-viable fetus or child was treated by a hospital," Obama said at the time.

At the same time, similar legislation made its way through the federal process and was eventually signed into law by President Bush in August 2002 in Pittsburgh. Stanek, now a columnist for WorldNetDaily.com, attended the signing and was mentioned by Bush.

Separately, a Senate amendment to protect infants born alive during abortion was offered by then-Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) in 2001. It passed the Senate 98-0 with all current Democratic presidential hopefuls who were in the Senate at the time voting in favor, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Joseph Biden (Del.) and then-Sen. John Edwards (N.C.).

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) spoke on the measure on the Senate floor, saying, "I, as being a pro-choice senator on this side, representing my colleagues here, have no problem whatsoever with this amendment.

"I feel good about that," Boxer said. "I feel good that we can, in fact, vote for this together. It is very rare that we can."

Obama's campaign did not return calls for comment, but Pam Sutherland, president of the Illinois Planned Parenthood Council, said the Illinois legislation was misleading and a far cry from the Senate's legislation. Obama was aware of this difference, she added.

Sutherland noted that every medical group in the state was opposed to the state legislation, which would have opened the door to "civil suits and criminal charges" for doctors and led directly to an overall ban on abortions.

"The legislation was written to ban abortion, plain and simple," she said. "Sen. Obama saw the legislation, when he was there, for what it was."

On the narrower issue of "born alive" infants, Sutherland said, Planned Parenthood of Illinois worked last year with the anti-abortion group, the Illinois Federation of Right to Life, to pass legislation that protects infants that survive abortion procedures.

But Stanek said Obama was the only state senator to speak out on the legislation, and his actions there are "just one demonstration of how liberal he is."

"Everybody in the pro-life movement is completely aware of what Obama stands for — how bad he is," she said.

Stanek, who was one of the protesters present at Obama's announcement, said she thinks anti-abortionists "may be more up in arms" over Obama's positions "than even Hillary Clinton's" because of "his extreme position" on this specific issue. But she said she knows of no concerted effort to single Obama out for his support of abortion rights.

DOJ_NMG_0132710

Joseph Scheidler, the founder of the Chicago-based Pro-Life Action League who helped lead the protests in Springfield last Saturday, took a similar line. He said that while his group "won't concentrate on Obama," he wanted to cut through a "ga-ga" media following to ensure that voters know the senator's position on the issue.

"The others are all very clear about being pro-abortion," he said. "Obama has been clever enough … to keep voters confused."

Scheidler said anti-abortion groups around the country would make their presence known at campaign events for the Democratic candidates, and they might not reserve their criticisms for Democrats alone this year.

Scheidler said among the Republican candidates, only Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) is "the one we find to be pretty pure."

He questioned former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's "complete turnaround" on the abortion debate and Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) leadership on the issue. He also described former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani as "a nice guy" who is solidly in support of abortion rights, making him unqualified to lead the country, in his eyes.

Niche Marketing (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

When Bob Hunter, a Riverside, Calif., businessman, would hear of a conservative's campaign that needed volunteers, he would pile his family into the station wagon and drive off to ring doorbells. Hunter's son Duncan grew up believing in retail politics.

When Hunter returned home after serving as an alternate Goldwater delegate at the 1964 Republican convention in San Francisco, he told Duncan about chatting with another alternate, an amiable fellow, some actor, named Reagan. Who two years later was elected governor. Duncan learned early on about rapid upward mobility in politics.

In 1969, he dropped out of college, joined the Army and was sent to Vietnam. From there he mailed his pay to a friend who purchased for him an island in Idaho's Snake River, where Duncan farmed after his discharge. Then another friend said a San Diego law school would admit him without a college degree. In 1980, he was a lawyer with a storefront office in San Diego's Hispanic community when his father walked in and told him he could be a congressman. Never mind, his father said, that this district was only 29 percent Republican. Reagan was at the top of the ticket.

Duncan says his Baptist minister, respecting the separation of church and state, told parishioners they should vote for the Reagan of their choice. They distributed 400,000 Duncan brochures. Today, Duncan Hunter is in his 14th term representing eastern San Diego County. Three weeks ago he formally launched his presidential candidacy.

Why does he think he can become the first House member elected president since James Garfield in 1880? Why does he think he can do better than the two strongest House candidates in recent elections? In 1976, Arizona Rep. Mo Udall finished second to Jimmy Carter in the New Hampshire primary (28.4 percent to 22.7 percent), then narrowly lost Wisconsin (Carter 36.6, Udall 35.6). In 1988, Missouri Rep. Dick Gephardt won Iowa, finished second to Michael Dukakis in New Hampshire, then ran out of money.

"For some candidates," Hunter says, "the conservative constituency is an inconvenience. For me, it is my hope." He hopes to be seen as the most conservative Republican candidate, as he understands conservatism. He is pro-life, an expert on defense issues, a hawk on border security (he authored the legislation that mandates 854 miles of fences across the major southern border routes used by smugglers of narcotics and people) and a skeptic about free trade.

He chaired the Armed Services Committee in the previous two Congresses and believes that the principal issue for the foreseeable future will be national security -- not just Iraq and terrorism but also the rise of China's military (perhaps nine submarines under construction, with five more to come; the purchase of Russian-built destroyers designed to attack U.S. aircraft carriers with very fast and sophisticated missiles; upward of 800 medium-range ballistic missiles deployed). He believes U.S. forces can pacify Iraq, where his son served two tours as a Marine.

Asked what his wife said when he told her he was running for president, he pauses, then says, smiling: "She's happy now." She seems remarkably resilient. Not long after a wildfire consumed his house, he asked her, "Honey, can you do a fundraiser in two weeks?" She said, "Sure. My son is in Fallujah, my house has burned down, how many people do you want to invite?"

"God bless New Hampshire," Hunter says, noting that its population (1.3 million) is less than half that of San Diego County. But he almost certainly overestimates the power of retail politics in a nominating process that is becoming increasingly compressed. California, Illinois, New Jersey and Florida might move their primaries to Feb. 5. If they do, both parties' nominees might be known a year from now. Hunter won what might have been the first contest of this presidential cycle -- the Maricopa County (Phoenix) straw poll. It's a start. He says he has $300,000 "in pledges," a sum that could be a rounding error in the McCain campaign's accounts. But he says, "I kind of know what I stand for" so "I don't need consultants, and that saves a lot of money." He has produced some commercials -- just talking to the camera -- for $200.

One-third of new businesses fail within two years; 50 to 70 percent of new products that make it to market fail. Hunter, a burly, rumpled political product seeking a market niche, probably will fail. But as Goldwater said when he entered politics in Phoenix in 1949, "It ain't for life, and it may be fun."

Al Franken Enters Minnesota Senate Race (AP)

By Patrick Condon

AP, February 15, 2007

Al Franken announced Wednesday that he will run for the Senate in 2008, making it clear that the comedian and author of "Rush Limbaugh Is A Big Fat Idiot" wants to be taken seriously as a political figure.

Franken said he would seek the Democratic nomination to challenge Republican incumbent Norm Coleman and immediately acknowledged the doubts voters may have about electing a former "Saturday Night Live" performer.

"Minnesotans have a right to be skeptical about whether I'm ready for this challenge, and to wonder how seriously I would take the responsibility that I'm asking you to give me," Franken said in a video on his Web site.

"I want you to know: Nothing means more to me than making government work better for the working families of this state, and over the next 20 months, I look forward to proving to you that I take these issues seriously," he said.

Franken's announcement came on the final day of his show on the liberal radio network Air America. His decision instantly makes him a serious contender and brings national attention to the race. He said he supports universal health care, greater efforts to find alternative energy sources and stronger congressional oversight of the executive branch.

Franken had been considering a run since 2003. He said several weeks ago that he would leave Air America and privately told prominent Democrats about his plans to seek office.

His name is well-known, and Franken is likely to be well-funded, but he's expected to be challenged by several other Democrats, including wealthy trial attorney Mike Ciresi. Franken said he would abandon his campaign if Democratic activists decide to support another candidate in the primary.

The race will be important to Democratic efforts to retain the slim Senate majority they secured last year.

His candidacy will also test whether Minnesotans are in the mood for another celebrity-turned-politician, after the 1999-2003 governorship of former pro wrestler Jesse Ventura. Ventura's fame and occasionally outrageous behavior regularly brought national attention to the state but wore on the patience of many Minnesotans.

Stephen Hess, a professor of political science at George Washington University, said Franken's bid is serious. "He's not doing this as some folks have done it to give them better gigs on the Borscht circuit."

Coleman is viewed as vulnerable because of a Democratic resurgence in Minnesota and President Bush's unpopularity. But his proven skills as a campaigner and fundraiser make him a formidable opponent.

State GOP Chairman Ron Carey suggested Franken moved back to Minnesota when he smelled opportunity and will have a tough time connecting with voters.

Franken is "going to have to explain to Minnesota how he represents his values when he spent pretty much all of his adult life in New York and Hollywood," Carey said.

Franken, 55, was born in New York City but grew up in the Minneapolis suburb of St. Louis Park. He graduated from Harvard University in 1973, and in 1975 joined the writing staff of "Saturday Night Live" during its first season. He soon began appearing in sketches and remained a fixture on the show well into the 1990s.

In 1996, Franken took his career in a political direction when he wrote "Rush Limbaugh Is A Big Fat Idiot and Other Observations," a broadside against the conservative radio host and other figures on the right. He's since published several other books critical of Republicans.

In his latest book, "The Truth (with jokes)," Franken criticized Coleman for his leadership of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, saying Coleman had not held a single hearing on Iraq war corruption.

Franken planned to make his first public appearance as a candidate Thursday at a Minneapolis clinic.

No Joke, Al Franken Is Running For Senate (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Comedian Al Franken said yesterday that he will run for the Senate in Minnesota, giving Democrats the possibility of a celebrity candidate to face Sen. Norm Coleman, considered one of the most vulnerable Republicans in 2008.

"Minnesotans have a right to be skeptical about whether I'm ready for this challenge, and to wonder how seriously I would take the responsibility that I'm asking you to give me," Franken said in a video on his Web site. "I want you to know: Nothing means more to me than making government work better for the working families of this state, and over the next 20 months, I look forward to proving to you that I take these issues seriously," he said.

In the 2006 midterm elections, Franken's Midwest Values political action committee raised more than $1 million to benefit Democratic candidates. Cementing relationships for a future Senate run, Franken traveled the state to entertain at candidate rallies.

Franken, 55, is also likely to have access to wealthy fundraisers in Hollywood to fund his campaign.

Coleman, a first-term senator, has faced backlash in Minnesota over his party's support for the Iraq war.

Last year, he told The Washington Post that Franken's "liberal base and Hollywood supporters have supplied him with tens of thousands of dollars to promote his extreme view."

First, Franken will probably have to square off against other Democratic contenders, including Mike Ciresi, a well-known trial lawyer who spent millions on a 2000 primary campaign for Senate but lost by a small margin.Romney's Predecessor Backs McCain

Republican Jane Swift said she was backing Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), according to his exploratory committee. "McCain is a principled leader whose unwavering determination to improve the lives of Americans is admirable," she said in a statement.

Swift was the Massachusetts lieutenant governor and in 2001 succeeded Paul Cellucci as governor when Cellucci resigned to become U.S. ambassador to Canada. The next year, Romney challenged her for the gubernatorial nomination and won.

For Davis, It May Be Up Or Out (RC)

By Susan Davis And Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

Most politicians tend to be wary of discussing their own futures. But Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) is remarkably candid about the crossroads he is approaching in Congress.

In a Tuesday interview, Davis said unambiguously that he will run for the Senate in 2008 if five-term Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) decides to retire.

“It is safe to say that I would run,” Davis said. “But if he does run, I would stand out front and take a bullet for him. I think the world of John. I would not do anything to undermine that.”

Davis also acknowledged that this could be his last term in Congress. He views 2008 as his best opportunity for a Senate run, and regardless of Warner’s decision he has doubts about seeking an eighth term in the House.

“I’ve talked to most of [the Virginia GOP delegation] and they all understand what I want to do at this point if [the Senate seat] opens. If it doesn’t open then that would probably be my last shot at doing anything state-wide,” he conceded, adding that he has little to no interest in other statewide offices such as the governorship.

Speculation abounded in the 109th Congress that Davis was mulling retirement, particularly as word surfaced in late 2005 that his name was floated to head up the powerful National Federation of Independent Business.

He is one Republican whose minority status would be unlikely to hurt his chances to land a lucrative job on K Street or elsewhere in the private sector, as he has built a reputation around his ability to work with Democrats.

Davis admitted that he considered retiring last year, but opted to run again in part because he believed the poor political climate would have led to Democrats picking up his Northern Virginia-based seat.

Davis, a former two-term chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, is known as a cerebral tactician, and he often appears more comfortable talking about district demographics and historic electoral trends than the issues of the day.

“I think had I left last year, which we contemplated doing, [the seat] would have gone. I don’t think there’s any way you would have held the seat last year, but I don’t know that in 2008 we couldn’t hold the seat with the right candidate,” he said, adding that his leaving would depend greatly on his confidence that a Republican will take the seat.

“I haven’t made any decisions on anything at this point, but if I were to leave I’ll make sure we had a strong candidate lined up,” he said. “I’ve spent too much time building majorities as campaign chairman to just desert this seat.”

Had Republicans not lost the majority in November, Davis currently would be in his third, and last, term as chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee. If Republicans were to win a majority in 2008, Davis would lay claim to the gavel for one more term, which he noted is “not an irrelevant consideration” in weighing the pros of staying in the House.

Yet Davis’ tenure as chairman, coupled with his willingness to buck the party on certain issues, has sometimes made him the target of ire from his GOP colleagues. Heading into the 2006 election cycle, Davis was one of the more prominent

Republicans publicly conceding that the majority was lost and the GOP was headed to a 30-seat loss, at a minimum — a pronouncement that did not engender good will from the rank-and-file or his own leadership.

He sent warning signals to the NRCC and then-Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) in private memos last year advising the leadership to take certain legislative steps to head off losses, including enacting stronger lobbying and ethics reforms, that largely went unheeded.

An Independent Chairman

More than most GOP chairmen, Davis demonstrated a willingness to scrutinize the Bush administration, and his solid working relationship with his Democratic counterpart, Rep. Henry Waxman (Calif.), on the committee sometimes aggravated more partisan GOP lawmakers.

"Being a committee chairman does not mean being negative all the time, that's just not my style. When we think the Democratic majority is doing the wrong thing we're going to be the first to blow the whistle on that," he said. Democrats "are not wrong in everything they do, and we still have to move bills and shape bills and the like."

Davis noted that he already has opposed the new Democratic majority on a number of policy issues, including a recent energy bill and legislation to raise the minimum wage. "I'm hardly a shill for them, but they are not wrong on everything."

Now Waxman wields the gavel and Davis says the two continue to share a solid working relationship and regularly communicate on committee business. He said their shared stewardship over the committee's controversial hearings in the 109th Congress over steroid use in professional baseball forged a strong bond.

"Everybody was against us when we did that, but we stayed together on that and it was good team-building for the committee. Nobody wanted to touch us when we started this thing. The president didn't like it, [Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.)] didn't like it, but they all came around," he said. "You don't go through a team-building experience like that without building some rapport."

He also inflamed his colleagues, GOP leaders, and the White House when he and Waxman released a committee report only weeks before the midterm election already tainted by GOP scandals that detailed disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's contacts with the administration and ultimately led to the resignation of Susan Ralston, a top aide to White House adviser Karl Rove.

Davis acknowledged Wednesday that there was blow-back from the decision to release the report so close to Election Day, but was he unapologetic about the move.

"There's never good timing for an Abramoff investigation," Davis said. "Look, this was the largest scandal to invoke Congress in 20 years and you didn't want to say 'Republicans aren't doing anything.' In fact, I feel a little bit vindicated because after [Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.)] and stuff, all this became blown up and lack of oversight became a major charge."

As for the House's current debate, Davis plans to join several of his moderate GOP colleagues this week by voting in favor of the Democratic resolution disapproving of President Bush's Iraq strategy.

The Political Junkie

Despite Davis' independent streak, his colleagues continue to rely on his prowess as a political tactician. NRCC Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) asked Davis to serve as his No. 2 for the upcoming 2008 election cycle as chairman of the executive committee.

Despite rumors last year, Davis denied that he ever considered another bid for the chairmanship. "If I really wanted to take a leadership role I would have run again for the chairmanship," he said. "Tom Cole is a very good guy, a very smart guy, and I'm only doing it because he asked me. It's nothing I would have volunteered for."

Davis said there is no guarantee Republicans can regain a majority in one election cycle. "Nobody can answer that at this point because we don't have any idea what the issue matrix will be, where the war will be, who the presidential candidates will be, but those are the major variables," he said. "Having said that, looking at broad outlines, we have a number of Democrats who were carried in last time who were not first-tier candidates who will probably be vulnerable to a strong Republican challenge."

Davis said there were "six to eight" seats that Republicans have a very strong chance to reclaim in 2008, including the seats formerly held by GOP Reps. Tom DeLay (Texas), Richard Pombo (Calif.) and Don Sherwood (Pa.), as well as Foley and Bob Ney (Ohio).

The Virginian

But Davis also knows that opening up a Democratic-trending seat like the one that he holds won't be helpful to the GOP's cause to make up ground lost in 2006.

Fairfax County Board of Supervisors Chairman Gerry Connelly (D) is viewed as likely to run for Davis' seat. Davis used the same board position as a springboard to Congress in 1994 and Connelly would be a strong contender.

DOJ_NMG_0132714

While Davis said he would not abandon his seat without lining up a top-flight candidate — one who would undoubtedly fit the Congressman's same moderate ideological mold — it also isn't likely that conservatives in the district would pass up the opportunity to nominate one of their own.

If that happens, the fight for Davis' seat could become an important junction in the larger struggle now facing Virginia Republicans, who rose to political dominance in the state in the mid-to-late 1990s.

Republicans have lost the past two statewide elections in the Commonwealth, and Northern Virginia is expected to be the epicenter of Democratic efforts to pick up state legislative seats this fall. Davis' wife, state Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R), is among those facing a tough re-election contest.

Davis has been a vocal critic of his party's growing reliance on catering to the needs of its conservative base, and if he does get the opportunity to seek statewide office it will be a test of whether party elders have been listening to his sermons.

He argues that Republicans' old formula for getting elected — managing losses in Northern Virginia and then making it up with large margins in the rest of the state — is outdated and that his party will continue to lose if it does not accept that.

"The last Republican to be nominated from Northern Virginia was 1981 when it was 15 percent of the vote, now it's doubled, and growing," he said. "So I think anybody can do the math and say we need to bring it into the coalition. That means an acceptance sometimes of candidates that are going to have a little bit different issue matrix than people from southern Virginia."

As a start, one of Davis' constituents recently became state Republican Party chairman. Ed Gillespie, a lobbyist and former Republican National Committee chairman, took the reins of the party recently, although Davis said that his new position requires paying more attention to the party base.

If Warner does retire, Davis hardly would have the GOP field to himself. Former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore (R), who already has launched a quixotic 2008 presidential bid, has indicated interest in another statewide run and several of Davis' House colleagues have Senate ambitions as well.

Davis has been the most aggressive in laying the groundwork for a 2008 run, spending part of the previous cycle traveling around the state.

But Davis also spent the bulk of his campaign war chest in 2006 not taking anything for granted in his race against an unknown and underfunded Democratic challenger.

He spent $3.3 million on his re-election , including more than $105,000 for polling despite the fact that he was not viewed as particularly vulnerable.

The survey data — much of which looked far beyond his own House race — is just one indication of how intimately involved Davis is in the local politics of his 11th district, which takes in most of Fairfax County and portions of Prince William County.

In the previous cycle he donated $45,000 to the Fairfax County Republican Committee, $45,000 to the Republican Party of Virginia and $180,000 to the NRCC.

The Congressman — who once coached a Little League team with now-Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) — also knows the importance of the grass roots.

In the previous cycle he also gave $7,300 to Little League teams in his district.

Appellate Court Hears Dispute On Stem-cell Initiative (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

The California Court of Appeal in San Francisco heard oral arguments Wednesday in the 2-year-old dispute that has kept the state's voter-created stem-cell institute from issuing any of the $3 billion in bonds approved under Proposition 71, the 2004 stem-cell research initiative.

The plaintiffs in the two consolidated lawsuits are appealing a decision by the Alameda County Superior Court in April that upheld the constitutionality of the institute and its citizen oversight committee.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs -- the People's Advocate, National Tax Limitation Foundation and California Family Bioethics Council -- argued again that Proposition 71 was unconstitutional because it created a taxpayer-funded entity that is not under the direct management and control of the state. They also argued that the proposition violated the single-subject rule for such measures and that the citizen board has conflicts of interest.

The three-judge panel, whose members interrupted the plaintiff's arguments numerous times, has 90 days to rule but is expected to do so relatively quickly. Both sides have said they would appeal to the California Supreme Court. Meanwhile, the stem-cell institute plans to award $24 million in research grants Friday, drawing on a state loan and private donations. The institute last year awarded $12 million in training grants to 16 California institutions.

New Congress, New Lobbyists (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- After Democrats took over Congress earlier this year, they set new limits on lobbyists, aiming to reduce their influence on Capitol Hill.

But the launch of a new firm, Heather Podesta+Partners, shows that, rather than diminishing the clout of Democratic lobbyists, the new Congress has led to the creation of a fresh crop, whose sway could grow even more as the 2008 presidential campaign heats up.

Ms. Podesta's tale illustrates how hard it is to cut the link between lobbyists and politicians. These relationships often forged at the start of careers, when working together on Capitol Hill as low-level staff or while knocking on doors along the campaign trail.

During the first week of the new Congress, freshly sworn-in House leader Nancy Pelosi was in the Capitol's speaker's lobby one evening greeting Ms. Podesta with a kiss on the cheek. Ms. Podesta was there to pose in the official swearing-in photo for California Democratic Rep. Ellen Tauscher, a long-time friend who had advised Ms. Podesta on setting up her firm -- an enterprise she launched based on her confidence in maneuvering the reshaped corridors of power.

After Democrats' victory in November, Ms. Podesta's friends on Capitol Hill suddenly were more powerful -- and her links to them more valuable to clients seeking to influence Congress. That helped Ms. Podesta to build a roster of clients -- such as software provider SAP Americas, which has an interest in new patent legislation, as well as HealthSouth Corp. and health-care provider Cigna Corp., which are concerned by talk of cuts in Medicare payments.

"There will never be a better time to do this," Ms. Podesta said, about launching her firm.

Capitol Hill Career

Ms. Podesta, 37 years old, has worked on and off as a Capitol Hill staffer and lawyer since graduating from the University of California at Berkeley. She worked as an aide to the late Rep. Bob Matsui (D., Calif.), an ally of then-Minority Whip Pelosi. That job gave her a seat at Ms. Pelosi's strategy sessions.

In 2003, she married Tony Podesta, a Democratic lobbyist and brother of former Clinton White House Chief of Staff John Podesta.

Ms. Podesta left Capitol Hill in 2004 to become a lawyer and lobbyist at Blank Rome LLP., a rare Democrat in a Republican-leaning firm, and eventually became a major Democratic fund-raiser. The Podestas estimate they raised $1 million for Democratic candidates in last year's congressional campaign.

For Washington Sen. Maria Cantwell, Ms. Podesta flew in four female chefs from Seattle to prepare one course each for a fund-raiser. She had Alice Waters, founder of California's Chez Panisse, prepares meals at an event for Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow event. After the election, Blank Rome offered to make her an equity partner while other firms tried to recruit her away. It was a turning point: "I had to decide if I wanted to invest in the firm or in me," she recalls.

On Dec. 15, she chose the latter. She turned for advice to Ms. Tauscher, a former Wall Street executive poised to lead the moderate New Democrat Coalition. Ms. Tauscher, who was elected in 1996, became friends with Ms. Podesta after working with her on Capitol Hill and socializing at Democratic events. Their first topic: the firm's name. Ms. Podesta leaned dramatic: "Butterfly-Sting Strategies" and "Velvet Steel Strategies." Ms. Tauscher nixed the word "strategies" and urged a name with a clear message.

Before opening her firm Jan. 1, Ms. Podesta persuaded all her Blank Rome clients to shift at least some of their business to her new shop. She scrambled to have business cards ready by Jan. 3, the opening of the new Congress.

Setting Up Shop

On the morning of Jan. 4, she headed to the Senate Rules Committee room for the swearing-in reception for Maryland Democratic Sen. Ben Cardin, whose campaign she helped with three events raising more than $100,000. Sporting a "Madame Speaker 2007" pin she had received at the previous day's Pelosi tea party, Ms. Podesta positioned herself in Sen. Cardin's path.

"Hi, Heather. Thank you," he said, amid a hug from another well-wisher. Ms. Podesta offered congratulations and departed. "That's a twofer. Done," she says, noting he recognized her and remembered her support.

After a taxi ride -- during which she made a pitch about her firm's lobbying services on her cellphone to HealthSouth -- she caught Independent-Democrat Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, as he arrived for lunch in a ballroom across town. Mr. Lieberman called, "Heather, you look marvelous."

By day's end, Ms. Podesta had given away dozens of business cards, cornered several executives at parties, and greeted almost every new Democratic senator.

DOJ_NMG_0132716

In addition to HealthSouth, Cigna and SAP, clients on her first lobbyist disclosure report filed last week, include Michigan's Thomas M. Cooley Law School; Aramark Corp., a food and uniform provider; and the Casey Family Foundation, which provides foster-care services and prepares studies circulated on Capitol Hill. Her fees range from $15,000 to $35,000 a month. Ms. Podesta estimated her monthly business income at the end of January at about $100,000.

Ms. Podesta says she isn't concerned the new lobbying rules will hurt her ability to represent clients on Capitol Hill. She says she doesn't need to pay for politicians' lunches or plane rides to get access.

Ms. Tauscher says she can remain friends with Ms. Podesta without being unduly influenced. "My job is to listen to everybody and then make decisions that can be supported by facts," she says.

Looking to 2008

Nadeam Elshami, a spokesman for Ms. Pelosi, downplays the significance of the speaker's interactions with Ms. Podesta saying: "The Democratic majority broke the link between lobbyists and legislators by passing bipartisan landmark reforms to restore accountability, honesty, and openness to the House of Representatives."

In the midst of pitching clients and filing corporate organizing papers, Ms. Podesta also has been sought after as a fund-raiser by Democratic presidential hopefuls Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton. She has known all of them for years.

On Feb. 1, Ms. Podesta decided to join the Clinton camp. "Hillary's in and so am I," Ms. Podesta said, in a telephone call with the campaign's finance director, Jonathan Mantz.

Mr. Mantz outlined the campaign's plans to set up a regional fund-raising network spanning the country. Ms. Podesta agreed to try to generate $250,000 for the Clinton campaign. "The maximum I can do is $4,600," Ms. Podesta confirms, committing to the top amount permitted from an individual for the primary and general election. "I'm going to do that today," she adds.

"Beautiful," Mr. Mantz says.

Majority Formalizes K St. Ties (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, February 15, 2007

As Congressional Democrats firm their grip on power, they are opening a regular channel of communication with corporate lobbyists.

Leaders from the new majorities in both chambers have begun meeting twice a month with K Street allies to keep them apprised of their agenda and strategy.

The huddles, organized by the centrist think tank Third Way, are bringing together as many as 80 lobbyists to hear updates from Democratic leadership aides.

Lobbyists familiar with the meetings said they are becoming a hot ticket as Democrats wrap up work on their “100 hours” agenda and turn their focus toward formulating plans for the rest of the year.

“The pivot to regular order means that everybody is really focused on how to start putting together the coalitions to get things done, and how to find ways to work with the business community so there isn’t a constant battle,” said one Democratic lobbyist with ties to leadership.

Unlike their predecessors in the GOP, Democratic leaders face the challenge of juggling two key but regularly conflicting constituencies: business and labor. While members of those two camps found a few areas of agreement during the previous Congress — most notably on pension and immigration reform — they are ramping up for battles on big-ticket items this year. They already have locked horns on a minimum-wage hike and foresee major clashes over health care, trade and union-organizing measures.

And while Democratic leaders are keeping corporate interests attuned to their plans, they are closely coordinating with labor unions, whose backing helped restore the party to power. On Wednesday, presidents of about a half-dozen major unions met with majority leaders in both chambers to discuss their priorities. Twenty-two Senators, including Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), turned out for one meeting. Union officials got a separate audience with a full complement of leaders on the other side of the Capitol, including Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), according to those in attendance.

“There was a recognition that we won’t get everything we want done this year, but [Democratic leaders] expressed their happiness at being in the majority, and everybody from the union side shared that opinion,” said one source at the meetings.

DOJ_NMG_0132717

The organization started the event to replace one founded by Senate Democratic aides. The original meeting, informally known as the Monday Group, was shuttered early last year when Democrats on Capitol Hill grew nervous about appearances while seeking to make ethics reform a central campaign message.

While the crowd at the new meeting claims many familiar faces and is still held on alternating Mondays, there are some differences. It has moved from its original location at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee to a rented conference room in the Hall of States Building on North Capitol Street. House aides are now looped in. And the ranks of K Streeters in attendance have grown, including some Republicans.

"The list is large and very inclusive. We've got nothing to hide," said Matt Bennett, Third Way's vice president for public affairs and a co-chairman of the meeting.

He said fundraising pitches from leadership are off-limits, as are lobbying pitches from the crowd. Instead, the session provides an opportunity for information sharing on the issue of the day. A meeting on Jan. 22, the day before the State of the Union address, focused on the Democratic response to the president's speech. Another, earlier this month, centered on the Iraq War debate in the Senate and a report from the House Democrats' retreat.

"There's so much misinformation in this town. It's like a game of telephone: When you get two steps removed, the information gets less accurate," said Jonathon Jones, who co-founded the original meetings as chief of staff to Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.). Now a lobbyist with Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland & Stewart, Jones co-hosts the meetings with Bennett. "This is an opportunity for leadership to communicate directly with people downtown and give them the facts."

One lobbyist in regular attendance added, "There is no such thing as too much information being put out to the public, no such thing as too much dialogue."

The next meeting, scheduled for Feb. 26, will feature two top Reid aides — Penny Lee, senior adviser for communications, and Mark Wetjen, counsel and senior policy adviser — and, from the House, Gina Mahoney, Hoyer's senior policy adviser, according to an invitation.

Bush Rejects Criticism Over Korean Nuclear Deal (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, February 15, 2007

US President George W. Bush has rejected criticism of a breakthrough nuclear deal with North Korea and launched a personal bid to press Pyongyang to live up to its commitments.

Bush telephoned Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun and they agreed to work together to ensure North Korea kept its side of the pact adopted at six-nation talks in Beijing this week.

Speaking at a White House press conference, the US leader said the agreement aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear weapons was a "good first step" but added "there is a lot of work to be done to make sure that the commitments made in this agreement become a reality."

Bush defended the deal against critics, including from his key conservative base, who said that offering aid and other guarantees to North Korea in return for disbanding its nuclear network was rewarding "bad behavior" and a sign of US weakness.

Among the agreement's vocal critics was Washington's former envoy to the United Nations, John Bolton, who called it "a very bad deal" that shows US weakness at a time when Washington is challenging Iran over its controversial nuclear program.

It also "undercuts" UN sanctions resolutions against North Korea, Bolton said.

"I strongly disagree, strongly disagree with his assessment," Bush said, however.

The US leader said he wanted to solve the North Korean nuclear crisis peacefully and that he had "an obligation to try all diplomatic means necessary to do so.

"I changed the dynamic on the North Korean issue by convincing other people to be at the table with us on the theory that the best diplomacy is diplomacy in which there is more than one voice that has got an equity in the issue speaking," he explained.

"Now, those who say the North Koreans have got to prove themselves by actually following through in the deal are right, and I'm one," he said.

Under the accord, North Korea will be given 50,000 tonnes of fuel aid for closing their key Yongbyon nuclear facility north of Pyongyang and allowing UN nuclear inspectors back into the country.

The hardline Stalinist state would eventually receive one million tonnes if the accord advances as planned and it permanently disables key facilities.

The United States, for its part, would begin the process of delisting the North as a sponsor of terrorism and normalizing relations with a country with which it is still technically at war, dating back to the 1950s Korean conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0132718

Bush on Wednesday telephoned Japanese Prime Minister Abe and South Korean President Roh, who "agreed on the importance of close coordination on North Korea," said US National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

Bush said the accord "has provided a way forward for North Korea, but that North Korea must live up to its commitments. The Japanese and South Korean leaders pledged to make sure that North Korea does so," Johndroe added.

Roh's spokesman and a Japanese press agency confirmed that the allies had agreed to keep pressure on Pyongyang to abide by the terms of the agreement unveiled Tuesday.

Bush said China and Russia together with US military allies South Korea and Japan had played a crucial role in moving to end the nuclear crisis afflicting the Korean peninsula.

"Perhaps the most significant voice that had been added to the table was China," he said.

Bush also promised to step up food aid to impoverished North Korea if Kim Jong-Il's regime took "verifiable measures" to end its nuclear weapons program.

On the question of US financial sanctions on North Korea, Bush said it should be treated "separate" from the nuclear weapons issue, even though US chief negotiator Christopher Hill said Monday that Washington intended to resolve the matter within 30 days.

Accusing Pyongyang of money laundering and counterfeiting, the United States imposed the sanctions in 2005, effectively freezing 24 million dollars in North Korean funds in Macau-based Banco Delta Asia.

Meanwhile Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told Russian journalists that Moscow plans a "radical reduction" in the debt it is owed by North Korea.

"We are discussing settling the debt," he said. "Conditions can vary but in any event it will be a radical reduction in the North Korean debt.

On Thursday officials from the two Koreas prepared to hold talks aimed at reviving a high-level dialogue and possibly open the way for major aid shipments.

Seoul's delegation, led by Lee Kwan-Se, an assistant unification minister, left for Kaesong early Thursday for the one-day working-level talks, Yonhap news agency reported.

"We hope to make substantive progress not only in a solution to the North's nuclear weapons programme, but also in the government's policy of peace and prosperity by resuming the cabinet-level talks," Unification Minister Lee Jae-Joung told the team.

Conservatives Assail North Korea Accord (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

The White House yesterday found itself fending off a conservative revolt over the North Korea nuclear deal, even scrambling to mollify one of its own top officials who expressed sharp disagreement with a provision that could spring Pyongyang from the list of countries that sponsor terrorism, U.S. officials said yesterday.

Elliott Abrams, a deputy national security adviser, fired off e-mails expressing bewilderment over the agreement and demanding to know why North Korea would not have to first prove it had stopped sponsoring terrorism before being rewarded with removal from the list, according to officials who reviewed the messages.

John R. Bolton, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called the agreement -- in which North Korea would freeze its main nuclear facility in exchange for an initial supply of fuel oil -- "a bad deal" that violated principles that were closely held in the beginning of the Bush administration.

And the National Review, a conservative bastion, yesterday slammed the agreement as essentially the same one negotiated by President Bill Clinton in 1994 -- a charge the Bush administration rejects. "When exactly did Kim Jong Il become trustworthy?" the magazine's editors asked. The Wall Street Journal editorial page, normally a Bush supporter, also condemned the accord yesterday as "faith-based nonproliferation."

Bolton's comments, the barbs from conservative publications and the Abrams e-mails reflected deep concerns among conservatives that the agreement could turn out to be an important and troubling turning point. Current and former Bush officials said they fear that after six years they are losing control of foreign policy to more pragmatic forces. The shift, they said, has become especially apparent with the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld, who as defense secretary was often seen as a counterweight to State.

More specifically, conservatives said, they worry that the administration's willingness to bend on North Korea does not bode well for hard-line policies toward Iran, the Palestinians or other issues. Indeed, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov yesterday called on the United States to demonstrate "the same flexibility, a sensible flexibility" toward Iran's nuclear program.

At a news conference yesterday, Bush appeared irritated by criticism from Bolton, once a leader of the administration's conservatives. When a reporter mentioned that Bolton, whom Bush championed, had called it a bad deal, Bush smiled ruefully. "I strongly disagree, strongly disagree with his assessment," Bush said.

Abrams, a legendary bureaucratic infighter and outspoken neoconservative, is responsible for policies aimed at promoting democracy overseas. Officials who reviewed his e-mails on the nuclear deal would not quote from them but described the messages because they agreed with the concerns and wanted to make public the depth of disagreement within the administration. They said Abrams appeared frustrated because so many key decisions had been made at the highest levels without much vetting by officials scattered across the government.

Abrams, they said, was especially concerned about a section of the agreement that stated: "The U.S. will begin the process of removing the designation of the DPRK as a state-sponsor of terrorism, and advance the process of terminating the application of the Trading with the Enemy Act with respect to the DPRK." DPRK is the abbreviation of North Korea's official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. Countries that are on the U.S. terrorism list are subject to trade and other sanctions.

In an e-mail that Abrams sent to officials involved in Asia policy and nonproliferation policy, he reminded the recipients that, in a deal with Libya on abandoning weapons of mass destruction, the United States said it would start a "delisting" process only if Libya ended its support for terrorism -- and that the terrorism track was separate from the weapons deal.

When one of the Asia experts replied that the process was young, Abrams shot back that he thought that section of the deal was bad.

Gordon Johndroe, a National Security Council spokesman, did not dispute this account but said: "Initial press reports on the six-party-talks agreement sparked a discussion among staff that were seeking clarification of some of the deal's aspects. All has been clarified, and we look forward to implementation."

The provision that irritated Abrams has also sparked concern in Japan, which fears that the United States will remove North Korea from the terrorism list before North Korea has come clean on its kidnappings of Japanese citizens decades ago. Bush tried to mollify those concerns in a phone call yesterday with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe. The State Department says North Korea has not committed a terrorist act since the 1987 bombing of a Korean Air Lines flight.

Bush defended the nuclear agreement as a "unique deal," in part because of his decision to bring in other nations, such as China.

"I changed the dynamic on the North Korean issue by convincing other people to be at the table with us on the theory that the best diplomacy is diplomacy in which there is more than one voice," Bush said.

Bolton later stood by his criticism. "I'm very sad about the president's change in policy," he said in an interview. "The policy as originally articulated and implemented in the first term was exactly right. There's no need to change it. The pressure was what brought North Korea to the table originally. Why get rid of the pressure?"

Asked if he felt disloyal to Bush, who stood by him through a long and ultimately unsuccessful Senate confirmation fight, Bolton said: "I didn't say anything for a good long time, and I wouldn't have said anything if they hadn't changed the policy. I'm loyal to the original policy."

South Korea And Japan Split On North Korea Pact (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

TOKYO, Feb. 14 — The deal to freeze North Korea's nuclear program has had immediate ripple effects in Japan and South Korea, apparently freeing South Korea's hands and tying Japan's.

A day after the accord was brokered, requiring the North to shut its main nuclear reactor in return for food and fuel assistance, the South Korean government invited North Korea to resume ministerial talks suspended after its nuclear test last October. Seoul announced that officials from both sides had agreed to meet Thursday in Kaesong, just north of the demilitarized zone.

"What is very important about the agreement is that it not only resolves the North Korea nuclear issue itself," South Korea's president, Roh Moo-hyun, said, "but, in a further step, it includes a clause for discussions, negotiations on establishing a permanent peace regime on the Korean Peninsula."

But in Tokyo, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe came under attack from members of the opposition and his own party for his government's refusal to provide assistance to the North over what it says are unresolved cases of Japanese abducted by North Korean agents. Critics said Tokyo's narrow focus on this issue, seemingly at the expense of regional stability, would leave it isolated.

"We must not be isolated and we are not in fact isolated," Mr. Abe said in Parliament. "Other countries understood our decision not to provide oil unless progress is made in the abduction issue."

South Korea, by contrast, appeared set to resume its economic and diplomatic engagement of the North, a policy that had long strained its relations with the Bush administration. "It will be easier for President Roh to carry out his engagement policy now, maybe even further than he ever had," said Shin Jung-wha, a political scientist at Dongseo University in Pusan, South Korea.

The deal also made it more unlikely that South Korea would alter its policy even if the conservative opposition were to win in next December's presidential election. "Many Koreans feel that President Roh has been too lenient on North Korea," Ms. Shin said. "But there is a national consensus on the engagement policy, and, if the conservatives gain power next December, there might be a few tweaks but no fundamental change in the policy."

In Japan's case, Mr. Abe's government tied the nuclear talks to the cases of Japanese abducted by the North in the 1970s. The North has acknowledged kidnapping a dozen Japanese and it returned five survivors four years ago, saying the rest had died. But Japan says more survivors remain in the North.

Mr. Abe made his political career by championing the abduction issue, which critics say he has exploited to stir nationalist sentiments. Analysts say it would be difficult for Mr. Abe, whose approval ratings have plummeted after a series of scandals and gaffes, to compromise on the issue.

At the same time, refusing to assist North Korea in keeping with the accord could lead to charges that Japan was putting regional stability at risk over a domestic issue that has little resonance outside Japan.

"Japan should be conducting diplomacy with a broader perspective," said Makoto Taniguchi, president of Iwate Prefectural University in Japan and a former senior diplomat. "It should be thinking of Asian security and peace. If Japan thinks narrowly, only of its relations with the United States at the expense of its relations with its neighbors, it will find itself excluded.

"Japanese diplomacy has, so to speak, been abducted by the abduction issue," Mr. Taniguchi added.

The Japanese government said it hoped to address the abduction issue in a working group established under the accord and aimed at normalizing relations between Japan and North Korea. Tokyo has said it would not normalize relations with the North and provide it with reparations for its colonial rule unless the abducted Japanese were accounted for.

But Japan's emphasis on the abductions in the working group is likely to bring forth a long list of historical grievances on North Korea's part. A North Korean Foreign Ministry official, Ri Pyong-dok, told the Kyodo news agency in Japan that the North's focus in the working group would be on Japan's colonial rule.

"The settlement of crimes committed by Japan is a priority," Mr. Ri said. "Without that, there will be no normalization of relations between the two countries."

China Wins Praise Over N Korea Deal (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Anna Fifield

Financial Times, February 15, 2007

In the wake of the latest breakthrough in the long-running negotiations to end North Korea's rogue nuclear programme China has again won plaudits for muscling its recalcitrant neighbour to the table and brokering a deal.

"China has done a great job of getting us together," Christopher Hill, the chief US negotiator, said after the first day of talks in what became a mantra he repeated throughout the week.

When the agreement was announced on Tuesday, Mr Hill stressed it could not have been done without Beijing and praised his Chinese counterpart, Wu Dawei.

But far from solidifying Beijing's role on the diplomatic stage, the talks underlined its variable approach to global disputes. While Beijing has become Washington's indispensable partner in North Korea, it has consistently refused to sign on to the western agenda to end the killings in Darfur, Sudan, and so far reluctantly gone along with limited sanctions against Iran.

Local experts in international relations have also taken a more nuanced view of Chinese activism than Mr Hill, with some suggesting that Beijing's role was diminished in the latest talks.

Shi Yinhong, of Renmin University in Beijing, said that the deal had mostly been hammered out in bilateral meetings between the US and North Korea in Berlin in January.

"Generally, the US and North Korea bypassed the other countries [in the six-party talks]. China's role has been reduced," he said on Wednesday. "North Korea has taken a hostile attitude to China since last year. They have slapped China in the face again and again."

China has long had a fraught relationship with its fraternal neighbour. Pyongyang relies on Beijing for vital fuel and food aid but resents China's role in marshalling international pressure on its nuclear programme and also its market economy.

DOJ_NMG_0132721

The bilateral relationship hit new lows last year when Pyongyang conducted missile tests and then later exploded a nuclear device, in defiance of Beijing's wishes.

Beijing has always walked a tightrope in calculating its interests in the six-party talks. On the one hand, it wants them to succeed, but not at the expense of ceding influence in North Korea to the US.

Shen Dingli, of Fudan University in Shanghai, gave China more credit for this week's deal, saying its assertiveness was important in pushing North Korea into signing.

Delegates to the talks supported this view, saying the Chinese had taken the draft agreement forged in Berlin and worked it into a joint statement, shuttling be-tween the numerous bilateral meetings to hone the deal.

They said China ran the meeting with an iron fist, adding that it was Mr Wu's decision to impose the Monday deadline to inject the stagnating talks with some momentum.

Beijing's officials were then "banging heads together" during the 16-hour marathon talks that resulted in an agreement all sides could put their signatures on, delegates said.

But Mr Shen reflected the pessimistic mood about the talks' future in Chinese circles, saying he did not believe Pyongyang was ready to give up the nuclear weapons it had worked so hard to acquire. "A nuclear state like this will not abandon its weapons without regime change," he said.

Zhang Liangui, a professor at the Central Party School, a training ground for senior officials, said this week's agreement was superior in many ways to the one struck by the Clinton administration in 1994, because of the stricter timelines.

But the suggestion that the agreement will bring closer relations between the US and North Korea, if it came to pass, would not necessarily be favourable for Beijing.

"North Korea is trying to replace the six-party talks with the Berlin model, where the agreement made in bilateral talks could later be sent to the six-party talks for approval," Mr Zhang said. "China could be sidelined, as the six-party talks become a rubber stamp." ¦ The two Koreas will meet today to discuss resuming stalled high-level talks, officials said, in a sign of warmer relations, AP reports from Seoul.

Cabinet-level talks were suspended last year amid chilled relations following North Korea's missile launches in July and nuclear test in October.

Agreement Falls Short (USAT)

By Bruce Klingner

USA Today, February 15, 2007

The six-party agreement announced in Beijing Tuesday has significant shortfalls that will hinder efforts to denuclearize North Korea. Its vague provisions and deferred requirements provide Pyongyang with loopholes that it will seek to exploit. Moreover, the accord sends a dangerously accommodating signal not only to North Korea, but also to Iran and other aspiring nuclear weapons states.

Conspicuously absent is any direct reference to North Korea's uranium-based weapons program, which was the catalyst for both sides abrogating a 1994 agreement. The accord doesn't address the steps by which North Korea must divest itself of nuclear weapons it has. Nor does it provide assurances that Pyongyang will agree to verification measures sufficient to allay international concerns over past cheating. The Beijing agreement defers settlement of most of the significant issues to five working groups.

It may still be possible to salvage the results. Doing so, however, requires insisting upon stricter measures in follow-on negotiations to ensure that North Korea divests itself of nuclear weapons expeditiously and in a rigorously verifiable manner.

During these subsequent negotiations, the six party countries must: ensure that the uranium-based nuclear weapons program is subject to the agreement; require verifiable dismantlement of all nuclear weapons and programs; and make progress in providing security reassurances, a permanent peace treaty and formal diplomatic recognition conditional on North Korean behavior and satisfactory resolution of the Japanese and South Korean abductee issue.

At the same time, the United States should maintain pressure on Pyongyang, including taking action against any North Korean entities engaged in illicit activities; pressing countries to comply with United Nations sanctions against North Korea's weapons of mass destruction and missile programs; and continuing efforts to deter North Korean proliferation of WMD or missiles.

Washington should underscore that its willingness to continue discussions is not an open-ended commitment and recommend a deadline. Doing so would prevent Pyongyang from dragging out negotiations and solidifying international de facto recognition of North Korea as a nuclear weapons state. We must not lower the bar for success.

Bruce Klingner is senior research fellow for Northeast Asia at The Heritage Foundation.

USA Today, February 15, 2007

One of the most important things President Bush could achieve before leaving office would be to persuade North Korea to follow Libya's path by giving up its nuclear weapons program.

That's a tall order, given that North Korea's eccentric leader, Kim Jong Il, has been making nuclear weapons, has carried out his first nuclear test, and may have continued selling nuclear parts and technology. But this week, progress seems more possible than at any other time since Bush took office (and subsequently took a hard-line approach to North Korea). Under a new "action plan" announced Tuesday, North Korea will get energy aid and direct talks with the United States in exchange for shutting down its main nuclear reactor within 60 days. In return, the administration is easing a financial squeeze that had begun to cut off Kim's favorite luxury goods.

The deal, though welcome, is no cause for starry-eyed optimism. North Korea gets to keep its declared nuclear weapons — perhaps 10 — pending future negotiations. Further, the secretive nation has a history of deceit. A 1994 deal collapsed eight years later when North Korea admitted it was cheating. This time, it might well be trying to con the outside world into giving it aid and fuel.

Nevertheless, the deal is notable on two counts. It is a "first step," as President Bush put it. A baby step, perhaps, but one without which no others would be possible. And it is an interesting measure of how far the debacle in Iraq has moved Bush toward pragmatic diplomacy and away from the hard-liners who favored the war and who rushed to attack Tuesday's agreement with North Korea. As in Iraq, they would prefer to make threats and dictate terms.

Instead, the deal is a toehold for talks with the bizarrely isolated North Koreans and a way to get nuclear inspectors into the country. At best, North Korea could follow the Libya pattern. At worst, little is lost.

One reason the new agreement might last longer than the 1994 deal is that it involves China, Russia, South Korea and Japan in addition to the United States and North Korea. China's role was particularly significant. Part of its reluctance to use its leverage with its Stalinist former ally North Korea, which depends on Beijing for energy and food, was its fear of a flood of North Korean refugees. But China toughened up after North Korea carried out a nuclear test four months ago, embarrassing Beijing and sparking fears of a nuclear arms race in the region.

The deal is attracting criticism from the right and left. Conservatives are outraged at how vague the action plan is beyond the initial freeze, in contrast to the 1994 agreement: no mention of destroying nuclear weapons North Korea has, or of its parallel uranium enrichment program. Liberals wonder what took so long when a similar agreement might have curbed North Korea's nuclear ambitions sooner.

Both critiques have some merit. At this point, however, even a shaky deal is better than no deal. Ever since Bush called Iran, Iraq and North Korea an "axis of evil" in 2002, all three have become more dangerous places. This agreement has potential to ratchet down tensions on the Korean peninsula.

Belatedly trying diplomatic pragmatism in North Korea is worth the effort — and could provide a model for Iran. Clearly, there's a long way to go. But, as an old Chinese proverb would have it, the journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step.

Canceled TV Speech Points To Hamas And Fatah Split (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 14 — In another sign of tension with Hamas over a possible national unity government, the Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas of the Fatah faction, canceled a televised speech scheduled for Thursday night, his aides said Wednesday.

In the speech, Mr. Abbas was to have told Palestinians about his talks with Hamas leaders in Mecca, Saudi Arabia. But those talks, which ended last Thursday with a proclamation of success, left many details unresolved, including who would fill key posts like interior minister, which controls the Hamas-dominated parallel police force, known as the Executive Force. The details of a political program for the new government are also unclear.

European and American officials have not been convinced by Mr. Abbas that a new government will meet international conditions for resuming direct budgetary aid to the Palestinian Authority. Washington and Israel insist that a new government recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and terrorism and accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Mr. Abbas's aides argue that all these conditions are met implicitly and that the Mecca accord means significant movement from Hamas, but in fact, in the agreement there is no mention of Israel at all and no rejection of violence against Israel.

On Wednesday evening, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, a close aide to Mr. Abbas, told Palestinian television that the president would postpone his speech until he could have further talks with Hamas in Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0132723

[A news agency] reported that another Abbas aide, who was not identified, said: "Hamas has made several unacceptable conditions that cannot be implemented. The Mecca agreement cannot be reinterpreted and must be implemented immediately without any conditions." This aide said that Hamas was putting new conditions on who will fill the jobs of interior and foreign ministers, which are supposed to go to independents approved by Hamas.

The Art Of The Possible Peace (WP)

By Dennis Ross

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East this weekend and hold a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Her stated purpose is to discuss permanent-status issues with an eye toward producing an agreement on a political horizon for ending the conflict. For many, such a political horizon has been long overdue; with it, they argue, both Israelis and Palestinians will know how the conflict ends and find it easier to confront those who oppose peace.

Many, including Rice, see Saudi, Israeli, Egyptian and Jordanian leaders as sharing a perception of Iran as a threat. With such common fears, the thinking goes, the leaders should be willing to accept the necessary hard compromises and end the Palestinian conflict (or show how it can be ended) so Iran can no longer exploit the conflict to build its following and put the region's moderates on the defensive.

The assessment of the common threat perception is correct. But basing policy only on this misses an important regional reality. Priorities differ on how best to respond to the Iranian threat. For the Saudis, weaning Hamas away from Iran and producing intra-Palestinian peace is more important than trying to forge peace between Palestinians and Israelis. For the Israelis, however, an intra-Palestinian peace that entails accommodating Hamas (and that does not require Hamas to change its hostile posture toward Israel) is hardly a basis for reaching out to Palestinians in a way that would satisfy the Saudis, Egyptians and Jordanians.

And one sure way to threaten intra-Palestinian peace is to push now for a political horizon that inevitably will mean Palestinian compromises on core issues such as refugees. Will Hamas accommodate giving up the Palestinian right of return? A political horizon that purports to outline the endgame will require such a concession, and Hamas is not going to accept it or a process likely to produce it.

Of course, the compromises won't be one-sided. But is Israel likely to contemplate excruciating concessions on Jerusalem or territory with a Palestinian government led in part by those who refuse to acknowledge its existence or renounce terrorism? My point is that the political options available for peacemaking between Israelis and Palestinians have been reduced. And Rice's efforts have to be guided by what is possible, not by what is most desirable.

In Middle Eastern terms, what is logical and possible is intra-Palestinian peace and Palestinian-Israeli calm. That would argue for a comprehensive cease-fire to be negotiated between Abbas and Olmert. A deal would require all Palestinian attacks against Israelis to stop and all smuggling of weapons into Gaza or the West Bank to end. In return, the Israelis would stop all incursions, targeted killings and arrests. As Palestinians demonstrate that they are fulfilling their responsibilities, checkpoints would be lifted and crossing points opened, making economic revitalization possible.

This agreement would differ from previous cease-fires in that it would be negotiated with clear understandings of what constitutes a violation and penalties for violations. Israel might be willing to accept such a deal because Hamas would have to enforce the cease-fire -- not merely observe it. Hamas's readiness to enforce it would mean for the first time that Hamas was acting to prevent "resistance," which would signal that its fundamental credo might be changed.

Hamas might be willing to accept such a cease-fire for two reasons: First, it needs a respite. Second, in an atmosphere where life is improving and conflict with Israel is deferred, Hamas is likely to believe its superior organization will allow it to supplant Fatah and dominate Palestinian society.

For his part, Abbas has long favored a comprehensive cease-fire, and he, too, might believe that Hamas would be transformed by having to fulfill responsibilities.

In any case, a comprehensive cease-fire could change the atmosphere between Israelis and Palestinians and lead to a negotiation designed to pursue the vision that Olmert originally campaigned on -- an extensive Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank. Only this withdrawal would not be unilateral and would depend on Palestinian performance on security obligations.

A comprehensive cease-fire won't be hammered out without intensive U.S. brokering. Even Rice's more ambitious desire for a political horizon need not be surrendered. But to accomplish it, she must get the Saudis, Egyptians and Jordanians to publicly embrace basic trade-offs on the core issues, even if Arab leaders must get out in front of Abbas and Olmert on stating their acceptance of the compromises. Both leaders are politically weak; Abbas needs Arab political cover if he is to accept historic concessions on refugees and security, while Olmert must show that the Arab world has adopted unprecedented

Rival Groups Kept Apart In Beirut (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Feb. 14 — The military on Wednesday rolled out acres of razor wire and fashioned a no man's land to separate the hundreds of thousands of government supporters who poured into the center of this city from the hundreds of opposition supporters who have camped downtown since December.

The occasion was the second anniversary of the assassination of the former prime minister Rafik Hariri. Although people on both sides of the no man's land called for unity among all Lebanese, the day's events illustrated the deep divisions and tensions that keep this country on the edge of civil conflict.

"We are against sectarianism," a group of people chanted as they marched toward the memorial ceremony. "And God is with the Sunnis."

Lebanon is caught up in a dangerous political battle between the former prime minister's allies, who control the government, and their opponents, who want more power.

The conflict has deepened sectarian tensions in a country where power is divided among sects. In this fight, the Sunnis are primarily on the government side, Shiites are primarily in the opposition, and Christians are split.

The two competing sides regularly call for unity as a preamble to listing their non-negotiable demands. On Wednesday, the pattern held.

"We are here to say that we want to have dialogue with all Lebanese and we want national unity," Saad Hariri, the former prime minister's son and leader of the largest bloc in Parliament, said in a speech to the crowd. He also said the majority, known as the March 14 Coalition, would not back down on the creation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in Rafik Hariri's death and other political assassinations. Opposition leaders have insisted that the creation of the court be at least delayed.

The day was preceded by an increase in violence. On Tuesday, three people were killed when two minibuses were blown up. It was the first attack on ordinary citizens — not the politically outspoken — in two decades, and it raised fears of a slide into civil war.

By Wednesday morning, the attack had been absorbed into the collective experience, added to the list of bombings and killings and wars that have defined the years since Mr. Hariri was killed. People moved on, and waited for the next incident.

Buses, cars, minivans, mopeds and long lines of marchers began pouring into the center of the city early in the morning. It was in all corners a joyful procession with horns honking and banners waving.

The people snaked their way through intensified security, with the security forces frisking people and checking bags and cars. Armed security men lined the roofs surrounding the square where Mr. Hariri's grave has become a rallying site for the government.

The anniversary offered the government one day, at least, to take control of the city from the opposition, which has shut the center of town with an open-ended sit-in.

"We are the true Lebanese!" Hussein Hashem, 26, shouted as he thrust his finger toward the opposition supporters on the other side of the razor wire. "They are not Lebanese."

Najla Housheimi, 50, said she attended the rally to show defiance.

"Bombs don't scare us, we are ready to present our blood," Ms. Housheimi said as she waved the flag of Lebanon.

The heaviest security was dispatched to keep the crowds of government supporters out of the tent city that has become the center for the opposition's efforts to bring down the government. It was quiet in the tented area. The protesters had turned off their loudspeakers, which had been blaring nonstop since early December, and relinquished the moment to their adversaries.

"Of course they are not our enemies," said Ali Mahmud, 19, a Hezbollah supporter from the south of Lebanon as he sat in a plastic lawn chair beside a tent spiked into the blacktop. "What is common between us is Lebanon. We are all Lebanese."

Then, looking at the legions of heavily armed men separating the two groups, his friend Muhammad Ali, 25, said: "We did not divide the country. It is not us who are irresponsible. They divided the country."

The fight is intensified because it also involves regional players who see the outcome of the events here as important to their national interests. Syria and Iran are with the opposition. The United States, Sunni Arab governments and Europe are with the government.

DOJ_NMG_0132725

The international tribunal has, for example, become a flashpoint even as all sides say, in theory, they support it. Syrian officials have been implicated in the preliminary investigation into Mr. Hariri's death, and their allies in Lebanon have worked to slow its establishment.

That reality led to more calls for unity on Wednesday, followed by denunciations certain not to foster unity with the opposition.

"Whoever fights against what is right will be knocked out," Samir Geagea, leader of the Lebanese Forces, a Christian party and member of the governing coalition, said in a speech. "The international tribunal will certainly be created."

U.S., Britain Fare Poorly In Children Report (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — The United States and Britain ranked as the worst places to be a child among 21 wealthy nations, according to a report by UNICEF released Wednesday. The Netherlands was the best, it said, followed by Sweden and Denmark.

UNICEF's Innocenti Research Centre in Italy ranked the countries in material well-being, health, education, relationships, behaviors and risks, and young people's sense of happiness.

The finding that the children in the richest countries are not necessarily the best-off surprised many, said Marta Santos Pais, the study director. The Czech Republic, for example, ranked above countries with a higher per capita income, such as Austria, France, U.S. and Britain, in part because of a more equal distribution of wealth and higher relative investment in education and public health.

Some of the wealthier countries' lower rankings were a result of less spending on social programs and "dog eat dog" competition in jobs that led to adults spending less time with their children and heightened alienation among peers, said one of the report's authors, Jonathan Bradshaw, at a televised news conference in London.

"The findings that we got today are a consequence of long-term underinvestment in children," said Bradshaw, who is a professor of social policy at York University in England.

The highest ranking for the United States was for education, where it placed 12th. But the U.S. and U.K. landed in the lowest third for five of the six categories measured.

The United States was at the bottom in health and safety, mostly because of its high rates of child mortality and accidental deaths. It was next to last in family and peer relationships and risk-taking behavior. The U.S. has the highest proportion of children living in single-family homes, which the study defined as an indicator for increased risk of poverty and poor health, though it "may seem unfair and insensitive," it said. The U.S. was close to the bottom of the scale for children who eat and talk frequently with their families.

Britain had the highest rate of children involved in activities that endangered their welfare: 31 percent of those studied said they had been drunk at least twice by the age of 15, and 38 percent had had sexual intercourse by that age. Canada had the highest rate of children who had smoked marijuana by age 15 -- 40.4 percent. Japan ranked the worst on "subjective well being," with 30 percent of children agreeing with the statement, "I am lonely."

Children in the Netherlands, Spain and Greece said they were the happiest, and those in Spain, Portugal and the Netherlands spent the most time with their families and friends.

Because of a lack of internationally comparable data, the study did not address children's exposure to domestic violence, both as victims and as witnesses, and children's mental and emotional health.

The report acknowledges that some assessment scales have "weak spots."

The study, for example, measured relative affluence by asking if a family owned a vehicle, a computer, if children had their own bedroom and how often the family traveled on holiday. Some answers might depend on the quality of public transportation and real estate prices, making the average child in New York's affluent areas seem equal to one in a less developed country because of the constraints of city living.

The authors acknowledge the study is "a work in progress in need of improved definitions and better data." But they say it is a first step in providing benchmarks for comparing countries and highlighting poor performance in otherwise rich nations.

"All countries have weaknesses to be addressed," Santos Pais said.

U.S. Envoy Urges India To Open Up (WSJ)

By P.r. Venkat

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0132726

NEW DELHI -- The U.S. is willing to cut farm subsidies further if other countries reciprocate by improving access to their markets and reducing tariffs, the U.S. commerce secretary said.

"We would be willing to take the lead on subsidies, but we can't do it unilaterally," Carlos Gutierrez said in an interview yesterday.

He said India holds the key to the successful conclusion of the long-running World Trade Organization talks under the Doha round of negotiations. Mr. Gutierrez is on a two-day visit to India aimed at boosting bilateral trade. The U.S. is India's largest trading partner. Last year, two-way trade hit $32 billion, Mr. Gutierrez said.

He said the U.S. would like to see "movement" in terms of India cutting tariffs on agricultural products and providing greater market access for industrial goods from other countries. "India is a leader among developing nations, and developing nations look to India to see how India makes its decisions" on WTO issues, he said.

Asked about the U.S. farm bill, which many see as crucial for WTO negotiations, Mr. Gutierrez said: "The farm bill is a domestic matter; the WTO talks are separate from the farm bill."

Started in 2001, the Doha round is meant to help poor countries gain access to the developed world's markets by cutting subsidies and tariffs in rich markets -- especially in agriculture. In return, wealthy nations would win access to important markets for services such as banking and insurance. Talks collapsed in July after hitting numerous roadblocks.

At the World Economic Forum meetings in Davos last month, representatives of many countries said they wanted negotiations to resume.

The U.S. farm bill, still to be approved by Congress, would cut farm spending by $18 billion, to $87 billion, over the next five years. Many countries have said the cut isn't steep enough.

The European Union has said it is prepared to make deeper cuts to its own subsidies if others, including the U.S., also make large cuts.

"We believe that getting an agreement as soon as possible is important," Mr. Gutierrez said. "However, the real important objective is to get a good agreement."

Mr. Gutierrez said India needs to open its market further to attract investment and maintain the pace of economic growth.

"Every country in the world is competing for capital, and capital will go to those markets that welcome investment," he said.

U.S. companies want India to liberalize the retail, insurance and pension sectors, thus opening up opportunities for foreign firms.

Professionals Exit Venezuela (WSJ)

By Peter Millard

Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Oil-rich Venezuela has experienced the kind of economic boom in recent years that should be flush with job opportunities. But an increasing number of professionals, many of them from the oil industry, are looking abroad for work, driven away by President Hugo Chávez's effort to extend state control over the economy, and by inflation verging on 20%.

Since his re-election in December, Mr. Chávez has pursued an agenda of "21st Century Socialism," painting a future of "communal cities" and state-run cooperatives dedicated to production, not profit.

"Chavez's electoral triumph and the radicalized discourse has increased the desire to emigrate," said Luis Vicente Leon, the head of Datanalisis, a Caracas polling firm.

Not everyone is dissatisfied. Mr. Chávez, who first took office in 1999, has gained a broad base of popular support among Venezuela's poor, largely by spending billions of dollars on social programs. And a newly rich class of Venezuelans with close connections to the government is likely to stick around as long as they can continue to profit from Mr. Chávez's rise.

Still, at the U.S. Embassy call center for visas in Caracas, the lines have been jammed since Mr. Chávez announced in early January the nationalization of the electricity industry and Venezuela's largest telecommunications firm. "It doubled practically overnight," said a U.S. diplomat.

The number of Venezuelans receiving U.S. legal permanent residence more than doubled from 2000 to 2005, when 10,870 got their green cards. In that period the overall number of green cards increased by a third. During that period the number of Venezuelan-born U.S. residents increased 42%, to 151,743, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The oil industry appears to be taking notice of the available talent. Qatar Petroleum has run ads in local papers this year, offering tax-free salaries for geologists, reservoir engineers and geophysicists.

Canadian immigration law firm Benchetrit & Associates recently held four days of seminars in Caracas on living and working in Canada. "A plan for your life," read an advertisement for the seminars.

A Canadian embassy spokesman said oil companies are the main recruiters on the ground in Caracas. Canada is developing extra-heavy oil reserves that are comparable to those in Venezuela's Orinoco river basin, providing a ready job market for current and former staffers at Venezuela's state oil company, Petroleos de Venezuela SA, or PdVSA. The number of work visas Canada granted Venezuelans more than doubled last year, to 340.

Any opposition-minded oil workers still left at PdVSA face a difficult environment. During the presidential campaign last year, PdVSA President Rafael Ramirez told company executives to join Mr. Chávez's political movement or hit the road. In 2003, Mr. Chávez sacked around 20,000 PdVSA staffers -- about half the company's work force -- for walking off the job, calling them "terrorists." A majority of them were the managers, accountants and field engineers who turned the state oil venture into a world-class oil company during a period of robust expansion in the 1990s.

Many found work elsewhere, including in Mexico, Canada and Saudi Arabia, at a time of high demand for experienced oil workers.

The lost expertise has taken a toll on PdVSA, the country's largest single employer. Its share of the global market for crude oil supply is shrinking, and accidents and outages are on the rise. Analysts say the cost to PdVSA of producing a barrel of oil has nearly doubled in the past five years to more than $4.50.

White-collar executives at Electricidad de Caracas, which provides 10% of the country's power, and CANTV, the leading telephone company, also are bracing for a politicized workplace after Mr. Chávez finishes nationalizing the two firms by the end of March. Employees there say many staffers are seeking early retirement and expect management to discourage political opposition to Mr. Chávez. In January, Mr. Chávez floated the idea of capping salaries for state employees, giving the most valuable technicians and managers at these firms another reason to move on.

This isn't the first time Venezuelan professionals have rushed for the exits. A multitude of professionals fled the country in 2003 after a nationwide general strike failed to remove Mr. Chávez from office.

According to Datanalisis, the number of Venezuelans who said they were interested in emigrating peaked at around 44% during the 2002-2003 political crisis, which saw the country run out of gasoline for two months. Interest in emigration started declining as the economy rebounded, but Datanalisis expects another spike this year.

Russians To Vote, But Some Parties Lose In Advance (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

ST. PETERSBURG, Russia — Two candidates in local elections here in March, a soccer star and figure skating champion, have no known intention of giving up sports for legislative politics. If they win, as they almost certainly will, their Kremlin-friendly parties, not the voters, will choose the candidates to fill their seats.

An opposition party was kicked off the ballot for forging signatures but given little chance to prove otherwise. Government-controlled television has effectively barred parties except those loyal to President Vladimir V. Putin from the airwaves.

The elections here on March 11, like those in 13 other regions, will preview coming national elections in which voters' choices will be severely limited at best. "Democracy?" asked Vladimir I. Fyodorov, a leader of the Communist Party here, which faces an uphill task of winning any seats to the city's 50-member legislature. "I would not call the process under way in our country democracy."

At the Kremlin's urging, Putin foes and independent analysts say, Parliament has raised the threshold for parties to win seats, eliminated minimum turnout requirements, abolished district elections in favor of party lists, and eliminated the option of voting "against all." A new law on extremism would ban a candidate from criticizing his or her opponent, or anyone actually in office.

The Kremlin has also made it more difficult for political parties to form and register. According to officials, the Justice Ministry refused to qualify 15 of the 32 that applied last year, and other, largely inactive, parties faded into history.

That measure, like most of the others, has an ostensibly reasonable and democratic purpose: to simplify and clarify the rules of elective politics. To critics, though, the Kremlin has simply assured the smooth re-election of pro-presidential parties.

"It would be like if California had an election and only five Republican Parties could run," said Maksim L. Reznik, head of the St. Petersburg branch of Yabloko, a liberal party.

The city election commission disqualified it after declaring that a sample of the 40,000 signatures on the party's voter registration application contained forgeries. The party was given two days to disprove a handwriting expert's conclusions by producing signed affidavits and copies of passports for hundreds of would-be voters.

By early February, with the elections barely a month away, Yabloko had also been barred from the ballot in two other regions, Orel in west central Russia and Leningrad, which surrounds St. Petersburg, in what party officials called an attempt by the Kremlin to weaken it further.

Another liberal party, the Union of Right Forces, was knocked off the ballot in Vologda, Pskov and Samara. The Communist Party faced challenges in several regions, including Tyumen and Dagestan, but ultimately qualified after protests.

In all, parties were denied registration in 17 instances. The only three parties that faced no problems were United Russia, Just Russia and the Liberal Democratic Party, all pro-presidential.

In Russia, as elsewhere, all politics is local. Yabloko's leaders argue that their banishment here in St. Petersburg resulted from their opposition to the city's governor, Valentina I. Matviyenko, a devoted supporter of Mr. Putin.

Yabloko's three members in the city legislature were the only ones who voted against Mr. Putin's reappointment of her as governor in December. They have also led a public challenge to plans by Ms. Matviyenko and Gazprom, the energy giant, to build a skyscraper on the banks of the Neva River.

Party officials and political analysts, though, have detected a national trend in the pressure on opposition parties. "They would like to reduce uncertainty as much as possible," said Vladimir Y. Gelman, a political scientist at the European University at St. Petersburg.

The goal, he and others said, is to bolster United Russia, which now controls the lower house of Parliament and is called "the party of power," by forcing out smaller parties like Yabloko. At the same time, the Kremlin hopes to create a loyal counterweight in Just Russia, a party created by the merger of three smaller parties and led by a staunch Putin supporter, Sergei M. Mironov.

"Just Russia is the only real opposition currently," Mr. Mironov said recently, campaigning in the icy cold at a small park here, where he unveiled a new merry-go-round. "The others are just playthings."

Oleg A. Nilov, the party's regional chairman, acknowledged that political debate had withered in Russia since the emergence of United Russia. Just Russia, he said, will become a populist challenger, taking the side of the poor, the pensioners and the workers who have shared far less of Russia's new energy-fueled boom than most. That stance, though, extends only to the local legislature and the lower house of Parliament, the State Duma.

"We are saying that on the level of the State Duma there should be real competition," he said in an interview in the party's headquarters, which displays large portraits of Mr. Putin. "The executive power exists on the next level."

On that level, he added, "there should be unity."

Vadim A. Tulpanov, the incumbent chairman of St. Petersburg's legislature, dismissed criticism of Yabloko's registration troubles, calling them self-inflicted. He said the election simply reflected the natural evolution of Russia's young democracy, with the old parties like Yabloko and the Communists losing their popular appeal.

"Gradually in Russia, as I understand it, a two-party system is being created, like in America," he said.

For now, the two main parties have distinct advantages: access to the airwaves, which are government controlled, and to campaign financing. Private donations to parties became risky after the prosecution of Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, the former chairman of Yukos Oil, after he openly supported political parties in the Duma.

A result of the uneven resources is visible on the streets here: posters and billboards of United Russia and Just Russia are ubiquitous, the others largely absent. Another advantage of incumbency has been the city's refusal to allow Yabloko and other parties to hold protests or other rallies.

Roman S. Mogilevsky, a sociologist and pollster with the independent Agency for Social Information, said he found optimism in Russia's development. "I don't think there are many who are against elections," he said, as though the question of holding them at all remained in doubt. "Even in the Soviet Union there were elections. The level of freedom, though, depends on whom you ask."

Opposition Candidate Shot

MAKHACHKALA, Russia, Feb. 14 (Agence France-Presse) — A local legislative candidate was shot in the head Wednesday in the southern Russian region of Dagestan less than an hour after making a campaign speech on television here, a police spokeswoman said.

Eduard Khidirov, the head of the Dagestani branch of the nationalist party Patriots of Russia, was in serious condition, the spokeswoman said.

U.N. Commander In Kosovo Resigns After Demonstrators' Deaths (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

LJUBLJANA, Slovenia, Feb. 14 — The commander of the United Nations police in Kosovo resigned Wednesday, days after violent clashes between the police and demonstrators left two protesters dead and another critically injured.

The commander, Stephen Curtis, a former British police officer, resigned under pressure from the mission's most senior official, Joachim Rücker.

DOJ_NMG_0132729

On Tuesday, autopsy reports showed that the two protesters, both men, had been killed by rubber-coated bullets. Television pictures of the demonstration on Saturday in the center of Pristina, the regional capital, showed members of a Romanian riot squad attached to the United Nations firing rubber bullets into the crowd. A third man remains in critical condition in a military hospital, United Nations officials said.

Mr. Rücker said the commissioner's resignation "would follow the principle of political accountability." He also appointed an international prosecutor to lead the investigation into the men's deaths.

The United Nations mission has come under substantial pressure to accept responsibility for the handling of the demonstration, which was held in protest of terms set out in a United Nations plan for Kosovo. In the plan, Kosovo is granted de facto statehood — an army, a constitution and a flag — but it would still be protected by NATO and overseen by the international community for the indefinite future.

Agim Ceku, prime minister of Kosovo's government, which is dominated by ethnic Albanians, has described the police measures as "excessive," and Interior Minister Fatmir Rexhepi resigned Monday, saying he felt morally responsible for the men's deaths, although the police officers implicated in the shooting were not under his command.

The shootings left many people in Kosovo shocked, and took place at a critical juncture.

The United Nations is planning to withdraw from the region by the end of summer and grant the province substantial self-rule, subject to approval by the Security Council. The mission first took over administration of the province in June 1999, after a 78-day NATO-led bombing campaign drove out the Serbian-dominated security forces who were accused of widespread atrocities against the ethnic Albanian population that forms the majority of Kosovo.

The plan benefits the Albanian majority, but a small number of Albanians complain that it gives too many rights to the Serb minority, and that the international authorities are trying to retain a hold over the province.

In a show of political unity, all main Serbian parties on Wednesday rejected the United Nations proposal, [a news agency] reported. In its first act since inconclusive elections on Jan. 21, Serbia's new Parliament overwhelmingly endorsed a resolution rejecting key aspects of the plan.

Vetevendosja, the group behind the demonstration on Saturday, has called for further protests next Monday.

Help Not Wanted (NYT)

By Moisés Naím

The New York Times, February 15, 2007

Washington

MY friend was visibly shaken. He had just learned that he had lost one of his clients to Chinese competitors. "It's amazing," he told me. "The Chinese have completely priced us out of the market. We can't compete with what they're able to offer."

There's nothing surprising about that, of course; manufacturing jobs are lost to China every day. But my friend is not in manufacturing. He works in foreign aid.

His story is about Nigeria's trains. The Nigerian government operates three railways, which are notoriously corrupt and inefficient. They are also falling apart. The World Bank — where my friend works — proposed a project based on the commonsense observation that there was no point in lending the Nigerians money without also tackling the corruption that had crippled the railways. After months of negotiation, the bank and Nigeria's government agreed on a $5 million project that would allow private companies to come in and help clean up the railways.

But just as the deal was about to be signed, the Chinese government offered Nigeria $9 billion to rebuild the entire rail network — no bids, no conditions and no need to reform. That was when my friend packed his suitcase and went to the airport.

It is not an isolated case. In recent years, wealthy nondemocratic regimes have begun to undermine development policy through their own activist aid programs. Call it rogue aid. It is development assistance that is nondemocratic in origin and nontransparent in practice, and its effect is typically to stifle real progress while hurting ordinary citizens.

China is actively backing such deals throughout Africa; its financing of roads, electrical plants, ports and the like boomed from $700 million in 2003 to nearly $3 billion for each of the past two years. Indeed, it is a worldwide strategy. Beijing has agreed to expand Indonesia's electrical grid in a matter of months. Too bad the deal calls for building several plants that use a highly polluting, coal-based Chinese technology. No international agency would have signed off on such an environmentally unfriendly deal.

In the Philippines, the Asian Development Bank, which lends money at low interest rates to poor countries, had agreed to finance Manila's new aqueduct. It, too, was suddenly told that its money was no longer needed. China was offering cheaper rates, faster approval and fewer questions.

What's behind this sudden Chinese drive to do good around the world? The three short answers are money, international politics and access to raw materials. China's central bank has the world's largest foreign exchange reserves, totaling $1.06 trillion. Beijing is increasingly leveraging this cash to ensure its access to raw materials and to advance China's growing global influence. What better than a generous foreign-aid program to ensure the good will of a petro-power like Nigeria or a natural-resource-rich neighbor like Indonesia?

China is not the first country to make aid a tool in advancing its interests abroad. The Soviet Union and the United States spent decades giving development aid to dictators in exchange for their allegiance. Even today, American largess to Egypt and Pakistan is rooted in geopolitical calculation.

But beginning in the 1990s, foreign aid had begun to slowly improve. Scrutiny by the news media shamed many developed countries into curbing their bad practices. Today, the projects of organizations like the World Bank are meticulously inspected by watchdog groups. Although the system is far from perfect, it is certainly more transparent than it was when foreign aid routinely helped ruthless dictators stay in power.

Nor is China the only regime offering rogue aid. President Hugo Chávez has not been shy in using his nation's oil money to recruit allies abroad. Indeed, Venezuela's ambassador to Nicaragua, explaining his country's large aid packages in the region, bluntly announced, "We want to infect Latin America with our model."

Mr. Chávez's financial aid to Cuba far exceeds what the island used to get from Leonid Brezhnev during the heyday of Soviet communism, and it has dashed hopes for Cuba's opening as a result of Fidel Castro's demise and the island's bankruptcy. Because of Mr. Chávez's artificial lifeline, Cubans will be forced to wait even longer for the indispensable reforms that will bring their society opportunities for true prosperity and freedom.

Iranian aid to Hamas in Palestine and Hezbollah in Lebanon may have increased Iran's influence in the region, but it is damaging to the people in those countries for the same reason that Venezuelan aid hurts Cubans. The same can be said of Saudi Arabia's sponsorship, in countries like Pakistan, of religious schools that fail to equip students with the skills they need to get jobs.

One could argue that students are surely better off going to any school than being in the streets. But why should these be the only options? Why can't the Saudis finance education, the Chinese pay for railroads and electric grids, and the Venezuelans help Cuba's economy without also hurting poor Pakistanis, Nigerians and Cubans? Because the goal of these donors is not to help other countries develop. Rather, they seek to further their own national interests, advance an ideological agenda or even line their own pockets. Rogue aid providers couldn't care less about the long-term well-being of the population of the countries they aid.

States like China, Iran, Saudi Arabia and Venezuela have the cash and the will to reshape the world into a place very unlike the one where we want to live. By pushing their alternative development model, such states effectively price responsible aid programs out of the market exactly where they are needed most. In place of those programs, rogue donors offer to underwrite a world that is more corrupt, chaotic and authoritarian. That sort of aid is in no one's interest, except the rogues.

Africa's Last Best Chance (WSJ)

By Richard Holbrooke And Stuart Eizenstat

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

The long-stalled Doha round of trade talks recently had, in the words of WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy, a jolt of "new energy" after the recent meeting of key trade ministers in Davos. What is not clearly understood is that if a successful agreement is reached, it will be especially good news for Africa.

Failure, conversely, would have tragic consequences for the continent. It would lead the United States and the European Union to negotiate more bilateral free-trade agreements with key countries, but not with sub-Saharan Africa and other poor countries, which offer few attractive markets for developed countries' manufactured goods and services. Africa, which has seen its share of world trade shrink in recent years, would fall even further behind.

Developing countries felt that previous multilateral trade negotiations like the Kennedy round, the Tokyo round and the Uruguay round primarily benefited the highly developed nations. While they undertook costly obligations to protect developed countries' intellectual property and impose sanitary and phytosanitary standards, the developed countries did not significantly open their markets to the labor-intensive manufactured goods and agricultural products of developing countries.

For the Doha round launched in 2001, however, there is a development agenda. At its heart is agriculture -- a politically sensitive sector in the EU and the U.S. but the largest employer in low-income countries, accounting for about 60% of their labor force and 25% of their GDP. The World Bank estimates that these agricultural products face what former U.S. Trade Representative Robert Portman observed is a practically insurmountable global average tariff rate of 62%, and that 93% of the benefits from a successful Doha round would come from improved market access for developing nations' agricultural products.

Farmers represent less than 5% of the labor force in industrial countries, but they have very substantial political power in the U.S., EU and Japan. These political forces, especially in the EU, led to the eventual derailment of the Doha round last summer. But as the Doha talks take on new life, Congress and the Bush administration need to stay true to the commitments of the Doha Development Agenda, especially in agriculture.

Two weeks ago the administration proposed ending subsidies for 80,000 wealthy farmers, substituting trade-distorting subsidies with cash payments to farmers, and trimming traditional agriculture programs by $4.5 billion over the next decade. These proposals, if approved, would directly benefit some of the poorest people on earth, save lives and ultimately reduce American foreign aid, while helping Susan Schwab, the U.S trade representative, put wind in the sails of the ministers' pledge in Davos to restart serious talks.

The promise for developing countries, and particularly the poorest African nations, is huge. In particular, Africa stands to gain significantly if sensitive product exclusions do not disproportionately target key African exports. Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner, pledged recently that Europe will significantly improve its previous tariff reduction offer; he needs to make good on that promise. But even the current U.S. and EU proposals on the table far surpass those offered in previous multilateral trade rounds and offer real gains for developing countries:

· WTO members have agreed to provide duty-free/quota-free market access to the least developed countries for at least 97% of their products.

· An agreement has been reached to end the direct EU and U.S. export subsidies by 2013 that have squeezed out the products of farmers in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

· Assistance will be given to help poor countries streamline their customs procedures to help with the red tape and corruption that historically impeded engagement in significant international trade.

Developing nations also must make serious commitments to complete the Doha round. A growing percentage of trade is between developing nations, with more than 70% of the duties paid by developing countries to other developing countries. This makes no sense.

The World Bank has found a significant increase in per capita income of developing countries that lower their own trade barriers, and concluded that totally eliminating global trade barriers could lift 300 to 500 million of the world's poor out of poverty -- growing their economies by $259 billion by 2015. Opening their trade arteries to manufactured goods and services is also important. It will help developing nations trade with each other, which is growing 50% faster than world trade overall, but where levels of protection on goods are four times higher than levels of protection in rich countries. Intraregional trade in Africa was only 5.3% of GDP in 2002, in part due to self-destructive trade barriers between African countries.

As trade ministers make an effort to reach a Doha deal, they should recognize that it is the poorest nations, particularly those in Africa, that would be the biggest losers if Doha collapses. We hope this will be understood by everyone, on a bipartisan basis, as this crucial negotiation heads into its final phase. For Africa, this may be the last best chance.

'Competitive Cooperation' (WSJ)

By Edward C. Prescott

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Of all the thankless jobs that economists set for themselves when it comes to educating people about economics, the notion that society is better off if some industries are allowed to wither, their workers lose their jobs, and investors lose their capital -- all in the name of the greater glory of globalization -- surely ranks near the top. This is counterintuitive to many people (politicians among them), because they view it the government's economic responsibility to protect U.S. industry, employment and wealth against the forces of foreign competition. If the government has any economic role at all, surely this must be it.

Actually, no. Government has a higher calling in this country (and others like the United States), which is to provide the opportunity for people to seek their livelihood on their own terms, in open international markets, with as little interference from government as possible. That doesn't mean we shouldn't provide short-term social insurance policies to aid those displaced by foreign competition, but the purpose of that aid should be to prepare workers, not protect them.

Also, just because a country is open to international competition doesn't mean that it won't meddle in international markets. Complexities (and hypocrisies) abound when countries establish international trade agreements. In this regard, the U.S. and its free-trade friends are deserving of no small amount of shame. But broadly speaking -- and these broad operating principles matter -- those countries that open their borders to international competition are those countries with the highest per capita income.

This is more than mere correlation. Competitive openness is the key to bringing developing nations up to the standard of living enjoyed by citizens of wealthier countries. I am not speaking here of those countries faced with extreme poverty amid the ills of war, civil unrest, disease and famine. Those are countries with big problems and special needs, beyond the bounds of much economic theory. But I am talking about the majority of the world's population, who reside in countries with the opportunity for growth but who are stifled by protectionist policies and anti-competitive institutions.

Let's review some historical facts. With the signing of the Treaty of Rome in 1957, France, Italy, Belgium, West Germany, Luxembourg and the Netherlands formed what would eventually become the European Union. For six decades prior to the treaty, those countries were about 55% as productive as the U.S. But over the following 25 years, those countries essentially caught up to the U.S. in terms of productivity.

When that historic economic treaty was signed, three countries were roughly on par with those original six -- Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom. However, a funny thing happened in subsequent years -- those three countries started falling behind their former peers. So in 1973 they joined the original group and their economic fortunes improved. It took time, but the U.K. now is as productive as Germany.

The story continues in the 1980s, when Spain, Portugal and Greece joined the club. Spain has essentially caught up with the pack, and Portugal and Greece have narrowed the gap. By 1995, Austria, Sweden and Finland joined and have shown improvement relative to the group, after having fallen behind prior to signing. How about the 10 countries that joined in 2004? It's still early, but signs of positive movement are already apparent.

How to explain this phenomenon? The answer lies predominantly with competition -- aided by an attendant drop in transportation costs -- that industries had to face from their new member states. With regard to Europe, it is useful to consider the example of the U.S., which, from its early days, created wealth from the healthy competition among businesses and industries in its member states. This competitive cooperation was not a foregone conclusion during this country's formation, but its establishment has left an institutional legacy that has guaranteed the increasing standards of living that we all now enjoy.

This same competitive cooperation has been firing the economic engine of Europe for 50 years, when those first six countries took the historic step of uniting their economic fortunes. And there is other evidence throughout the world for the benefit of international openness. Like the U.S., Australia is also a tale of competition among member states; in addition, Australia had to reform once the U.K. joined the EU. The five wealthy countries of Eastern Asia -- Taiwan, Singapore, Japan, South Korea and Hong Kong -- were not so well off just a few decades ago, but their subsequent commitment to export markets and international competition put them on an upward trajectory that has improved the lives of millions of people.

And what of Latin America? Unfortunately, the region provides a case study in the perils of protectionism. Recent research by my Minneapolis Fed colleagues, Lee Ohanian and Jim Schmitz, and two co-authors, shows that from 1950 to 2001, per capita GDP for Europe increased 68% relative to the U.S.; Asia increased by 244%, while Latin America decreased by 21%. This is all the more striking when we realize that Latin America's per capita GDP actually exceeded Asia's by 75% in 1950.

The authors provide much evidence to support their claim that competitive barriers are to blame for Latin America's retarded growth. But there is hope. Microlevel examples of industries that have opened to foreign competition -- the Chilean copper industry and Brazilian iron ore industry, for example -- reveal that Latin American producers can match the high productivity levels of their Western counterparts.

Of course, many other factors account for marginal differences in productivity and wealth among countries that are already wealthy -- tax rates being key among those factors -- but they are comparative "frosting on the cake," and the cake in this case is the institutional commitment to international competition. The day when Latin American countries have joined the ranks of wealthy countries and are competing on the basis of marginal tax rates will be a happy day, indeed.

Protectionism is seductive, but countries that succumb to its allure will soon have their economic hearts broken. Conversely, countries that commit to competitive borders will ensure a brighter economic future for their citizens. This lesson should not be lost on the U.S., the paragon of competitive growth, where politicians and policy makers are contemplating whether to construct more protective barriers. It is openness that gives people the opportunity to use their entrepreneurial talents to create social surplus, rather than using those talents to protect what they already have (or to protect rents, as economists like to say). Social surplus begets a rising standard of living, which begets growth, which begets social surplus, and so on. Rent protection stops growth cold and keeps people poor.

People in all countries are motivated to improve their condition, and all countries have their share of talented risk-takers, but without the promise that a competitive system brings, that motivation and those talents will only lie dormant. The 50th anniversary of the Treaty of Rome is a good time to reflect on the benefits that competitive cooperation can bring to people. Here's hoping that more citizens of the world will reap similar benefits over the next 50 years and beyond.

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Europe just got its best jobless report in a very long time. The bad news: In a decade when record numbers of people found work in the rich world, Europe's best is an unemployment rate of 7.5%, significantly higher than America's 4.6% or that of any other developed economy.

The Old World offers a useful model of what not to do. Its largest economies -- Germany, France and Italy -- have shunned a policy mix that has enabled English-speaking and Nordic countries to reduce their jobless rolls. In its annual "Going for Growth" report released Tuesday, the OECD argues that deregulated labor and other markets are the best route to full employment. That's hardly man-bites-dog news, but the study draws on a decade's worth of empirical data to make the case.

Before a French politician gets upset, let's be clear that no one's calling for an end to the welfare state. The OECD study shows that a social safety net can coexist with strong growth and low unemployment, notwithstanding other social and economic costs. But the kind of safety net matters.

Look at the welfare-besotted Nordics, in particular Denmark, which has recently found tough love. Its "flexisecurity" system combines generous jobless benefits, strong incentives to get new work fast and lenient hiring and firing rules. This encourages Danish employers to create jobs and pushes beneficiaries back into the work pool. The result: Unemployment fell to 4.8% in 2005 from 8% in 1994 (see nearby chart).

Rigid job protection laws have the perverse effect of keeping people out of work. Germany and France are generous with benefits, lax about getting the unemployed off the dole and inflexible on hiring and firing. Such laws discourage companies from hiring and they discriminate against the jobless by raising the bar to enter the workforce; women and minorities are disproportionately hit.

In France, the overall jobless rate is a still high 8.5% today, down from 12.3% in 1994. But the youth jobless rate is three times higher. Even after its poor minority young rioted in late 2005, France did nothing to make it easier for these kids to get jobs. Unemployment in Germany rose to 10.3% in 2005, from 8.4% in 1994. After Berlin tightened eligibility rules for unemployment insurance on the margins, without touching hiring and firing rules, the rate has since gone down -- marginally -- to 9.5%. That's still a long way from Denmark or the U.S.

As the OECD study shows, countries with low jobless rates not only have the most open labor markets but also the freest product markets. These are, in descending order, the U.S., Britain, Australia, Canada, New Zealand and Denmark. Except for the U.S., all these countries abandoned statist policies and opened up their economies in the past decade or two. The result: more growth and jobs. By the way, half the one-percentage-point decrease in euro-zone unemployment in the past decade comes from Spain, where market reforms got the jobless rate down to 8.5% today from 24% in 1994.

The OECD report also points out the often-overlooked benefits of deregulation to job creation. Freer competition in product and service markets reduces prices. That in turn relaxes wage demands and lets companies hire more workers. Financial deregulation, for example, tends to bring down interest rates, enabling companies to expand. In this virtuous circle, it's then theoretically easier to fix bad labor laws in a growing economy.

New governments in Italy and Germany and a soon-to-be new president in France have a chance to catch up with other developed economies on getting their citizens into jobs. The recipe isn't complicated: Reduce taxes to reduce wage costs, tighten rules on government benefits, loosen up employment protection laws. Come to think of it, the new majority in the U.S. Congress could stand to read the OECD report, too.

Spain Bitterly Divided As Terror Trial Begins In '04 Train Bombings (WP)

By John Ward Anderson And Pamela Rolfe

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

MADRID, Feb. 15 -- Twenty-nine suspects went on trial Thursday for the March 11, 2004, bombings of four commuter trains in Madrid, but Spain's political parties and news media have turned the investigation of the attack into a partisan battle, fraying the country's traditional solidarity against terrorism and leaving Spaniards bitterly divided over who launched the attack and why.

The strongest evidence collected by investigators suggests that the bombings -- which killed 191 people and injured 1,824 in the worst terrorist attack ever carried out in continental Europe -- were the work of Islamic radicals inspired by al-Qaeda, principally in retaliation for the stationing of Spanish troops in Iraq.

But leaders of the conservative Popular Party continue to assert that the Basque separatist movement known as ETA had a central role in the bombings. Some independent terrorism experts accuse the Popular Party -- in power at the time of the attack and voted out of office in national elections three days later -- of spinning conspiracy theories to escape blame for the bombings and redeem itself with the public.

"The main success of the bombing was to introduce a deeply rooted division in the country, socially and politically, which is amazing in a country that had a history of being united against terror before March 11," said Fernando Reinares, an international terrorism expert at Madrid's Elcano Royal Institute. "After March 11, Spain started a blame game that is unending."

Some of the confusion over who committed the attack, and why, should be resolved during the trial, which began Thursday in a special high-security courthouse outside Madrid. The proceedings are expected to last until July, with more than 600 witnesses scheduled to take the stand. A verdict could come in October.

Reinares said he fears that the trial, rather than leading to national healing and catharsis, will deepen political rifts and further fray the long-standing Spanish consensus on fighting terrorism, forged during the nearly four-decade battle against ETA.

"We feel used" by political parties and the news media, said David Abad Quijada, an activist with an organization that helps victims of the bombings and their families, and whose 31-year-old sister was killed in the attack. The bombing investigation and trial have become "totally political," he said, adding, "It's been a disaster."

"I want a trial that does not take into account political or personal interests," he said. "I do not want it to be an example of a trial turned into a circus."

The Madrid bombings, the deadliest terrorist strike since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in New York and Washington, underscored Europeans' own vulnerability to attacks by Islamic extremists and prompted a tightening of laws, border controls and security coordination across the European Union.

The bombings became politically charged almost immediately. On the day of the blasts, the government of Prime Minister JosÃ© MarÃ-a Aznar said ETA was the prime suspect and repeated that assertion even as evidence mounted that Islamic extremists had carried out the attack.

When Spaniards went to the polls three days later, political analysts say, they voted against the Popular Party government not so much for pursuing policies that might have led to the attack -- such as sending Spanish troops to support the U.S. invasion of Iraq -- as for seemingly trying to cover up the role of Islamic extremists. Aznar's successor, Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero of the Socialist Workers' Party, pulled Spanish troops out of Iraq soon after taking office, and today Popular Party leaders accuse the Socialists of ignoring key evidence pointing to ETA involvement.

The right-wing El Mundo newspaper, in particular, has conducted aggressive investigations fueling charges of coverups and evidence-tampering that the newspaper's editorial page said showed "intentional deceit" by government investigators. Surveys show that as many as a third of Spaniards believe ETA played a role in the bombings.

"We shouldn't rule them out," said Gustavo de Aristegui, the Popular Party's chief foreign policy spokesman in parliament, noting that some of the Spanish defendants who allegedly supplied explosives for the March 11 attacks had ties to ETA. But many of the attackers, he said, clearly were Islamic extremists trying to oust the Popular Party from power and wanted to send a signal to the rest of the world: "Submit or else."

Diego LÃ³pez Garrido, a Socialist party spokesman in Congress, said the Popular Party's insistence on an ETA connection was part of a "political line based on a theory that the bombing attack was meant to overthrow the former government, and so the Socialist government has a lack of legitimacy." Continuing to blame ETA was "a political strategy" not based on the facts, he said.

Some critics of the government have suggested that Zapatero's effort to negotiate a peace settlement with ETA was a political payoff. Those negotiations collapsed in December after a bomb, blamed on ETA, exploded at Madrid's airport, killing two people.

"There is no evidence pointing to ETA involvement in March 11 -- all we have is speculation and conspiracy theories," said Reinares, who used to advise Zapatero's Interior Ministry on counterterrorism. He said the March 11 investigation found that al-Qaeda leaders selected the targets and that "individuals connected to the al-Qaeda core" were involved in picking the date of the attack after a statement by Osama bin Laden was aired on al-Jazeera television in October 2003.

But much of the evidence is being ignored, Reinares said. At a time when Spain needs to revamp its security agencies and strengthen its policies for fighting al-Qaeda at home and abroad, he said, "the last thing we need is a lack of consensus on the matter."

A three-judge panel is hearing the case, based on a three-year investigation and a 1,471-page indictment issued by Judge Juan del Olmo last April. Twenty of the defendants are Arabs, mostly from Morocco, and nine are Spaniards, including one woman.

The seven main defendants are charged with murder and belonging to a terrorist group. They face hypothetical sentences of about 38,000 years if convicted, although under Spanish law the maximum prison term is 40 years. There is no death penalty in Spain.

Three are identified as organizers of the plot: Youssef Belhadj, 30, and Hassan el-Haski, 43, both of Morocco, and Rabei Osman Sayed Ahmed, 35, of Egypt. Three are accused of planting bombs: Jamal Zougam, 33, and Abdelmajid Bouchar, 24, both of Morocco, and Basel Ghalyoun, 26, of Syria. A Spaniard, JosÃ© Emilio SuÃ¡rez Trashorras, 30, is charged with supplying some of the explosives used in the attack, which he allegedly stole from a mine in northern Spain.

The remaining suspects face sentences of between four and 27 years on various charges, including collaborating with terrorists and trafficking in explosives. Seven other key suspects, who police believe were top operational and planning leaders, blew themselves up three weeks after the attack in an apartment outside Madrid when police tried to arrest them. Another suspect is believed to have died in a suicide attack in Iraq.

The only person to testify Thursday was the defendant Ahmed, also known as Mohamed the Egyptian, who was arrested in Milan three months after the Madrid bombings. Italian courts sentenced him last year to 10 years in prison for ties to terrorism. In secret police recordings in Italy, he reportedly told associates he was one of the planners of the Madrid attack.

On Thursday, after initially refusing to speak, Ahmed denied having "any ties with al-Qaeda or any other Islamic group."

"Obviously, I condemn these attacks emphatically and completely," he told the court. "Never, never have I had any relation whatsoever with these events in Madrid."

Was Jose Padilla Tortured By US Military? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

MIAMI

DOJ_NMG_0132741

When suspected Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla was taken into military custody in 2002, his interrogators set out to crush any hope he might have that a neutral judge or a defense lawyer would come to his aid.

It is difficult to convince a US citizen that legal protections guaranteed in the Constitution no longer exist for him. But that was the mission of US military interrogators ordered to extract as much intelligence as possible from Mr. Padilla.

"Only after such time as Padilla has perceived that help is not on the way can the United States reasonably expect to obtain all possible intelligence information from Padilla," explained Vice Adm. Lowell Jacoby in an affidavit to an inquiring federal judge.

The statement was made seven months into what became 21 months of strict isolation in a military brig without access to a lawyer or any other human contact besides Padilla's jailers and interrogators.

Now, Padilla is facing an April trial in federal court here on charges that he became a willing Al Qaeda recruit in a violent global jihad. But his lawyers complain that Padilla's harsh treatment during nearly four years of military detention and interrogation has left him so psychologically damaged that he is unable to help wage his own defense.

US District Judge Marcia Cooke is being asked to decide whether Padilla is mentally competent to stand trial.

In a hearing before Judge Cooke Friday, federal prosecutors are expected to urge the judge to ignore everything that took place during Padilla's military detention. They say his harsh treatment is irrelevant to whether he is mentally competent to stand trial.

Padilla's lawyers disagree. They say their client was tortured by the military and they are asking the judge to order the government to fully account for its treatment of Padilla.

"Mr. Padilla is suffering from mental defects stemming from his incarceration in the naval brig," writes Anthony Natale, an assistant federal public defender, in a brief to the court. "The effects of that incarceration ... have left Mr. Padilla in such a psychologically frail posture that he cannot bear to revisit his past and, hence, cannot assist counsel in defending him against the government's allegations."

Mr. Natale adds, "It is the government that is squarely to blame for his current mental state and his concomitant inability to assist counsel."

Federal prosecutors deny that Padilla was subject to torture or any other mistreatment while in military custody, and they point to a recent report by a Bureau of Prisons psychiatrist that finds Padilla is competent to stand trial.

The key issue, according to the government, is Padilla's present mental functioning. Since he is mentally competent today, there is no need to investigate his past treatment by the military, prosecutors say.

The issue of the scope of the judge's inquiry into Padilla's mental condition is important because it could open the door to the first detailed examination of torture allegations made by an alleged enemy combatant.

Was he tortured? Was he subjected to stress positions and forced hypothermia? Was he administered mind-altering drugs?

Defense lawyers alleged each of these abuses and more in a motion pending before Cooke to dismiss the entire case against Padilla because the government engaged in outrageous conduct during his military detention.

"What you have here is a battle of conflicting theories about the entire case," says Stephen Vladeck, a professor at the University of Miami Law School.

Federal prosecutors are trying to restrict the scope of any competency hearing. The difficulty from the government's perspective, analysts say, is that even if Cooke eventually rules Padilla is competent to stand trial, there is no guarantee that she might not also dismiss the case because of facts uncovered during a wide-ranging inquiry into Padilla's earlier treatment by the military.

"There is every reason to believe that the defense will improperly seek to use a competency hearing as a vehicle to engage the court in detailed fact-finding about the alleged conditions of Padilla's detention," writes Assistant US Attorney John Shipley in a brief to Cooke. "There is no reason for the court to head down that path."

But the government itself headed down that path when its psychiatrist contacted individuals and reviewed reports dating to Padilla's military detention.

Padilla's lawyers want the same access in part so they can cross-examine the government's psychiatrist in a competency hearing set for next week.

DOJ_NMG_0132742

Defense lawyers say the government's competency report suggests its psychiatrists were misled about the conditions of Padilla's confinement in the naval brig. And they want Cooke to find out what happened during a mysterious 72-hour gap in recordings of Padilla interrogations.

The lawyers say Padilla was subject to 24-hour video surveillance during his entire military detention – except for 72 hours of missing tape. "What could have been done to Mr. Padilla in those seventy-two, or so, hours that the government turned off the camera when for almost four years every one of Mr. Padilla's bowel movements were videotaped?" asks Natale in his brief.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

C.I.A. Veteran Races Time To Rescue Fledgling Agency (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — A born contrarian, Charles E. Allen has spent an intelligence career immersed in wars, alarms and debacles, often seeing the world differently from his colleagues.

A Washington legend who is variously viewed as brilliant or weird, a nuisance or a Cassandra, a courtly Southern gentleman or an irascible workaholic, Mr. Allen is again looking at things from another perspective.

Over the last 17 months, Mr. Allen, 71, has taken on his latest difficult assignment — a job that virtually no one else wanted, to rescue a fledging intelligence operation that gets little respect and assumes a role doubters say is not even necessary.

Instead of retiring after a half-century at the Central Intelligence Agency, where he helped assess threats overseas, Mr. Allen now leads the intelligence unit at the Department of Homeland Security, which is trying to predict where terrorists might strike inside the United States.

In his effort to build a credible operation, Mr. Allen has muscled his way into meetings of the nation's top spy agency chiefs, claimed ground that the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the C.I.A. had already carved up, defended his efforts before Congress and forced rivals to make room — sometimes literally — for his department.

"The dirty four-letter word in government is spelled 'turf,' " said Representative Jane Harman, a California Democrat and the new chairwoman of the House subcommittee that oversees Homeland Security intelligence operations. "Nobody wanted interference from this newbie agency."

Beyond the outside frictions, Mr. Allen has plenty of problems from within.

The Department of Homeland Security has thousands of Border Patrol guards, airport screeners and Coast Guard officers who might identify possible terrorist threats, but Mr. Allen has met resistance from some of their leaders, over whom he has little direct authority.

And though he is working 15-hour days and his weary face is criss-crossed with creases, he knows he is short on time to improve counterterrorism efforts at a department long ridiculed for its color-coded terror alerts and advice that Americans arm themselves with duct tape.

"This is an extraordinarily challenging task because of the depth, breadth and the difficult elements involved," Mr. Allen said in a recent interview. "I am impatient. We need to drive this a lot harder."

Mr. Allen has unusual bipartisan support in Congress, but even some lawmakers who admire him are frustrated at the pace of progress at Homeland Security.

"We have been in this business for four years now," said Representative Bennie Thompson, Democrat of Mississippi, the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee. "We should be a lot farther down the road."

And as he begins to make progress — sifting through data collected on Americans and foreign visitors by Homeland Security or local and state authorities — his labor is causing unease among civil libertarians who consider it domestic spying.

"They call it a 'seamless national intelligence system' " said John Reinstein, legal director at the American Civil Liberities Union in Massachusetts. "I call it a reason to be very concerned."

Some of Mr. Allen's friends believe his task is almost hopeless. "What we're doing is essentially setting a great man up for failure," said John Gannon, a former C.I.A. deputy director of intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0132743

Mr. Allen is undeterred. He is again "breaking heads" and holding "Come to Jesus meetings" — his own description of his management style — and barking out demands to his staff.

"The country is at risk," he said. "It is a darker world."

The predawn telephone call is still seared into Mr. Allen's memory: it was Oct. 6,1973, at 3 a.m., and Golda Meir, the Israeli prime minister, had just told the White House that within hours her nation would be attacked by Syrian and Egyptian forces, which had been conducting drills along its borders.

The night before, Mr. Allen had approved the president's daily intelligence briefing, assuring President Richard M. Nixon that the military exercises were just a bluff.

"It takes the Israelis 48 hours to mobilize," he said, still wincing today over the consequences of his disastrously bad call. "There was nothing they could do."

From that day forward, Mr. Allen, who joined the C.I.A. immediately after graduating from the University of North Carolina, lived by new standards.

"Don't listen too much to what others are telling you," Mr. Allen said. "Constantly re-examine your assumptions."

Mr. Allen pushed himself and those around him to go deeper for information; Mr. Gannon calls him a "pile driver." Colleagues and bosses were often unwilling to accept his conclusions. But over the decades, Mr. Allen, whose C.I.A. posts included assistant director for collection and national intelligence officer for warning, compiled a remarkable record.

In the mid 1980s, he was the first to warn his C.I.A. superiors that a Marine officer named Oliver North appeared to be orchestrating a scheme in which profits from American weapons sales to Iran went to rebels fighting the government of Nicaragua.

In late July 1990, he warned that Iraq would invade Kuwait within days. Iraqi tanks rolled into Kuwait on Aug. 2.

After Al Qaeda's bombing of American embassies in East Africa, Mr. Allen pressed his superiors in 2000 and 2001 to send drones over Afghanistan to look for Osama bin Laden and his followers, a request that was delayed by disputes over financing. The 9/11 Commission, calling him the "indefatigable Charlie Allen," cited the missed opportunity.

And before the United States invaded Iraq in 2003, Mr. Allen led an effort to collect interviews of families of Iraqi scientists to ask about the country's secret weapons programs. The families said the programs had been halted, but Mr. Allen's bosses and the White House rejected that view.

Mr. Allen's critics label him a doomsayer, saying that his contrarian advice and strident warnings became so frequent that some at the C.I.A tuned him out.

But the critics are outnumbered by supporters of Mr. Allen. "Charlie is a national asset," said Paul Redmond, a former C.I.A. director of counterintelligence who briefly served as Homeland Security's intelligence chief. "He is not afraid to say, that's a bunch of nonsense."

When Homeland Security was created in 2003, its leaders could not even get the money or authorization for adequate office space.

From the start, the agency was pushed out of the leading role in assembling and tracking information on terror threats in the United States. With the blessing of the Bush administration, the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. in 2003 opened what is now known as the National Counterterrorism Center to do that job.

When Mr. Allen arrived at Homeland Security in 2005, he leaned on his intelligence contacts. Now his agency has a seat at the table when the six other leaders of the nation's top intelligence agencies meet with the director of national intelligence.

Mr. Allen recently checked out new office space at the National Counterterrorism Center in Northern Virginia, where his agency will soon take command of a new unit in charge of distributing information about terror threats to local and state officials, the private sector and other federal agencies.

He has also stepped up training for analysts at Homeland Security's six agencies with intelligence staffs, and begun recruiting at colleges.

He has installed analysts at a dozen so-called fusion centers set up by state and local police departments to coordinate reports of possible terror threats, and hopes to have his staff at all 35 centers nationwide by the end of next year. He has started units to look into homegrown terror threats and border security.

DOJ_NMG_0132744

To avoid civil liberties complaints, the teams are trained, he said, to ensure they collect information on Americans only if there is “reasonable suspicion” they represent a threat.

Building this network has required diplomacy. While visiting state and city police officers and chatting with members of Congress, he tries to convince them that Homeland Security has something to add, and is not simply creating another layer of bureaucracy.

“There are plenty of lanes to work in,” Mr. Allen frequently says. “And our lanes in the road I think are getting very well defined.”

Some local officials cite improvements. First Sgt. Lee Miller of the Virginia State Police said that when incidents occurred that might have a potential terror connection, his staff got answers faster than before.

But widespread skepticism about Mr. Allen’s operation remains.

Mr. Allen has had such a hard time recruiting a staff, nearly two-thirds of his analysts are contractors. Homeland Security’s own agencies — particularly Customs and Border Protection, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement — still often fail to share potentially important tips with other federal players, a failure that Mr. Allen says earned him a rebuke from John D. Negroponte, then the director of national intelligence.

Some local agencies echo that concern.

“Information doesn’t get to me because they don’t believe I have a need to know,” Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier of Washington said during a Senate hearing last month.

Richard A. Falkenrath, deputy commissioner for counterterrorism at the New York City Police Department, said that his department had a more valuable partnership with the F.B.I., which can not only warn of terror threats, but can also investigate and help prosecute them. The F.B.I. has about 100 counter-terrorism offices around the country.

Given the enormousness of the work ahead, Mr. Allen said he realized he would not complete the job. But during a recent late-afternoon interview in which his eyes seemed frequently almost to close, he said: “Right now, I’ll continue. There is much ahead.”

New Threat: Agro-Terrorism (CBS)

CBS News, February 16, 2007

Some Experts Warn That America's Food Chain Could Be An Inviting Target

(CBS) Nearly 300 people were sick before the current salmonella outbreak could be tracked to a peanut butter processor in Georgia, CBS News correspondent Bob Orr reports. Two hundred others were ill and three people had died by the time scientists traced last fall's E. coli contamination to California spinach.

Both accidental outbreaks underscore a frightening reality: Once a poison or bio-agent infects America's food chain, it's hard to detect — and even harder to stop making the U.S. food supply an inviting target for terrorists.

"This is the new fight, the battleground since 9/11," says John Perren, who runs the FBI office handing weapons of mass destruction.

Perren says so-called "agro-terrorism" is a real threat from "farm to fork."

"The food chain, the agriculture system, is very large. Therefore we have vulnerabilities. We consider that a soft target," Perren says.

While terrorists have not made a move against U.S. agriculture, bio-weapons researcher Jerry Jaxx says it would be easy to taint the food supply or damage America's $2 trillion farm economy.

"Certainly, these are risks that are very, very real," says Jaxx.

The most worrisome agro-weapon is "foot and mouth," a highly contagious disease that doesn't hurt people — but ravages livestock.

It was wiped out in the U.S. 80 years ago, but it remains a threat in much of the world. In 2001, 4 million infected animals in the United Kingdom had to be slaughtered and burned.

DOJ_NMG_0132745

Food experts warn a single outbreak of foot and mouth disease in the U.S., whether triggered by an accident or a terrorist, could cause much greater damage. Millions of cattle would have to be destroyed, and economic losses could run into the tens of billions of dollars.

The foot and mouth virus could be easily carried to the United States from an infected area by a tourist or a terrorist. Experts say reporting on this vulnerability — and other food-related risks — does not help terror groups. They already have the information.

Scientists are fighting back. CBS News got an exclusive look at a first-of-its- kind, yet-to-be-opened Agriculture Biosecurity Center at Kansas State University. Investigators there will work to identify emerging bio-threats, handling some of the most lethal pathogens, from E. coli to anthrax to foot and mouth.

"If we were to have some sort of an outbreak, we have a place to really deal with the science involved in trying to figure out how best to respond," Jaxx says.

The research will improve defenses against both deliberate and accidental contamination. Biologist Doug Powell says consumers should not overly worry about food-related threats.

"Agro-terrorism is always there. It's like food-borne illness in a way, in that you don't really know where it's going to come from next, so your best prevention is constant vigilance," Powell says.

An awareness that America's food supply, while the safest in the world, will never be completely free from risk.

FEDERAL DIARY: Effort To Give TSA Screeners Union Rights Advances (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 16, 2007

It was a good day for unions.

A Senate committee yesterday approved a measure that would give collective-bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration. The committee's action followed House approval of similar legislation last month.

If the Senate goes along with the committee's decision, the issue of union rights for TSA screeners is likely to provoke a rare clash with the White House over federal workplace rules. After the House vote, the Bush administration vowed to oppose the legislation.

The American Federation of Government Employees, which has pushed hard to bring TSA screeners into the union fold, praised the committee's decision and predicted the measure would improve working conditions for screeners.

"It is good news," said John Gage, the union president. AFGE plans to bring about 800 members to Washington near the end of this month to lobby Congress on behalf of the screeners, he said. "We have some work to do with the Republican side of the aisle, and I think we will be successful."

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, proposed the union-rights amendment to the Senate bill that would implement unfinished recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission. He prevailed on a party-line vote of 9 to 8.

As part of the response to the 2001 terrorist attacks, Congress created the TSA to take charge of passenger and baggage screening at the nation's airports. It also provided the head of the TSA with leeway to set personnel rules and ban unions.

The TSA later merged into the Department of Homeland Security, where unions filed suit to stop proposed curbs to bargaining rights.

But Lieberman said "personnel management has been troubled at TSA" and concluded that "it is time to give TSA screeners parity with other security officers within TSA and DHS in terms of their employment rights and protections."

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), a committee member, spoke against Lieberman's amendment. He said there have not been sufficient hearings on unionization of TSA workers, that the 9/11 Commission Report did not recommend it, and that allowing unions at the TSA would strip the agency of its ability to quickly deploy employees to respond to terrorist threats.

But AFGE had lobbied senators before the vote, contending that current law permits agencies to take whatever personnel actions they deem necessary to respond to emergencies. The union stressed that other law enforcement bureaus in Homeland Security, such as Border Patrol and Customs and Border Protection, permit their employees to be represented by unions.

"Denying these people rights that everyone else has in Homeland Security is not based on any rational reason," said Gage, who brought a TSA screener from New Haven, Conn., this week to meet with Lieberman and explain why screeners should be able to join unions.

TSA officials said steps have been taken to ensure that security screeners can share their views with agency management. An employee advisory council brings in screeners from around the country to offer advice on compensation and other issues, and the TSA is rolling out a model workplace program to airports to teach employees and managers how to collaborate and resolve workplace issues, the officials said.

"This is our way to get our employees heard and let them have a voice and a seat at the table," said Gale Rossides, an associate administrator at the TSA.

The agency recently completed its first year under a pay-for-performance system that was designed with feedback from more than 4,000 employees, "telling us what was important," Rossides said.

Turnover at the TSA is declining and compares favorably with the transportation and utilities industries, Rossides said. In fiscal 2006, the TSA's attrition rate was 16.5 percent, while turnover was 19.6 percent in transportation-utilities sector, she said.

"We are continuing to focus to drive that number down," Rossides added.Talk Shows

Steven L. Katz, a former Senate committee counsel and a former federal agency executive, will be the guest on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

John Salamone, executive director of the Chief Human Capital Officers Council at the Office of Personnel Management, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. tomorrow on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

9/11 Bill Boosts TSA Union Rights (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

The Senate version of legislation implementing the remaining recommendations of the September 11 commission, like its House counterpart passed earlier this year, has a provision expanding union rights for airport security screeners.

The bill, which was marked up and reported out yesterday by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, also mandates a pilot project that would allow new secure driver's licenses to be used instead of passports at the Canadian border. However, it does not contain some of the more radical cargo and port security measures in the House version.

Language added to the bill in an amendment proposed by committee Chairman Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, repeals a footnote in the 2001 law setting up the Transportation Security Administration. The footnote gave the agency's director wide discretion to decide issues of union and other labor rights for the thousands of passenger and baggage screeners it employs.

The amendment passed on a party-line vote, and the entire bill -- the Improving America's Security Act -- was approved by the committee unanimously.

Charity Wilson, a congressional lobbyist for the American Federation of Government Employees, said the labor rights language, if passed into law, would ensure that TSA screeners had the same collective bargaining, union rights and whistleblower protections as other civil servants.

The TSA "will no longer be able to pick and choose which labor laws apply to its workers," said Miss Wilson, and the screeners would be entitled to unionize like other federal employees.

She added it was "no coincidence" that TSA screeners, effectively denied union representation for more than five years, have one of the highest rates of complaints about workplace discrimination of any federal workers, an attrition rate more than 10 times that of the U.S. government as a whole and one of the highest injury rates of any job classification tracked by the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0132747

An amendment proposed by Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, mandates that the Department of Homeland Security set up a pilot program with at least one state under which machine-readable, tamper-proof driver's licenses could be used at the Canadian border instead of a U.S. passport or special passport card when more secure documents become required at all U.S. borders under the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative.

That initiative, mandated by Congress in 2004, requires the government to move toward requiring passports or other secure documents establishing identity and citizenship from Americans re-entering the country. Language in last year's homeland security appropriations law postponed the introduction of the initiative until 2009 and required officials to pass a series of benchmarks and certifications before it could be implemented. Mr. Coleman's amendment adds to the list of things officials are required to have completed before they can implement the initiative.

Coleman spokesman LeRoy Coleman said the senator thinks that new security improvements in driver's licenses "present an opportunity to explore their possible use to meet the requirements of [the initiative]."

Freedom From Fear (NYT)

By Guy Nordenson

New York Times, February 16, 2007

THERE is still time to take the fear out of the Freedom Tower. Despite reports that Gov. Eliot Spitzer has now decided to back the project, the fact is that with a little time it is still possible to rethink the tower and make it both secure and welcoming without setting back the overall ground zero construction schedule.

The current design, which was unveiled in 2006, was created under pressure from former Gov. George Pataki, who tied his presidential ambitions to its swift completion. In this plan, the architects and engineers, for several reasons, took a very conservative approach. The result, a 20-story fortified wall around the base of a 1,776-foot tower, hardly evokes freedom — rather, it embodies fear and anxiety.

I write from experience. Some four years ago I began working with David Childs, the principal architect, on the first version of the Freedom Tower. This was a 2,000-foot-tall structure of torquing glass and steel; the bottom half contained the office building while the top half was a broadcast tower composed of an open framework of cables and trusses. (Also in 2002 The New York Times Magazine published a proposal of mine for a 2,000-foot-tall broadcast tower on the site that we have been working on intermittently ever since.)The structure would have given the tower the widest TV broadcast capacity possible, at the maximum height allowed by the Federal Aviation Administration. The office floors ended at about 70 stories, matching the tallest downtown office building, with as much overall floor area as the current design and with every floor having direct access to the ground level by elevator. The open, cable-stayed upper 1,000 feet of the structure would have had wind turbines that would have met more than 20 percent of the building's energy needs, a fitting symbol for a city whose seal includes a windmill.

While the basic design won over almost everyone involved with the project, including many of the governor's advisers, Mr. Pataki asked the architect to amend it in late 2003. Specifically, he wanted Mr. Childs to reduce the upper structure from 2,000 to 1,500 feet, and to add a slender 276-foot antenna to make it a symbolic 1,776 feet tall. The alterations, unfortunately, made the design impossible to build, and eventually the entire concept was abandoned.

So Mr. Childs presented the revised Freedom Tower, which meets Mr. Pataki's interests but bears no resemblance to his initial design. It is in every way inferior, and those flaws — in terms of aesthetics, economics, security and ethics — are all rooted in the way in which it was conceived.

First, the aesthetics. The critics have not been kind to the Freedom Tower. The solid geometry is self-centered — this newspaper's critic wrote that it "evokes a gigantic glass paperweight with a toothpick stuck on top" — without any sense of orientation or any recognition of its place in the skyline. This is a shame, especially considering what the same architects showed they were capable of next door, in the elegant new 7 World Trade Center building.

But it is understandable: not only were the architects rushed by Mr. Pataki, but after the ordeal of the first design's development and rejection, it seems natural that Mr. Childs would reach for a simple geometry the second time around. The result, unfortunately, would be second rate in Chicago, Dubai or Shanghai, and should not be the symbol of New York City, let alone freedom.

Second, the finances of the new building are a disaster. The Freedom Tower will most likely cost around $3 billion to build, for 2.6 million square feet of office space. The cost of $1,150 a square foot is nearly twice what it cost to build the new Museum of Modern Art, for which I was also the engineer. Of the cost, about $1 billion will be paid with insurance money collected by the ground zero leaseholder, Larry Silverstein.

Assuming that the owners of the Freedom Tower, the Port Authority, are able to sign government or other tenants on at market rate rents of $50 to $60 per square foot, the income on the entire property, after expenses and taxes and including the rent on the TV antennas, will be at most $100 million dollars a year, which is less than 4 percent return on the investment. The Port Authority would do better buying back its bonds, which now offer a return of greater than 5 percent. What is more, the property is probably uninsurable, so the Port Authority will be spending billions for a below-market return and a substantial risk.

Third, the security concerns that have blocked so many facets of the plan remain unresolved. Last January, I sat in a meeting in the New York City police commissioner's conference room and listened to a debate on various security plans and blast-resistant designs for the different projects at ground zero. In the end, James Kallstrom, Governor Pataki's senior counterterrorism adviser and the security coordinator for ground zero, closed the discussion by saying, "Structural engineers will have to certify that the design meets the threat basis."

I understood this to mean that as long as the engineers signed off on the design, everything would be considered fine. This is worrisome, especially given that that the computer software that is being used to simulate the blast effects is proprietary and classified by the federal government, and that the structural engineers being asked to certify the building do not have clearance or direct access to the program, only the data given them by the software.

In contrast, the approach taken by most private building owners in the city — which generally includes physical tests, repeated independent computer simulations and help from the Defense Department's technical support working group — provides real assurances of security. The Freedom Tower deserves the same sound engineering approach as any commercial project.

The final problem with the tower is less obvious: the politically charged situation under which it was conceived has led to ethical problems in terms of tenancy. Mr. Silverstein never wanted to build the Freedom Tower, and few could blame him. The site is awkward, too far from public transportation and Wall Street, and the tower is too big for the downtown real estate market to absorb in time to realize a good profit. Last year, he exchanged this problem for the three towers he is now developing on the site, leaving the Port Authority saddled with the Freedom Tower.

The authority itself, however, will not occupy the Freedom Tower but will rent space from Mr. Silverstein in Tower Four, at the opposite corner of the site. So far, state agencies, under pressure from Mr. Pataki, have signed on for about 400,000 square feet (roughly one-sixth of the tower's floor space) Federal agencies including the Customs Service and the Secret Service will most likely sign on for 600,000 square feet.

In other words, government employees are being conscripted to occupy a tower that no private company or authority — including the building's owner — will take. At a time when there is considerable anguish over the 20,000 additional troops that President Bush wants to send to Baghdad, it seems that the ethics of forcing thousands of state and federal employees to work in fear in the Freedom Tower is fundamentally flawed.

The good news is that it is not too late to change things. The current construction of the foundation and subterranean levels does not lock us into a final design above ground. The work should continue up to the ground level and stop (this should take about a year) so that the architects and engineers are given another chance to design a Freedom Tower that, like other buildings rising downtown, is financially viable and a secure and welcoming work environment worthy of its place in the skyline.

Couple Drops Suit Against Allstate Over Katrina Damage (LAW/AP)

By Michael Kunzelman, The Associated Press

AP, February 16, 2007

The first federal trial in New Orleans in the wave of insurance litigation spawned by Hurricane Katrina ended abruptly Thursday when a couple suing Allstate Indemnity Co. dropped their lawsuit amid allegations they misrepresented their claims.

DOJ_NMG_0132749

Lawrence and Elizabeth Tomlinson, who claimed Allstate underpaid them and acted in bad faith in handling their claims, agreed to drop the suit before jurors could hear closing arguments in the case.

The Tomlinsons' attorney, Christy Howley, would not specify why they didn't let a jury decide the case, but Allstate, in court papers, had accused the couple of misrepresenting their claim.

The Northbrook, Ill.-based insurer said it paid the Tomlinsons more than $30,000 for living expenses after they moved into office property that they already owned. Lawrence Tomlinson testified that Allstate knew of their living arrangement when they made the payment.

Allstate paid the Tomlinsons a total of more than $150,000 for damage to their home and its contents, plus living expenses. The couple claimed the company underpaid them after Katrina's winds tore holes in their roof and let rain pour into their home in the New Orleans suburb of Marrero.

The insurer disputed the extent of the damage and suggested that the couple overbilled them for certain renovations to the home. Allstate attorney Judy Barrasso declined to say whether the company has considered taking further legal action against the couple.

"At the conclusion of the evidence, the plaintiffs decided voluntarily to withdraw their claims and relinquish any right to refile them," Barrasso said. "The plaintiffs have not received any compensation of any kind from Allstate for withdrawing their claim."

Lawrence Tomlinson declined to discuss his reason for not pursuing the case, saying only that the trial "has been a long trip." Elizabeth Tomlinson, an attorney who is due to give birth in about two weeks, left the courtroom in tears.

Howley said her clients were ready to "go back to their lives and rebuild with the moneys they had already been paid" after more than a year out of their home and a long legal challenge.

"A jury verdict, until the jury returns with it, is always an unknown and due to some of the evidence and testimony, Mr. and Mrs. Tomlinson decided they would rather end the litigation than pursue their claims," Howley said.

She declined to say what evidence and testimony led the couple to that conclusion.

The case was the first federal lawsuit tried against an insurance company by a Louisiana homeowner since Hurricane Katrina. About 1,000 other lawsuits are pending against Allstate alone in federal court in New Orleans.

Tulane Law School professor Ed Sherman said the Tomlinsons' case is "very individualized" and isn't likely to have any legal bearing on similar lawsuits. "That's why I don't think this (case) sets any precedent," he added.

Alan Kanner, a lawyer who represents other policyholders with lawsuits against insurers after Katrina, said he isn't aware of other cases where insurers have accused plaintiffs of misrepresenting Katrina claims. But he isn't surprised that Allstate would employ that defense.

"It's a common defense tactic to blame the victims, whether it's in an insurance case or any other kind of case," he said. "They do it in lots of different ways."

U.S. District Judge Martin dismissed the seven-member jury, which had been selected Monday, and apologized to them for making them wait several hours Thursday morning. "The good news is that claims and defenses have been mutually withdrawn," Feldman told the jury. "This litigation no longer exists."

Steal Magnolia (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

State Farm, the nation's largest home insurer, announced this week that it would no longer be writing new homeowner or commercial policies in Mississippi. Magnolia Staters wondering whom to thank for their rising insurance bills, assuming they can get insurance at all, should direct their catcalls at Attorney General Jim Hood.

Mr. Hood should have seen this coming back in September of 2005, when he launched his populist campaign against insurers. In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, private insurers began invoking their entirely legal "flood exclusions" and refusing to pay for any damage that wasn't caused by wind. These exclusions had been clearly written into contracts, yet Mr. Hood declared them "unconscionable" and sued the industry.

He claimed victory several weeks ago when he bludgeoned State Farm into a settlement, although everyone can now see his triumph comes at a price. State Farm will now be paying at least tens of millions of dollars in claims that it never factored into its risk premiums, and it has reasonably chosen not to make itself vulnerable again to Mr. Hood's extortion.

"It is no longer prudent for us to take on additional risk in a legal and business environment that is becoming more unpredictable," said State Farm Senior Vice President Bob Trippel, which is a polite way of saying "we'd be nuts to keep doing business in a state that can't spell c-o-n-t-r-a-c-t."

State Farm joins Allstate, which last year also stopped writing policies along Mississippi's coast. Together, the two insurers make up 40.5% of the Mississippi market. Homeowners looking for coverage will now have fewer companies to choose from, with higher premiums the likely result. If the rest of the industry follows suit and also exits Mississippi, consumers could have no choice at all.

Surrounding states such as Florida, which have begun to follow Mr. Hood down the insurance-bashing path, might want to reverse course before their own consumers end up staring down the next hurricane with no coverage. As for Mr. Hood, he and his buddies in the tort bar have provided an exquisite illustration of how political and legal predation against business ends up harming the little guy.

In Setback For New Orleans, Fed-Up Residents Give Up (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 15 — After nearly a decade in the city of their dreams, Kasandra Larsen and her fiancé, Dylan Langlois, climbed into a rented moving truck on Marais Street last Sunday, pointed it toward New Hampshire, and said goodbye.

Not because of some great betrayal — they had, after all, come back after losing everything in Hurricane Katrina — but a series of escalating indignities: the attempted carjacking of a pregnant friend; the announced move to Nashville by Ms. Larsen's employer; the human feces deposited on their roof by, they suspect, the contractors next door; the two burglaries in the space of a week; and, not least, the overnight wait for the police to respond.

A year ago, Ms. Larsen, 36, and Mr. Langlois, 37, were hopeful New Orleanians eager to rebuild and improve the city they adored. But now they have joined hundreds of the city's best and brightest who, as if finally acknowledging a lover's destructive impulses, have made the wrenching decision to leave at a time when the population is supposed to be rebounding.

Their reasons include high crime, high rents, soaring insurance premiums and what many call a lack of leadership, competence, money and progress. In other words: yes, it is still bad down here. But more damning is what many of them describe as a dissipating sense of possibility, a dwindling chance at redemption for a great city that, even before the storm, cried out for great improvement.

"The window of opportunity is closing," Ms. Larsen said, "before more people like us give up and say it's too little, too late."

Mr. Langlois, who has repeatedly called the health and sanitation departments, the police and City Hall, said he despaired of receiving any response. In November, the couple bought their first house, and in December, they bought their first handgun.

"My friends here are just the greatest, hard-working, tax-paying people," Mr. Langlois said, "and I think a lot of us are feeling under siege."

The couple are unlikely to make any money on the sale of their house.

For every household that, like this one, has given up, there is another on the verge. Tyrone Wilson, a successful real estate agent and consultant, said he and his wife, Trina, a lawyer, had given post-storm life a fair chance. But, Mr. Wilson said, at the end of the school year they are likely to take their three children back to Dallas, where they took refuge after the storm.

"We came back, we tried," he said. "It's really draining, and at a certain point you sit down and you say, 'We don't have to go through this.' "

As a city in flux, New Orleans remains statistically murky, but demographers generally agree that the population replenishment after the storm, as measured by things like the amount of mail sent and employment in main economic sectors, has leveled off. While many poorer residents have moved back to the city, the "brain drain" of professionals that the city was experiencing before the storm appears to have accelerated.

DOJ_NMG_0132751

Some say the overall effect is negligible. Greg Rigamer, a demographer who has done work for the city, said that the lack of housing had constrained the recovery, but that many residents remained fully committed to the city.

"The pattern in is certainly stronger than the pattern out," Mr. Rigamer said.

But in December, the number of houses on the market peaked at a high not seen since the late 1980s, while the number of sales has trended downward since last June, according to data tracked by the Brookings Institution in Washington. Statistics kept by commercial moving companies show a net loss to New Orleans. Employers say they have raised salaries for skilled workers.

One oft-cited survey by the University of New Orleans found that a third of residents, especially those with graduate degrees, were thinking of leaving within two years.

Susan E. Howell, who conducted the survey, cautioned that the sample was small and that the poor were underrepresented. There are indications that low-income New Orleanians — those who will need the most help from a cash-strapped city —are making their way back, despite a lack of affordable housing, piling into relatives' homes and trailers.

U-Haul, the rental company that is more affordable than commercial movers, has had more inbound trucks than outbound, according to the company's records, and the number of public school children and new applications for food stamps in Orleans Parish are rising. In Houston, a task force that helps Hurricane Katrina residents resettle has paid more than $1 million in moving expenses for 350 families returning to New Orleans.

"This is a serious problem for the city, because one of the things we had pre-Katrina was the lack of an educated population," Dr. Howell said. "We had too many people at the low end and not enough at the high end, and Katrina sort of fast-forwarded that trend."

Because many poorer people have taken longer to return, they have not dealt with as many months of frustration as families with higher income and more mobility, so their staying power has yet to be determined.

Reganer Stewart, 30, a hotel maid, said she had been living with her cousin and her cousin's mother and four children since November. In January, Ms. Stewart's 12-year-old daughter, Brandi, joined them, but was put on a waiting list for school and could not enroll until earlier this month.

Houston, which Ms. Stewart had not liked when she evacuated there, was growing more attractive as her search for an apartment here grew longer. "Most likely, we going to leave," she said.

In battered but proud New Orleans, abandonment is a highly emotional subject, in part because many have made sacrifices to stay and rebuild. To some, leaving now is tantamount to treason. When a report appeared a year ago that Emeril Lagasse, the famed chef, had said the city would "never come back," reservations at his restaurants were canceled and strangers berated him. He insisted he had been misquoted.

And in response to an article in The Times-Picayune of New Orleans about a woman who had decided to move on, Poppy Z. Brite, a New Orleans novelist, wrote: "This isn't an easy place to be right now, and the decision to stay or go is deeply personal. But why must some people use the media to take a parting shot at the city?"

On another occasion, Ms. Brite said, "If a place takes you in and you take it into yourself, you don't desert it just because it can kill you. There are some things more valuable than life."

Such fierce sentiments help explain why a dozen people who were planning to move or had already done so declined to speak on the record for this article or allow their name to be used. One man, a chef, said he wanted to remain anonymous because he was likely to return someday. A university professor said she did not want to compromise her employer's ability to recruit.

"If I was going to be really politically savvy," she said, "I would say that I was going to do a job search about this time anyway."

The decision to leave is especially difficult for natives, said Elliott Stonecipher, a demographic analyst in Shreveport, La., even if they are going no farther than the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain.

"They just won't talk about it; they do not want to talk about it," Mr. Stonecipher said, adding that the reluctance shows just how unusual the city is. "It's remarkable that they just don't want anybody to know that they gave in."

Others have unimpeachable reasons: Paul Gailiunas, a doctor whose wife, Helen Hill, was murdered in their home last month, left immediately for South Carolina.

DOJ_NMG_0132752

As for Ms. Larsen and Mr. Langlois, they have taken in all the fury at those who are leaving, in newspapers, neighborhood forums on the Internet and even in the bars and cafes of their neighborhood, the Ninth Ward. But while many of their own friends had expressed disappointment, none had blamed them.

"Not only do they understand why we're leaving," Ms. Larsen said, "but they say, 'You know what, I'm thinking about getting out of here, too.' It's like they're waiting for that one more bad thing to happen."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Boosts Troops For Afghanistan (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 16, 2007

President George W. Bush is sending an additional 3,200 troops to Afghanistan to bolster US and Nato forces ahead of an expected tough spring offensive by the resurgent Taliban.

Borrowing the rhetoric of US and Nato commanders, who are preparing to step up their campaign against the Taliban, Mr Bush said: "This spring there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan. It's going to be a Nato offensive, and that's part of our strategy."

The Pentagon will send the 173rd Airborne brigade, which was originally scheduled for deployment to Iraq, to Afghanistan to replace another brigade whose tour was recently extended by several months.

In a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, Mr Bush sought to set out a strategy for political and military success, saying troop increases would be sustained. The move comes as Congress debates his strategy to send additional troops to Iraq to pacify Baghdad. Lawmakers are less resistant to sending more troops to Afghanistan, where Democrats and Republicans agree that the US and Nato need to strengthen their efforts to deal with the Taliban.

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, and John McCain, Arizona senator and likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, in Munich last weekend strongly urged European countries to increase their military and financial participation in the Afghanistan campaign. Mr Gates said it was important to remember that Nato was a "military alliance" and not a "social club". The US wants some European members, including Germany and Spain, to eliminate some of the restrictions on their troops in the Nato force.

Mr Bush on Thursday said he had asked Congress for $11.8bn (€9bn, £6bn) over the next two years "to help this young democracy survive and have extended the stay of 3,000 troops . . . The forces and funds will help Hamid Karzai [the Afghan president] defeat our common enemies".

The decision to send additional troops followed a comprehensive review of administration strategy but also comes amid mounting criticism from Democrats such as John Kerry who see the Iraq war as a dangerous diversion from tackling the Taliban threat.

Mr Bush said there had been progress in the past five years in Afghanistan, such as expanding education and doubling the size of the economy, but he acknowledged the deterioration in conditions, with roadside bombs doubling last year and suicide bombs increasing fivefold.

Bush Extends Stay Of Troops In Afghanistan (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush urged NATO allies Thursday to boost their efforts in Afghanistan and said he is extending the stay of 3,200 U.S. troops there to help beat back a resurgent Taliban and al-Qaeda.

Bush highlighted the role of NATO and its member nations in Afghanistan, the first theater in the global war on terrorism. Bush spoke to the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank.

"For NATO to succeed, member nations must provide commanders on the ground with the troops and the equipment they need to do their jobs," Bush said.

A U.S.-dominated coalition deposed the Taliban shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. The Taliban had given sanctuary to al-Qaeda, which carried out the attacks.

Bush noted that 2006 was the most violent year in Afghanistan since the 2001 liberation, with the Taliban and al-Qaeda launching strikes against Afghan President Hamid Karzai's new government in Kabul. Last year, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton said "the huge focus of U.S. political, military and economic support on Iraq has necessarily diverted attention from Afghanistan."

Warning that the Taliban and al-Qaeda are planning new attacks as the winter snow melts, Bush outlined a multipoint plan that includes boosting Afghanistan's military and police forces, creating jobs for Afghans to build roads and other infrastructure, steps to curb government corruption and a crackdown on poppy cultivation to stem the production and sale of illegal drugs.

Bush also said he asked Congress for $11.8 billion in aid to Afghanistan for the next two years.

Nations that have sent the most troops to Afghanistan — including Great Britain, the Netherlands and Canada — have joined the United States in lobbying other NATO members. There are about 35,000 NATO troops.

Bush also called on member nations to lift restrictions on the troops they sent to Afghanistan. NATO forces, he said, "must have the flexibility and rules of engagement to do their job." Some nations, whose identities are unknown, forbid troops from fighting in certain parts of the country, or at night.

Bush also praised NATO nations for increased contributions, such as new aircraft from Italy and special operations forces coming from Norway, Lithuania and the Czech Republic.

The president's strategy also includes helping Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf prevent attacks on Afghanistan that are launched from his country. Karzai has questioned Musharraf's commitment to finding terrorists, but Bush said he is confident the Pakistani leader wants to root out Taliban and al-Qaeda bases on his nation's border with Afghanistan.

"This is wild country," Bush said. "This is wilder than the Wild West."

The president briefly mentioned the ongoing debate in the House of Representatives on a resolution opposing his plan to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq. The Democratic-led House is expected to approve the resolution today.

While the House resolution is non-binding, Bush said members soon will be voting on an emergency spending bill to provide funding for troops. He said the troops "are counting on their elected leaders to provide them with the support they need."

The American Enterprise Institute was once home to several members of the Bush administration, such as Vice President Cheney, and has long supported Bush's foreign policy initiatives.

Bush Pushes NATO To Foil Taliban Offensive (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

President Bush yesterday said NATO will begin a new military campaign to defeat the Taliban in Afghanistan, announced U.S. troop levels in that country will remain at their all-time high of 27,000 "for the foreseeable future," and said NATO allies must respond with more troops of their own.

"This spring there is going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan, and it's going to be a NATO offensive," the president said in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, laying out a path forward in Afghanistan. "That's part of our strategy -- relentless in our pressure. We will not give in to murderers and extremists."

He promised a five-part plan designed to put Afghan President Hamid Karzai's government on more solid footing, including training 26,000 more national police and 48,000 more troops for the military; strengthening NATO's commitment; improving provincial government; reversing last year's growth in heroin-producing poppy, which finances the Taliban; and helping Mr. Karzai fight corruption in the judicial system.

Mr. Bush also repeated his challenge to NATO member nations that when NATO commanders say they need reinforcements, "our NATO countries must provide it."

DOJ_NMG_0132754

The speech comes as a growing number of Democrats and Republicans say the administration has failed to complete the mission in Afghanistan in part because Mr. Bush has been too preoccupied in Iraq.

Last month, when the president announced his plan to send reinforcements to Iraq, top Democrats accused him of fulfilling that pledge by shifting troops from Afghanistan.

Yesterday Democrats said Mr. Bush is responsible for the new nation's failures.

"The Bush administration took its eye off the ball in Afghanistan, leaving a deteriorating situation to worsen and Osama bin Laden on the loose more than five years after 9/11," said Democratic National Committee Press Secretary Stacie Paxton.

The new strategy drew a mixed review from Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the top Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee. She said the steps to secure the Afghan-Pakistan border and create economic opportunities are solid, but that Mr. Bush should do more against drug trafficking.

"Until the Afghan judicial system has been rid of the corrupting influence of drugs, we should implement an approach that has been used successfully in the fight against drugs in Colombia, namely extradition of the major kingpins to the U.S.," she said.

Just as 2006 saw increased violence and insurgent successes in Iraq, it was also a year in which Taliban and al Qaeda fighters stepped up their battle to win control of more of Afghanistan.

Mr. Bush ticked off the indicators: Roadside bombs nearly doubled, engagements between insurgents and troops tripled, and suicide bombings grew five-fold.

He also said opium poppy cultivation, which had fallen in 2005, saw "a marked increase" last year.

The president challenged Afghanistan's government to tackle that problem, saying, "I have made my concerns to President Karzai pretty clear -- not pretty clear, very clear."

Bush Tells NATO To Reinforce Afghanistan (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, February 16, 2007

President Bush said Thursday that NATO allies need to supply more soldiers to Afghanistan and be willing to send them into the most violent battles with Taliban fighters, who are gearing up for a new spring offensive.

"When our commanders on the ground say to our respective countries we need additional help, our NATO countries must provide it," Bush said.

Flush with money from heroin-producing poppy crops, Taliban fighters have proven much tougher than NATO expected when it deployed its first contingent of peacekeepers there in 2003.

"I've ordered an increase in U.S. forces in Afghanistan," Bush said in a speech that comes five years after U.S.-led forces toppled Afghanistan's repressive Taliban regime. "We've extended the stay of 3,200 troops now in the country, for four months, and we'll deploy a replacement force that will sustain this increase for the foreseeable future."

The Pentagon announced on Wednesday that 3,200 soldiers scheduled to go to Iraq would be sent to Afghanistan instead, replacing the troops extended for four months. Deployment of the 173rd Airborne Brigade, based in Vicenza, Italy, would keep the force at the current strength of 27,000 — the highest of the war.

About 15,000 of the American troops in Afghanistan are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 36,000. The other 12,000 are special operations forces or are training Afghan troops.

Calling poppy cultivation a threat to a fragile democracy, Bush implored President Hamid Karzai to address the marked increase in harvests last year, after a decline in 2005.

"I have made my concerns to President Karzai pretty clear — not pretty clear, very clear — and that in order for him to gain the confidence of his people, and the confidence of the world, he's got to do something about it, with our help," Bush said in an hour-long speech sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute.

Meanwhile, Defense Secretary Robert Gates, just back from a trip that included a stop in Pakistan, said the planned offensive in Afghanistan was an attempt to react ahead of an expected seasonal Taliban offensive.

"What we want to do this spring is have this spring offensive be our offensive and, and have the initiative in our hands rather than reacting to them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0132755

Asked whether he had talked with Pakistan President Gen. Pervez Musharraf about the hunt for al-Qaida fugitive Osama bin Laden, Gates said he would not "get into specifics" about their talks.

But, said Gates, "If I were Osama bin Laden, I'd keep looking over my shoulder."

The call for NATO nations to supply more soldiers and equipment to fight the Taliban was a nudge to Germany and other NATO nations that have kept their troops out of the most violent parts of Afghanistan.

Politicians in Canada, Britain, the United States and other nations with troops in southern Afghanistan have been irked by the reluctance of some European allies to commit extra troops to the 35,500-strong NATO force, and in particular to allow their troops to be deployed to the Taliban's heartland in the south and east.

"Allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide so NATO commanders have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy wherever the enemy may make a stand," Bush said.

On Capitol Hill, House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos, D-Calif., said NATO commanders should not have to beg for troops from countries like Germany, France, Italy and Spain.

Bush called 2006 the most violent year in Afghanistan since the invasion.

"Across Afghanistan last year, the number of roadside bomb attacks doubled, direct fire attacks on international forces almost tripled and suicide bombings grew nearly fivefold," Bush said.

This week, NATO's top commander renewed an appeal for allies to fill gaps in the international military force in Afghanistan, warning that failure to send reinforcements was weakening the mission and jeopardizing the lives of soldiers fighting the Taliban. In Canada, a Senate committee said Tuesday that the government should a consider withdrawing its 2,500 troops unless NATO allies deliver additional troops.

Critics say the Bush administration has let conditions in Afghanistan worsen while escalating the war in Iraq.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., said he hoped the steps Bush announced for Afghanistan were the first, not last, in a recommitment to Afghanistan. Speaking at the Brookings Institution, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said he was pleased Bush had recognized that "unless we surge troops, hardware, money and high-level attention into Afghanistan it will fall back into the hands of the Taliban, terrorists and drug traffickers."

Bush has asked Congress for $10.6 billion during the next two years for Afghanistan — $8.6 billion for training and equipping Afghan police and security forces and $2 billion for reconstruction.

Bush said another threat to democracy is the terrorist traffic along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan, a lawless area the president described as "wilder than the Wild West." The border regions long have been suspected to be the hiding places for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

Bush Pushes NATO For More Troops In Afghanistan (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush warned Thursday that fighting in Afghanistan was likely to flare this spring, and he called for a renewed commitment from NATO allies for additional troop commitments to battle Taliban insurgents.

In a speech delivered to an audience heavy with ambassadors and diplomats, Bush acknowledged that attacks and bombings increased sharply in the last year, making 2006 "the most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country" in 2001.

But he insisted that even as the United States is increasing its troop presence in Iraq, it also is able to increase its commitment in Afghanistan. Bush said he expected North Atlantic Treaty Organization members to do the same.

"The snow is going to melt in the Hindu Kush mountains. And when it does, we can expect fierce fighting to continue. Taliban and Al Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks," he said.

The U.S. and NATO forces are prepared, Bush said.

"Our strategy is not to be on the defense but to go on the offense," he said. "This spring, there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan, and it's going to be a NATO offensive."

DOJ_NMG_0132756

American officials have expressed frustration in recent weeks with some NATO allies, saying they have failed to live up to their commitments in Afghanistan. They have bristled at the restrictions some NATO countries have placed on how and where their troops and equipment can be used.

"When our commanders on the ground say to our respective countries, 'We need additional help,' our NATO countries must provide it in order to be successful in this mission," Bush said. "As well, allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide, so NATO commanders have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy wherever the enemy may make a stand."

In January, the Pentagon increased the number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan by 3,200 by extending the deployment of a brigade of the Army's 10th Mountain Division. Bush mentioned the troop increase as well as the administration's request for congressional approval of an additional $11.8 billion in aid over two years to shore up the government of President Hamid Karzai. Bush outlined plans to improve Afghan police and army units, eradicate illegal opium crops and build new roads.

Frederick D. Barton, who studies postwar reconstruction at the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the president's speech appeared aimed at preparing the public for a bloody spring in Afghanistan.

"For us, 2007 is the fulcrum year," Barton said. "If we don't turn it around, we are looking at a slow deterioration through inertia."

Thomas Donnelly, a national security analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, the conservative think tank that sponsored Bush's speech, said the address marked the end of a period of neglect for Afghanistan, a conflict that enjoys more support in Congress and abroad than does the war in Iraq.

"That's the most crucial message of all, to convince friend and foe alike that we are in it for the long haul," Donnelly said.

Bush's call for NATO countries to step up their contributions is the latest in a series of efforts to revive the allied effort.

But other than the United States and Britain, which has pledged an additional 800 troops, no other NATO country has agreed to a substantial increase in its Afghan deployment.

With the new forces, the U.S. has about 25,000 troops in Afghanistan, its highest level ever, and Britain will have about 6,000.

Bush Promises Strong Effort To Counter Resurgent Taliban (WP)

By Peter Baker And Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

President Bush vowed yesterday to make a sustained new military and political effort to beat back resurgent Taliban forces as he turned his attention back to Afghanistan and a conflict that has been overshadowed for the past couple of years by the larger war in Iraq.

Bush announced that he will extend a temporary increase of 3,200 U.S. troops in Afghanistan "for the foreseeable future" and urged Congress to give him $11.8 billion more to accelerate training, reconstruction and counter-narcotics programs. He also insisted that NATO allies should drop restrictions on their forces in Afghanistan and join the fight against Islamic extremists.

"America and our allies are going to stand with these folks," the president said in an address to the American Enterprise Institute. "That's the message I want to deliver to the Afghanistan people today. Free debates are important. But our commitment is strong. We will train you, we will help you, and we will stand with you as you defend your new democracy."

The speech was the first Bush has devoted to Afghanistan during his second term, reflecting the shifting priorities in Washington as the Iraq war has turned increasingly violent and consumed more of the president's attention. But though Iraq dominated the debate, remnants of the ousted Taliban government have regrouped and launched a potent new challenge. Attacks on U.S., Afghan and other coalition forces nearly tripled last year, and the Taliban by some estimates controls four times as much territory as in 2005.

"The focus on Iraq has definitely diminished not just the amount of resources that can be applied . . . but it's also a question of the time and attention that top policymakers can spend on the problem," said James Dobbins, a former special envoy to Afghanistan who now works as a national security analyst at the Rand Corp. "Iraq has tended to suck the air out of the system for the last couple of years."

White House aides said Bush has devoted a lot of time to Afghanistan but has come to understand that more needs to be done. The administration started a review of Afghanistan policy last summer and concluded in December that more troops, money and diplomacy were necessary. Elements of the plan have been reported, but yesterday was the first time Bush laid them all out.

A 3,200-member brigade from the Army's 10th Mountain Division that was scheduled to come home in February will instead stay for another four months. And the Pentagon said this week that the 173rd Airborne Brigade, originally slated to head to Iraq, will then replace it, increasing U.S. troops in Afghanistan to 27,000. In his speech, Bush expressed a commitment to make that increase indefinite.

As part of the emergency war spending package he sent to Congress this month, the president asked for $8.6 billion for training Afghan security forces, $1.4 billion for reconstruction and $1.8 billion for drug-fighting and other activities. Bush said yesterday that those funds would help increase the size of the Afghan national police from 61,000 to 82,000 officers and the army from 32,000 to 70,000 troops by the end of 2008. He also promised to rebuild an additional 1,000 miles of roads this year.

The goal, he said, will be to take the fight to the Taliban rather than wait for its expected spring offensive. "The snow is going to melt in the Hindu Kush mountains, and when it does, we can expect fierce fighting to continue," Bush said. "The Taliban and al-Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks. Our strategy is not to be on the defense but to go on the offense. This spring, there is going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan and it's going to be a NATO offensive."

But major NATO allies have so far resisted the sort of robust engagement that Bush wants. With the exception of some French special forces that are leaving Afghanistan, troops from France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Turkey are not in the fight because of political limits on where and how they may operate. "Allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide so NATO commanders have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy where the enemy may make a stand," Bush said.

The president acknowledged the escalating violence in Afghanistan, but critics said that he underestimated the depth of the problem. "We're talking about much more serious problems than the president discussed today," said Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. In testimony to the House Foreign Relations Committee earlier in the day, Cordesman said any victory in Afghanistan will take five to 10 more years.

Although Bush vowed to do more to curb poppy production in Afghanistan and help Pakistan disrupt Taliban havens, some critics said those are not enough. "If we are to succeed in Afghanistan, we must create effective deterrence on the narcotics threat, where none now exists, in order to deny our enemies the profits from this deadly trade," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (Fla.), the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Relations Committee.

In December, the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy said that opium production in Afghanistan reached a record high in 2006, 26 percent more than in 2005. The United Nations and the World Bank reported in November that the Afghan police whom Bush wants to expand are deeply involved in the drug trade.

William B. Wood, Bush's nominee to be ambassador to Afghanistan, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that police training is "not easy" but would be "one of my highest priorities."

Wood acknowledged that plans for a meeting of Afghan and Pakistani tribal and political leaders have yet to go anywhere. The relationship between the two nations is "complicated," he said. "Each is helping the other. Each often wonders if the other could be doing more."

Bush Presses NATO Allies To Play Bigger Role In Afghanistan (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush prodded NATO allies Thursday for more help in Afghanistan, where U.S. commanders are bracing for a spring offensive by the Taliban.

At least three dozen countries have contributed troops to the 36,000-member NATO force, but some operate under restrictions that effectively prevent combat. The United States has about 27,000 troops in Afghanistan, including 15,000 under NATO command.

DOJ_NMG_0132758

Administration officials and outside experts have become increasingly concerned about the Taliban's resurgence and the fragility of the U.S.-backed Afghan government. Five years after American troops ousted the extremist Taliban regime and its al-Qaida allies after the 9-11 terrorist attacks, Afghanistan is struggling against Islamic extremists, corruption, poverty, regional warlords and a burgeoning opium trade.

The rebuilding effort has become a crucial test for NATO, a Cold War alliance that's trying to prove its relevance against new threats.

"For NATO to succeed, allies must be sure that we fill the security gaps," Bush said Thursday in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research center. "Allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide."

Analysts say that British, Danish and Canadian troops are sharing the burden with American soldiers in Afghanistan. Estonia, Poland and Romania also have helped. Most of the criticism is directed at France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Turkey.

"The countries come in. They carve out their zones. They focus on those zones. If they don't have combat, that's good. But other people are having combat," Gen. James Jones, the former supreme allied commander in Europe, complained at a NATO gathering in December.

At a congressional hearing Thursday, Anthony Cordesman, a national security specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right research center, said success in Afghanistan required more troops, more money and more patience.

"No one can return from visiting the front in Afghanistan without realizing there is a very real risk that the U.S. and NATO could lose their war with al-Qaida, the Taliban and the other Islamist movements fighting the Afghan government," he told the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Bush's call for more help from NATO was one of a series of steps intended to shore up the Afghan government before it loses all credibility. The president said that the United States would provide $11.6 billion in economic aid over the next two years and 3,200 more troops for the battle zone.

Administration critics contend that the situation in Afghanistan is far worse than it should be because the Iraq war diverted attention and resources. Bush sought to deflect that criticism even as he acknowledged the challenges in Afghanistan.

"A lot of attention here in the United States is on Iraq," he told his Washington audience. "I want to make sure people's attention is also on Afghanistan."

Pentagon Red Tape Keeps Medical Records From Doctors Of The Wounded (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Department of Veterans Affairs doctors are furious over a recent decision by the Pentagon to block their access to medical information needed to treat severely injured troops arriving at VA hospitals from Iraq and Afghanistan.

The VA physicians handle troops with serious brain injuries and other major health problems. They, rely on digital medical records that track the care given wounded troops from the moment of their arrival at a field hospital through their evacuation to the United States.

About 30 VA doctors in four trauma centers around the country have treated about 200 severely wounded soldiers and Marines. The docs had been receiving the complete digital records from the Pentagon until the end of January, using the Pentagon's Joint Patient Tracking Application.

But on Jan. 25, when Shane McNamee, a physician in the Richmond VA Medical Center, tried to get the full records, he couldn't. He sent an urgent e-mail to VA chief liaison officer Edward Huycke.

"My JPTA account has been disabled within last few days," McNamee wrote. "I called the hotline and was told that all VA accounts have been locked. Could not get a good answer why. Anyhow -- I have 4 [Iraq/Afghanistan] service members to arrive within the next 2 days. This information is terribly important," the doctor wrote.

Thirty-four minutes later Huycke e-mailed back: "Ok, Shane. Will get on it. Not sure what's up."

DOJ_NMG_0132759

An hour or so later, a senior VA official forwarded McNamee's e-mail to Lt. Col. David Parramore at the Pentagon, saying that McNamee "needs his access back to JPTA to provide the best possible treatment for soldiers injured in [Iraq/Afghanistan] arriving there in a few days. Can you help?"

Tommy Morris, director of Deployment Health Systems, responded the next morning to Parramore's inquiry, after contacting Ellen Embry, deputy assistant secretary of defense for force health protection. "I spoke with Embry and no agreements, no data sharing via access to JPTA."

The access cutoff came after Morris, in a Jan. 23 e-mail, instructed a colleague: "If the VA currently has access I need a list of persons and I need their accounts shut off ASAP. It is illegal for them to have access without data use agreements and access controls in place by federal regulations and public law."

There have been meetings between VA and Pentagon officials. The Pentagon declined to comment yesterday. VA officials apparently thought it might have been resolved Monday. But an e-mail Monday from Morris to a co-worker said: "The leadership has not authorized the VA accounts to be turned back on, in case someone approaches you about this."

Last week, Sens. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) and Larry E. Craig (Idaho) -- the chairman and ranking Republican on the Veterans' Affairs Committee -- wrote David S.C. Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel, of their "deep concern" about VA trauma center doctors not having access to complete records.

"For those servicemembers suffering from a traumatic brain injury," they wrote, "VA's access to in-theater imaging is an important and valuable tool for tracking their patient's progress since being wounded or injured." They suggested the VA doctor be given temporary access to JPTA while the data-sharing questions are worked out.

They're still awaiting an appropriate response. McNamee is still waiting for the records.Rebuilding Afghanistan? 'Neat.'

Bush-bashers often accuse him of not being aware that his riffs on Iraq and Afghanistan can be a bit stale sometimes. On the contrary, President Bush is acutely aware of the problem. He demonstrated that in a speech yesterday before the conservative American Enterprise Institute at the Mayflower Hotel.

Noting a number of administration officials attending, Bush said it was great to see them and that "I fully expect you to stay awake for the entire address." Apparently they did, but at least one member of the audience was spotted dozing peacefully in the back.

Bush even tried to wander off-message a little, to folksify his chat. He hailed prosecutors, judges, police and defense lawyers for going over to Afghanistan to mentor their counterparts. "And I appreciate our own citizens going over there. It is, must be neat, really -- I guess 'neat' isn't a sophisticated word, but it must be heartening to be somebody who's helping this young democracy develop a judicial system that is worthy."

Or maybe gratifying?'Obama bin Laden': Free for All

The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has rejected a Miami Beach man's application to trademark the name "Obama bin Laden" because the name "may falsely suggest a connection with the individuals Osama bin Laden and Barack Obama," USPTO lawyer Karen Bush said in a Feb. 6 rejection letter, the Miami Herald reported yesterday.

You can't get a trademark for "immoral or scandalous matter," Bush said, adding that the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, "have caused the name Bin Laden itself to be synonymous with the acts themselves. As such, the name Bin Laden is scandalous and is not registerable." His many relatives and the companies they own may want to take note.

The applicant, Alexandre Batlle of http://www.obamabinladen.net, sells coffee mugs, T-shirts, hats and such. One has a cartoon of presidential candidates Obama -- in a white robe and turban and holding a machine gun -- and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), in an abaya.

Batlle might appeal -- after all, he paid $325 to file the application -- and who knows, he might prevail on those counts. But another reason Bush cited might a bit tougher.

"In the present case, the names Obama and Osama clearly refer" to the Democratic senator from Illinois and the terrorist, she said. Since they are both alive -- how does she know about Osama? -- "the applicant must therefore submit written consent from the two individuals authorizing the applicant to register their names."

No problem on Obama, but Waziristan is awfully cold this time of year. Dangerous, too.

Pressing Allies, President Warns Of Afghan Battle (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — President Bush warned on Thursday that he expected "fierce fighting" to flare in Afghanistan this spring, and he pressed NATO allies to provide a bigger and more aggressive force to guard against a resurgence by the Taliban and Al Qaeda that could threaten the fragile Afghan state.

With American and NATO commanders pressing for more troops and experts predicting that further gains by the Taliban could put the Afghan government of President Hamid Karzai in danger, Mr. Bush used his presidential platform to lay out what he said was substantial progress in Afghanistan since 2001, but also a continuing threat.

The remarks, to the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research organization here, amounted to an unusually high-profile acknowledgment from Mr. Bush of the precarious state of the effort to stabilize Afghanistan, a country the administration long held up as a foreign policy success story.

The speech renewed criticism from Democrats that had the United States not been tied down in Iraq, the situation in Afghanistan would not have turned dire. At the same time, some Republican lawmakers said Mr. Bush's new strategy would not do enough to tamp down the Afghan drug trade. Outside experts criticized the president for painting too rosy a picture.

The speech was also a striking effort by the White House to focus attention back on Afghanistan at a time when Congress is debating resolutions criticizing Mr. Bush's strategy in Iraq and the administration is making a case that Iranian forces are supplying Shiite militants in Iraq with roadside bombs.

"Across Afghanistan last year, the number of roadside bomb attacks almost doubled, direct fire attacks on international forces almost tripled, and suicide bombings grew nearly fivefold," Mr. Bush said. "These escalating attacks were part of a Taliban offensive that made 2006 the most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country."

Mr. Bush said the question now was whether to "just kind of let this young democracy wither and fade away" or to step up the fight.

"The snow is going to melt in the Hindu Kush mountains, and when it does we can expect fierce fighting to continue," Mr. Bush said. "The Taliban and Al Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks. Our strategy is not to be on the defense, but to go on the offense."

Mr. Bush noted that he has already extended the tour of a 3,200-soldier American brigade and called on Congress to provide $11.8 billion more to pay for operations in Afghanistan over the next two years.

The president said his administration had completed a review of its Afghan strategy, and would work to increase the size of the Afghan army from 32,000 troops to 70,000 by the end of next year, and to bring in additional allied troops to support the fledgling army.

"When there is a need, when the commanders on the ground say to our respective countries, 'We need additional help,' our NATO countries must provide it in order to be successful in the mission," Mr. Bush said.

He promised to build new roads that would help spur economic development, to battle an increase in the opium trade and to try to forge better ties between Afghanistan and its neighbor, Pakistan.

At the same time, Mr. Bush pledged to work with President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan to root out Taliban and Qaeda fighters who hide in that country's remote mountainous regions — a situation he described as "wilder than the Wild West." And, echoing his lament that 2006 was a difficult and disappointing year for Iraq, the president said the same had been true in Afghanistan.

Some critics of the administration's handling of Afghanistan said Mr. Bush was still understating the difficulties there.

"We underfinanced, undermanned and under-resourced the war in Afghanistan for the last four years, and now we face a serious threat that the Taliban will succeed in destabilizing the country enough in 2007 to make the Karzai government collapse at some point," said Bruce Riedel, a scholar at the Saban Center for Middle East Studies at the Brookings Institution, a liberal-leaning research organization in Washington. He called the speech "a long overdue recognition that we need to do a lot more."

Both Mr. Riedel and Rick Barton, an expert in Afghanistan reconstruction at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said Mr. Bush's new strategy did not do enough to promote security and economic development. Mr.

Barton, who published a report in 2005 measuring progress in Afghanistan in that year, is about to publish another, and said the situation has turned measurably worse since his first study.

"We've gotten into a situation where things have really turned negative and the average Afghan has lost confidence in both the safety of his country and the ability of the leadership to turn things around," Mr. Barton said. He said the president "is definitely acknowledging that, but his reality therapy is not as thorough or as complete as I think it needs to be."

On Capitol Hill, the senior Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, released a statement criticizing the speech. Ms. Ros-Lehtinen and several other Republicans have been pressing the Bush administration to do more to crack down on Afghanistan's opium trade; she said the new strategy lacked "practical initiatives to target major drug kingpins and warlords whose trade in opium finances the Taliban's campaign."

As Iraq has dominated the American psyche, some lawmakers, most recently the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, have called Afghanistan "the forgotten war." The Democratic National Committee, responding to Mr. Bush's speech on Thursday, issued a statement saying, "The Bush administration took its eye off the ball in Afghanistan."

But Mr. Bush pointed to what he called "remarkable progress" since the American invasion in 2001: A democratically elected government with a parliament that includes 91 women; more than five million children in school as opposed to 900,000 under the Taliban; and the return of more than 4.6 million refugees.

The president's speech came after his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, attended his first conference of NATO defense ministers last week in Seville, Spain. At the meeting, Mr. Gates pressed his allied counterparts to fulfill their commitments of troops in time for a spring offensive against the Taliban.

Currently, NATO has about 35,000 troops in Afghanistan, about 13,000 of them American. The United States has 9,000 more troops in Afghanistan operating outside the NATO mission, handling tasks like specialized counterterrorism work and helping to train Afghan forces. Gen. David J. Richards of Britain, the outgoing NATO commander in Afghanistan, said last month that NATO was 4,000 to 5,000 troops short.

But NATO commanders have been constrained by so-called caveats — restrictions imposed by member nations on how their troops may be used and where they may be sent. The Bush administration has been pressing the allies to lift those restrictions, and the president renewed that call on Thursday, saying NATO commanders "must have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy wherever the enemy may make a stand."

Last-Minute Extension In Afghanistan For Unit Whose Bags Were Packed (NYT)

By John Kifner

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

The 3,200 soldiers of the 10th Mountain Division whose one-year deployment in Afghanistan has been extended by four months were so close to the end of their tour that their uniforms, gear and equipment had been packed into shipping containers and an advance party had already reached Fort Drum, their home in upstate New York.

The extension, mentioned in President Bush's speech yesterday, was originally announced on Jan. 25.

About 50 soldiers from the advance party came home in late January, said Benjamin Abel, a Fort Drum spokesman. A group of about 150 were intercepted in Kuwait before they could reach the States, he added.

All have since been sent back to Afghanistan as part of a buildup in anticipation of a renewed Taliban offensive in the spring.

Holding the troops of the division's Third Brigade in place for 120 days is another indication of the strains the drawn-out wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have put on the Army. Ideally, military planners say, they would like a unit's one-year combat deployment to be followed by two years to rest, re-equip and train, but this has proven difficult.

The troops are eventually to be relieved by the 173rd Airborne Brigade, based in Vicenza, Italy. But that unit had been scheduled to go to Iraq, meaning another brigade must be found to go there.

The 10th Mountain troops will be joined by a brigade from the 82nd Airborne Division, which was already on schedule to go to Afghanistan, raising the American contribution to the NATO-led security force by approximately 3,500 soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0132762

The announcement that the Third Brigade's much-anticipated return would be put off until late spring set off a flurry of activity at Fort Drum, including a half-dozen briefings at which officers tried to reassure families.

The Pentagon sent eight officers, called a "Tiger Team," to the remote post in Watertown, which has been isolated in recent days by huge drifts of lake-effect snow.

The post newspaper, The Blizzard, reported that only 3 of the 500 packed shipping containers had actually left Afghanistan and that the soldiers' belongings and gear would be returned to them.

The original announcement came shortly after the new secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, visited Afghanistan in mid-January. During that trip American commanders and intelligence officers told them of stepped-up attacks by the Taliban and other militants along the eastern border from remote tribal areas in Pakistan where government forces have little control. They were also told of an urgent need for more combat troops.

Cross-border attacks have tripled since September despite the onset of the harsh Afghan winter, a senior American intelligence officer told Mr. Gates during the visit.

That surge, commanders said, coincided with an agreement Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, reached with tribal elders in the North Waziristan region that he would pull back government soldiers in return for a pledge not to shelter militants or allow them to engage in illegal behavior.

A senior intelligence official said during Mr. Gates visit that in the two months before the agreement there were 40 cross-border attacks in Khost and Paktika Provinces, but that in the two months after the agreement there were 140 attacks.

The intelligence official disclosed a sharp increase in insurgent attacks over the past year. There were 139 suicide attacks in 2006, up from 27 in 2005. Suicide attacks had been unheard of in Afghanistan, suggesting that militant tactics were migrating from Iraq via the Internet and other means.

In addition, the use of roadside bombs more than doubled, to 1,677, last year from 783 in 2005. The number of what the military calls direct attacks, meaning assaults by militants with small arms, grenades and other weapons, increased by almost twofold 4,542 last year, from 1,558 in 2005.

Embassy Row (WT)

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

Libyan visitor

Libya hopes to remove the last irritants blocking normalization of relations with the United States "very, very soon," according to the North African country's top foreign ministry official for North America.

Ahmed Said Fituri, secretary for American affairs, is the highest-ranking Libyan official to visit Washington since the surprise announcement by longtime Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi in late 2003 that he was giving up his nuclear weapons programs and seeking better ties with the West. Mr. Fituri gave an off-the-record talk at the Nixon Center think tank Tuesday, but spoke to our correspondent David R. Sands after the session.

The Bush administration restored formal diplomatic ties with Tripoli in May, ending Libya's designation as a state sponsor of terrorism. U.S. energy giants have begun winning exploration contracts in Libya for the first time in decades.

But full normalization -- including the naming of a U.S. ambassador to Tripoli and a possible visit by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to the Libyan capital -- has been held up over U.S. concerns about Libya's human rights record.

A number of regime critics have been jailed, and the United States and the European Union have criticized the Gadhafi government's handling of the prosecution of a group of Bulgarian nurses convicted of infecting Libyan children with AIDS.

Mr. Fituri said Libya also wants some irritants removed from the bilateral relations, including the end of all sanctions and difficulties in obtaining visas to travel to the United States.

Mr. Fituri said he planned to spend much of his visit meeting members of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0132763

"I certainly want to listen to their concerns and discuss how we can close the gap. It is our hope and expectation that we can answer their questions and resolve all outstanding issues very, very soon," he said. "There are some small things [that] should not be hindering our larger relationship."

In addition to stronger economic and political ties, Mr. Fituri said he was particularly eager to boost bilateral cultural and educational programs as well. A graduate of the University of Michigan, he planned a trip to Michigan after his Washington visit.

"We would very much like to have more Libyan students studying at American universities and more American scholars coming to Tripoli," he said.

The Libyan minister was making his first trip to the United States in more than two decades, but said he found much that was familiar.

"America is America," he said. "You have your tastes, your energy, your immense culture. Such things do not change."

More troops

The U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan sounded the call in Kabul for more NATO troops, as President Bush in Washington warned of the dangers of a spring offensive by Taliban forces trying to regain control in the Central Asian nation.

"I would like to see NATO countries collectively put in place the forces that NATO and its military committee have said are necessary," Ambassador Ronald Neumann told Agence France-Presse in an interview published yesterday.

Mr. Neumann noted that some NATO "partners do a great deal," citing the troops deployments from Britain, Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands and Romania. He did not criticize the other members of the 37-nation alliance, but some nations such as Germany restrict their troops from engaging in key areas in the south and east where Taliban fighters are concentrated.

The ambassador said that the 35,500 troops in Afghanistan are preparing for some "very hard fighting this year" from Taliban forces overthrown in 2001 by a U.S.-led coalition.

"I hope our allies will do what they need to, but we are not going to lose it for lack of their action," Mr. Neumann said.

In Washington, Mr. Bush told the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research that NATO "must provide" more troops and "lift restrictions" on those whose deployment is limited within the country.

US Ambassador To Afghanistan Optimistic Despite NATO Failings (AFP)

By Bronwen Roberts

AFP, February 16, 2007

The failure of NATO allies to meet a shortfall in troops needed to end the Taliban insurgency will not sink the effort, which should "do better this year," the US ambassador here told AFP this week.

The reluctance of some of the 37 nations in the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) was "influenced by a lot of, frankly, misperceptions and ignorance," ambassador Ronald Neumann said.

"Some NATO partners do a great deal -- the British, the Canadians, the Dutch, the Danes, the Romanians," he said.

But he added: "I would like to see NATO countries collectively put in place the forces that NATO and its military committee has said are necessary.

"But can we maintain it if they don't? Yes.... I hope our allies will do what they need to. But we are not going to lose it for lack of their action," he said.

"How that reverberates longer term in NATO is probably a seminar topic rather than an interview," he quipped.

NATO military commander US General Bantz Craddock said in Belgium this week that the military needs are "probably filled to 93 or 94 percent."

Neumann, perhaps the most influential diplomat in Kabul, said he had seen at a meeting in Berlin last month of Afghanistan's donors that there was poor understanding among many nations of the situation in the central Asian nation.

"Quite apart from differences of opinion, I just found the factual information poor. There are lot of people who genuinely believe that we are only interested in the military side and we are not focused enough on building," he said.

The United States led the invasion that toppled the Taliban in late 2001 and today has about 23,000 troops here working on rounding up Islamist militants and helping reconstruction.

The insurgency reached its bloodiest level last year. The death toll passed 4,000, with most of the dead being rebel fighters. There was a barrage of suicide bombings, and insurgents launched sophisticated attacks on military bases.

Neumann, whose term in Afghanistan ends in the coming months, said he expected "very hard fighting this year."

The ambassador rejected outright any notion of negotiating with the Taliban, which was excluded from talks in 2001 in Bonn, Germany, that put Afghanistan on the path to democracy.

"Negotiation implies changing the political structure, changing the process agreed to in Bonn. No way in hell. That would be a fundamentally disastrous course of action," Neumann said.

He was equally critical of "rumours and talks" that provinces where the Taliban are most entrenched should be given up to the movement, describing this as a "thoroughly bad idea" that "scares the hell out of people."

The ambassador, who took up his post in mid-2005, said he was leaving "genuinely more optimistic... than I have been at any time since I have been here."

The boosting of the security forces with an increase in US troops and the recruitment of the first members of a planned 11,200-strong auxiliary police force meant there would be the strength to deal with the insurgency "very aggressively."

Extra emphasis on building the Afghan security forces should begin to show results in 2008 and there had been improvements in government appointments, with several governors and police chiefs removed.

But Neumann said one of his biggest concerns for the future of the young nation was its booming trade in illegal opium, of which Afghanistan is the world's top supplier.

"The money of narcotics can rot the infrastructure of the state faster than we can build it," he said. The United States is one of the main backers of Afghanistan's counternarcotics efforts.

But he expressed confidence in President Hamid Karzai, who has come under growing criticism as the insurgency has deepened.

"He doesn't control all his own funds and he doesn't control all his own forces and I don't know many Western political leaders that are bold and daring when they are so dependent on others. I see steady growth," the ambassador said.

Neumann said the international effort in Afghanistan was a long-term one in which the military forces needed to provide the "shield" of security to allow for development.

For example, "It is very important we have better governance but it is really hard to get if they are killing civil servants."

He added: "I think we are going to do that better this year than last year."

Al-Qaida Releases Video Of Afghan Attack (AP)

AP, February 16, 2007

Al-Qaida posted a video on the Internet Friday showing what they claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of U.S. and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan.

The video appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage U.S. claims that it is winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan.

It begins with the deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, ridiculing President Bush and saying that his claim to have deprived al-Qaida of a safe haven in Afghanistan is a "bare-faced lie," according to a transcript provided by IntelCenter, a U.S. group that tracks extremist messages.

With a narrator speaking in American-accented English, the tape then shows video film of what it claims is an attack on a military position in Arghandab, a district 100 miles northeast of the southern Afghan city of Kandahar.

The authenticity of the scenes shown could not be immediately verified. The video carried the logo of the al-Qaida media production company, as-Sahab, and it was posted on an Islamic Web site known for hosting extremist material.

Al-Qaida appeared to have issued the tape on Thursday with the title "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate: Capture of an American post, Arghandab." The name Khorasan refers to Afghanistan.

The video shows the insurgents firing at the alleged post, but their weapons cannot be seen because it is night. Tracer bullets cross the sky and there are explosions caused by what are said to be rocket-propelled grenades.

DOJ_NMG_0132765

"After a fierce battle, the mujahideen (holy warriors) begin their retreat from the zone of operations," the narrator says in English. The tape quotes a fighter as saying: "We retreated after about 45 minutes of fighting."

It is not clear if the fighters overran the military position. Such an attack on a position held by U.S. and Afghan forces in Arghandab could not be immediately confirmed.

However, the video shows film shot in daylight of a single story compound of mud-plastered walls, where the Americans appear to have had a presence. "CPT ASHWOKTH UTAH. NG ETT," is scrawled on a wall, but there is little to suggest that foreign forces occupied the primitively-built building for long.

The English-speaking narrator says the camera is going around "the liberated area to bring us pictures from inside the cleansed military bases."

The video shows a battle-wrecked Nissan pickup truck, which people start stoning. There are no insignia on the white truck.

An unidentified elderly Afghan, with a white beard and black turban, tells the camera what the foreigners were like: "The people suffered a lot because of these devils. No one could leave his house, not even for absolutions and prayers. We couldn't even light a lamp at night. Thanks to Allah, the infidels have left.

"The people are very happy about the coming of the Taliban," he says.

Pentagon Seeks $100M To Speed Equipment And Arms To Troops (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Fierce fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan has forced the Pentagon to speed new weapons and equipment to troops at faster rates than ever, according to military records and officials.

The Pentagon budget proposed by President Bush adds even more money for what military leaders call "urgent need" requests. For the first time, the budget includes $100 million for a Pentagon "rapid acquisition fund" aimed at getting vital supplies to troops in the field more quickly.

Although the rapid-acquisition fund will be controlled by the Defense secretary, each branch of the military has its own pools of money to fill urgent needs. The Marine Corps, which faces some of the heaviest fighting in Iraq in Anbar province, has made 75% more urgent-need requests per month in the past six months than it did in the first 3½ years of the war.

"There is a sense of urgency here," says Len Blaisol, director of the Marine Air-Ground Task Force Integration Division in Quantico, Va. "Over time, the enemy has adapted to our successful operations."

The urgent-need requests aren't necessarily for new technology. Most of the weapons or equipment already exist but weren't bought or deployed to troops in the field. When combat commanders notice a problem in the field, such as the increased use of homemade bombs, they send the urgent requests through their chain of command or to a special Pentagon office, which then decides whether to buy the material or not.

Many of the requests reflect the increased intensity of the Iraq insurgency. Others stem from threats that were not anticipated before the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, such as homemade bombs called improvised explosive devices (IEDs). They include:

•New vehicles to withstand IEDs and insurgent ambushes. The Marines have awarded contracts for prototypes of "Mine Resistant Ambush Protected Vehicles" that feature V-shaped hulls to disperse the force of blasts from under the vehicles. The Marines are leading tests for the vehicles, which could be used by all services. After choosing the model it wants, the Pentagon hopes to have 4,100 in combat by year's end.

•Advances in first aid. IED attacks have prompted urgent-need requests that have resulted in improved bandages, artificial blood-clotting agents and a new blanket to keep injured troops from going into shock, Blaisol says.

•Improved rifle scopes. New scopes allow Marines to kill enemies from farther away and in lower light than before, says Scott Allen, a Marine Corps acquisition official in Quantico. "Insurgents think we've got a whole lot of snipers out there," Allen said. "Marines can see much better, hit them from a greater distance."

DOJ_NMG_0132766

In recent weeks, the Navy has also made urgent orders for more radios, the Army for flame-resistant uniforms and the Air Force for more global positioning systems for its aircraft, Pentagon purchasing records show.

Although Congress first gave the Pentagon rapid-acquisition authority in 2004, the Pentagon didn't use it enough, according to a May 2005 House Armed Services Committee report. That report also said former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld "failed to provide sufficient resources and authority" to the Pentagon's rapid-acquisition programs.

Now, however, the Pentagon is acting more quickly, said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va.

"People think that industry has moved too slowly," Thompson says. "This shows that may not necessarily be the case."

Pelosi Backs War Funds Only With Conditions (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) yesterday linked her support for President Bush's war-funding request to strict standards of resting, training and equipping combat forces, a move that could curtail troop deployments and alter the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq.

The pledge came as Congress appears ready to assert its authority in matters of war and diplomacy, down to decisions that the White House believes to be the domain solely of the president as commander in chief: the deployment and training of military forces.

The House is to vote today on a nonbinding resolution disapproving of Bush's decision to deploy more than 21,000 additional troops to Iraq. Also, Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced a rare Saturday vote to begin debate on the House resolution.

Congressional Democrats signaled a willingness to directly challenge and curtail Bush's warmaking powers, a move that will almost certainly spark a legal or constitutional confrontation. Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally, is rewriting the president's spending request to limit Bush's options in prosecuting the war, and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said he will seek to repeal the 2002 congressional authorization for Bush to wage war in Iraq and substitute legislation that would narrow the mission of troops there and begin to bring some home.

"If we are going to support our troops, we should respect what is considered reasonable for them: their training, their equipment and their time at home," Pelosi said in an interview with a small group of reporters. "What we're trying to say to the president is, you can't send people in who are not trained for urban warfare . . . who are not prepared to contend with an insurgency."

The Democrats' move is likely to test the party's unity in the coming weeks, as anxious moderates clash with liberals pushing for an even more dramatic confrontation.

Pelosi was careful to say no final decisions have been made on binding legislation. But she backed key provisions already floated by Murtha, including requirements that troops be given at least a year's rest between combat deployments, special training in urban warfare and counterinsurgency, and safety equipment that the military has struggled to provide.

The speaker backed Murtha's plan to eliminate funding for the Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad, where a prisoner-abuse scandal badly tarnished the U.S. image in the region and the world. She also strongly endorsed binding legislation requiring Bush to seek congressional authorization before any military strike on Iran.

"Congress should assert itself . . . and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president, any president, any president to go into Iran," she said.

Biden, a declared candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, said his legislative proposal would authorize the limited use of force in Iraq only as part of a withdrawal plan.

"Congress should make clear what the mission of our troops is: to responsibly draw down, while continuing to combat terrorists, train Iraqis and respond to emergencies," he said. "We should make equally clear what their mission is not: to stay in Iraq indefinitely and get mired in a savage civil war."

DOJ_NMG_0132767

Calling Bush's proposed troop increase "a tragic mistake," Biden said: "Opposing the surge is only the first step. We need a radical change in course in Iraq. If the president won't act, Congress will have to attempt to do so. But Congress must act responsibly. We must resist the temptation to push for changes that sound good but may very well produce bad results."

The issue of Iraq roiled both sides of the Capitol yesterday. The House concluded three days of debate and prepared to vote this afternoon on a nonbinding resolution opposing the deployment of additional troops to Iraq, while affirming Congress's support for "the members of the United States Armed Forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq."

Senate Republican leaders said they would urge their members to oppose the Saturday vote, to protest Reid's refusal to allow a vote on a pro-administration resolution asserting that war funding would continue. Democratic leaders want to call the bluff of a group of Republican senators who oppose the deployment of additional troops but who voted with their party to block the earlier Democratic-led resolution from coming to the floor.

Both leaderships have refused to budge, not wanting to relent on what they agree is likely to become the year's running narrative. "I don't want this vote to occur. I think the timing is wrong, I think the process is wrong, and I think the substance is wrong," said Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

When the House floated its text, Senate Democratic leaders quickly latched on to it, believing Republicans would find it harder to block because of its relatively brief, straightforward language and strong support of U.S. troops.

"On the one hand they have their president, and on the other hand they have their constituencies," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). "They're diametrically opposed to one another. And now they can't duck it anymore."

But as those debates continued, senior Democrats were clearly looking to their next step in confronting Bush on the Iraq war.

Murtha, the powerful chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, outlined his plan for restricting the administration's use of war funds in an Internet interview released yesterday. Under that legislation, troops would be required to have one year's rest between deployments, combat tours could no longer be extended, and the Pentagon would have to halt its "stop-loss" program, which prohibits some officers from leaving the military when their tour of duty is complete.

The idea is to neutralize political charges that the Democrats plan to starve the war of funding. The party would still slow the war effort by other means, Murtha said in an interview aired on the new Web site MoveCongress.org.

"What we are saying will be very hard to find fault with," he said. "We're supporting the troops. We're protecting the troops. On the other hand, we're going to stop this surge."

Democrats were taking their case to the left flank of their party, imploring antiwar activists to allow them to slowly shift war policy through troop training requirements rather than by suddenly withholding war funds, as many activists have demanded.

In a video delivered to 1,200 "movie parties" that the liberal group MoveOn.org held last night, Murtha promised: "This country needs a dramatic change of course in Iraq, and it is the responsibility of this Congress to consummate that change."

Republicans are relishing the battle. House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) labeled the emerging Democratic proposal "a plan to cut off funding for troops in harm's way by making sure the reinforcements they need to complete their mission in Iraq never arrive."

House Democrats Aim To Limit Troops (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

House Democratic leaders yesterday revealed their plan to restrict President Bush's use of war funding, though some Democrats said the proposal, released on the eve of a symbolic vote against the war in Iraq, does not do enough to stop the war.

"This legislation will force the administration to consider alternatives rather than escalating," said Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, describing limitations he intends to place on an appropriations bill next month.

Mr. Murtha's bill would bar the U.S. military from extending combat assignments beyond one year or giving troops a combat assignment less than a year since the last one. It also would end the military's "stop-loss" program that involuntarily extends troops' enlistment periods, would close permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq, and would require that the Pentagon certify that troops being sent to Iraq are "fully combat ready" with training and equipment.

DOJ_NMG_0132768

"They won't be able to continue. They won't be able to do the deployment. They won't have the equipment, they don't have the training, and they won't be able to do the work. There's no question in my mind," Mr. Murtha said.

Meanwhile, the House concluded its third day of debate over a nonbinding resolution that would oppose the president's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. A vote is expected today.

At the other end of the Capitol, the Senate will work into the weekend tomorrow, after Majority Leader Harry Reid scheduled a vote to begin debate on a resolution identical to the House measure. Republicans oppose Mr. Reid's attempt because the Nevada Democrat refuses to allow them any amendments to the resolution.

Mr. Murtha, chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, plans to attach his plan to hamstring the U.S. military to the president's defense-spending request when it comes before his panel next month. Mr. Murtha's plan is supported by House Democratic leaders, and is the less politically risky alternative to cutting off war funds altogether.

But some Democrats are not satisfied with this approach. Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat, said his party's leadership is supporting a "continuation" of the war in Iraq.

"The American people want us to get out of Iraq," Mr. Kucinich said. "They expect Democrats to move quickly to end our involvement in Iraq. If Congress approves the supplemental appropriation, President Bush will have the money he needs to keep the war going through the end of his term."

Mr. Kucinich is part of the Out of Iraq Caucus, founded by Rep. Maxine Waters, California Democrat. There are more than 70 members of Congress in this caucus. About 20 anti-war activists from Maryland yesterday "occupied" the office of Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, Maryland Democrat, for nearly two hours because she has voted to fund the war, even though she voted against authorizing the war in 2002.

But Mr. Bush warned against Mr. Murtha's plan, saying Congress needs to approve both "resources" and "flexibility" for the U.S. military "to do their job."

"Our men and women in uniform are counting on their elected leaders to provide them with the support they need to accomplish their mission," Mr. Bush said.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, labeled Mr. Murtha's plan "a plan to cut off funding for troops in harm's way" and "unthinkable."

Mr. Boehner's staff sent out an e-mail saying the Murtha plan would "pull the rug out" from U.S. troops by "cutting off their reinforcements and forcing them to face the enemy without our full support."

Mr. Murtha repeatedly emphasized yesterday that his strategy "supports the troops" by requiring adequate training and equipment and protecting them from exhaustion.

"What we're saying, it would be very hard to find fault with. The troops have to be equipped, they have to be trained, they can't be sent back without a year at home," Mr. Murtha said. "People have to understand we're supporting the troops, we're protecting the troops, but on the other hand, we're going to stop this surge."

He also is considering language that would require the president to seek congressional approval before the U.S. could invade Iran. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, yesterday also said the president does not have authority to invade Iran without explicit congressional approval.

In the Senate, Republicans protested Mr. Reid's attempt to deny their amendments to the nonbinding resolution, one of which would vow not to cut off funding for the military. In a similar situation earlier this month, Senate Republicans blocked a vote on any resolution.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, said Democrats were going to "block a vote in the Senate to fund our troops in Iraq."

But Democrats said Republicans were trying to avoid a simple vote on approving the president's plan.

"They just want to avoid a vote, up or down, on the surge. ... But we're voting on it first, and we're voting on it clean," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat.

Iraq Debate Shows Separate Problems For GOP, Democrats (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

DOJ_NMG_0132769

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — This week's showdown votes in Congress over Iraq may dramatize the breadth of discontent with the White House war strategy, but they also demonstrate the limits of how far Democrats are willing to go to change it.

The House of Representatives today is likely to easily approve a non-binding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to commit 21,500 additional troops to Iraq. The Senate will hold a rare Saturday session for a procedural vote that could begin the debate on the House's Iraq resolution.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., described the House vote as "a huge statement."

She acknowledged that it's unlikely to stop the movement of troops, and neither Pelosi nor Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., were willing Thursday to endorse measures that would make it harder for the president to send more troops to Iraq.

Both were cool to Rep. John Murtha's proposal to require soldiers to receive more time at home between deployments and more training before being shipped out. The Marine combat veteran's plan — outlined in a Thursday fundraising webcast for the liberal group MoveOn.org — would choke off the president's supply of soldiers.

"The answer is no," Reid said when asked whether there are any legally binding measures he's prepared to support.

Pelosi was non-committal. "What he's doing is putting out ideas," she said of Murtha. "Until you see his proposals in writing nobody can tell what the level of support is."

Iraq presents Republicans and Democrats with different political problems. For Republicans, the question is how far to go in backing a policy that is losing public support. The prospect of a Friday House vote on the president's policy set off another round of skirmishing in the Senate, which delayed its week-long President's Day recess after some Republicans pressed for an end to the procedural logjam that has prevented an Iraq debate there.

"The Senate is in real danger of becoming irrelevant," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Reid scheduled an unusual Saturday vote on whether to open the Iraq debate after a similar measure failed last week. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., who sided with his party's leadership in blocking the debate last week, has signaled he may vote with Democrats this time, but Reid needs at least nine others to cross party lines just to debate a non-binding resolution.

If Saturday's vote poses a test for Republicans with misgivings about Bush's Iraq policy — particularly those who will face the voters next year — Democrats face at least as daunting a political gut check in the longer term.

This week's House debate revealed both the Republican political strategy on Iraq and the Democrats' sensitivity to it. Twice in one day, an angry House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer came to the floor to rebut GOP charges that Democrats plan to cut off funding for troops in the field. "We will not abandon them," he said.

In speeches on the House floor and in a memo circulated by the Senate Republican Conference, GOP lawmakers accused the Democrats of a "slow-bleed" strategy that would cut off funding for the war. Pelosi argued that some of the measures Democrats have been discussing would protect the troops, not deprive them.

The Democrats' uncertainty about whether this argument will win public support was evident, however, in their tentativeness about embracing the plan. Senate Armed Services Committee Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he's not ready to support tying the president's hands. "I have at least a little hope we can turn the president in a different direction," he said.

Many Democrats say political pressure will have more effect than legislation in changing the policy in Iraq. "We are going to keep at this," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "We are going to keep ratcheting up the pressure so that public opinion and congressional opinion is so strong that the president will have no choice but to change strategy."

Congress's Next Iraq Moves Could Open Party Rifts (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON

The House debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq opened rifts in Republican ranks, as lawmakers were forced to take a tough vote on the war.

But the next move – to curb war funding – could do the same for Democrats, if not handled with a high level of political skill.

DOJ_NMG_0132770

Such a rift is what Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania hopes to avoid, as he announced Thursday details of a strategy to use his Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense to oppose a troop buildup in Iraq, without cutting funds to troops in harm's way.

"What we're saying will be very hard to find fault with," said Mr. Murtha in a webcast on the antiwar site MoveCongress.org. "We're supporting the troops. We're protecting the troops. But on the other hand, we're going to stop this escalation, because this escalation is not going to work."

The interview confirmed a line of action that Murtha and House Democrats have signaled for weeks. Instead of cutting off the funds, Murtha is proposing conditions on the use of funds that would limit the president's military options.

In mid-March, the House Appropriations Committee plans to take up Mr. Bush's $99.6 billion supplemental war request for this fiscal year. Murtha's panel plans to complete its hearings and report to the full committee by March 14, he says. The bill would be on the floor a few days later, he adds.

Any vote that appears to undermine US forces in the field is potentially toxic for members on either side of the aisle. That's why Republicans tried – and failed – to force a recorded vote on war funding in the House this week.

On the Senate side, GOP leaders had calculated that Democrats would cave if forced to vote on war funding – a vote that would have diminished the impact of a resolution opposing the "surge." The impasse derailed a vote on either measure in the Senate.

"That's the bind the House and Senate find themselves in," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J.

"[Lawmakers] can easily support resolutions critical of the troop surge, but when they take the next step, which is to do something about the funding of the war, they venture into political quicksand, unless what they are doing is phrased in such political delicacy that it can't be interpreted as a vote against the troops," he adds.

Antiwar activists have held back as the House moved toward a nonbinding vote this week. But they are watching closely how forcefully Democrats who now control Congress follow up a resolution victory in the House.

"To debate for a week and end up with a nonbinding vote on just the escalation has people nervous," says Tom Andrews, national director of Win Without War and a former Democratic representative from Maine. People are anxious to see that this leads to real action, as soon as possible, he says.

Murtha, for one, is proposing several conditions on the use of war funding. These include requiring the military to certify that troops are "fully combat ready," with the training and equipment that they need. He is also proposing an end to the "stop loss" program, which has forced soldiers to extend their enlistment period, and to ensure that a serviceman or servicewoman can't be sent back into battle until he or she has had a year at home.

These are "technical things," Murtha says, but they are "very harmful to the people who are serving." If Congress insists on enforcing these conditions, it means that the "the surge can't be sustained," he adds. In the longer term, it will force the president to deploy troops outside Iraq, he says.

Murtha Vows To Block Bush Surge Plan (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 16, 2007

Rep. Jack Murtha, one of the most vocal congressional opponents of the war in Iraq, is vowing to block President Bush's plan to send another 21,500 U.S. combat troops to Iraq by restricting the administration's military options in a new wartime spending bill.

"We're gonna stop this surge," the Pennsylvania Democrat declared in an interview posted on the Website MoveCongress.org.

Stepping up his campaign against the White House, Murtha, chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee, told Tom Andrews, a former congressman-turned-activist, in the online interview that he would attach so many conditions to an upcoming spending bill for Iraq that the Pentagon would not be able to find enough troops to carry out the president's "surge" plan.

The Andrews group, the Win Without War Coalition, is part of a larger federation of anti-war groups sponsoring the site.

Murtha will oversee the $93 billion supplemental spending bill for Iraq and Afghanistan that the House will consider in mid-March. And he wants to impose new restrictions on how the president can deploy combat forces from the United States to Iraq, allow combat veterans to have at least one year stateside before returning to the frontlines and prevent the Pentagon from keeping soldiers and Marines already in Iraq in uniform after their enlistments expire.

"This vote will limit the options of the president and should stop the surge," Murtha predicted of next month's floor fight over the wartime supplemental appropriation. "We're trying to force redeployment [of troops outside Iraq], not by taking money away but by redirecting it."

Murtha is not pushing a total cutoff of funds for the war in Iraq. But he is considering measure to limit the military actions Bush can take against Iran, although the congressman was more cautious than his statements about Iraq.

"We are looking at the possibility of putting language in the bill that says you can't go into Iran unless you have authorization [from Congress]," Murtha said.

Murtha also intends to push a provision to bar the creation of permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq and to raze the notorious Abu Ghraib prison.

The strategy being employed by Murtha and other House Democratic leaders would force Bush and Republican congressional leaders to accept the new troop restrictions, or face the possibility the supplemental spending bill would falter, thus cutting off all funding for the war.

Democrats are betting that Bush and the Republicans won't take that risk and will go along with the Democratic proposals. And Republican leaders are not taking Murtha's threats lightly.

The Republican National Committee has e-mailed supporters, urging them to contact newspapers and other media outlets to object to the congressman's proposals.

The RNC was reacting to a story in The Politico on Wednesday that spelled out the Democratic strategy of cutting off the supply of troops available for the war, while retaining funding for forces already deployed in Iraq.

Without the troops to execute the surge, the Pentagon would find it increasingly difficult to keep U.S. forces in Iraq.

Republicans have repeatedly charged that Democrats want to "cut off funding for the troops," and the Democratic strategy seeks to deflect those charges.

The Democratic plan was characterized in The Politico as the "slow-bleed strategy," which was not a term used by any Democrats or the anti-war groups supporting their efforts.

The RNC, however, attributed the phrase to Democrats, and it was used in their e-mail alert.

"'Slow bleed' is exactly the right name for this incredibly irresponsible and dangerous strategy," RNC Chairman Mike Duncan wrote in his e-mail, which included a Web link to donate to the GOP.

"Cutting and running is bad enough,'' he said. "But the Murtha-Pelosi 'slow-bleed' plan is far worse. It is a cynical and dangerous erosion of our ability to fight the terrorists while we still have men and women on the ground in Iraq."

The National Republican Congressional Committee and Senate Republicans are also preparing to use the "slow-bleed" line in their own news releases, slamming Murtha and the Democrats.

The IRAQI'S weren't even involved with the 9/11 attacks, and you are making sound like they would DO IT AGAIN!! Heck, they can't even do anything but blow up each other. Whenever we leave Iraq, and we will someday, the same thing is going to happen.....full blown chaos and an even bigger civil war. Will outside terrorists like the Saudis, Jordanians, Egyptians, Syrians and Iranians get involved??? OF COURSE THEY WILL!! THAT IS THE PRICE OF INVADING A SOVERIEGN COUNTRY AND BREAKING IT!! So the question is.....how many more American kids have to die before we get out and let the inevitable problems guaranteed by the irresponsible actions of George W. Bush and Dick Cheney? And why in the heck would we want to put MORE of our kids in there, KNOWING that they are just going to become casualty statistics?

The only person who would know that is Bush, and he isn't even telling himself!! The hard drinking is finally catching up to him!!

by smarterthanthou on 02.15.2007 at 11:54 PM

And another thing, your bar analogy is not accurate because that is a one-on-one situation. It doesn't take 1000 iraqis to fight 1000 americans. It just takes one iraqi to cause many many deaths, because iraq's security is worthless compared to America's (if you believe america isn't safe then you need to go live in a bombshelter forever). So while that ONE iraqi is planting a bomb, the other 999 could still be planning to attack america (but they're not). The iraq war is Osama's dream come true because Osama can devise some elaborate plot on american soil, while pitiful iraqis kill americans in iraq. If we were not in iraq, NO AMERICANS WOULD BE DYING. WE ARE SAFE IN AMERICA. NO IRAQ WAR= NO AMERICANS DYING. IRAQ WAR= Americans dying WHILE Osama works on attacking america. Everyone who supports the iraq war is PARANOID. 3000 americans died out of over 300 million. That is ONE OUT OF EVERY 100,000. That is no reason to get all paranoid and scream about how the world is going to end. BUSH's response to 9/11 did more damage than 9/11 itself. that is the beauty of terrorism. All they have to do is kill 3000 americans and WE will do the rest. We are destroying ourselves (reckless economic policy, reckless foreign policy). If you can't see that our response to 9/11 was worse than 9/11 itself then you need to go study terrorism and WHY it is effective. Terrorism experts ALL KNOW that the goal of terrorism is to get America to act AGAINST our own self-interests.

by smarterthanthou on 02.15.2007 at 11:46 PM

Gene, again, you make no sense. For a redneck you might seem smart, but compared to a normal american you are an idiot. It doesn't matter if we are over in iraq. If they want to attack AMERICA then they will do it. Being in iraq won't stop them. Besides, the people in iraq DID NOT HATE AMERICA until we invaded. We are not fighting the same people who were responsible for 9/11. We are fighting normal iraqis who see even less of a future now than when saddam was in power (both shiite and sunni). Invading iraq turned regualr iraqis into jihadists. If we did not invade iraq, they would be going to work, going to school and making sure they don't offend Saddam. One of the big reasons why they are willing to fight is because Bush found a way to make life even worse WITHOUT saddam than it was WITH saddam. They have less electricity, less jobs, their gas prices have more than quadrupled, and they have less security. When saddam was in power, all they had to do was not offend saddam. Many iraqis got used to that. They didn't like it, but atleast there were RULES for how to stay safe. Now there are no rules. There is no way to guarantee safety.

Troops this, troops that. You guys can bicker troopisms all day long and still miss the underlying facts. Bush, to this day, has no regard for our troops, unless they are used to accomplish HIS goals, not the majority of Americans. He could care less who dies or who lives or if they have benefits when they get home. The whole mess revolves around the need to get his buddies hands on the Iraqi Oil infastruture, anything else is a side-line, a distraction, a bunch of situations that he never understood or cares to remedy. Their is no way to steal the oil from under their feet and yet he will go to unlimited ends despite the recommendations of his generals or any other group that has a say in the matter to meet the Greed ideology of the Oil industry. Eighteen Saudi's with box cutter's culminating into this quagmire--ridiculous. It's all about the OIL and the way it's dispered--there or by foreign interests--either way, our troops have nothing to do with the underlying issue. American Prowess will always exist, Imperialism will always exist in the mind of a dictator, don't confuse the two.

by piwacket on 02.15.2007 at 11:22 PM

If the Dems want to get out of Iraq all they need to do is vote to cut off the spending. The problem with this is their votes will be recorded and when Iraq falls before the 08 elections everyone will know exactly who to blame and the voters will be smart enough to remember who these people are.

In earlier dialogue someone asked "How would 1000 terrorists get into the US to blow ups buildings and citizens"? The answer is simple: they would come in the same way 12 to 20 million Mexican illegals have come in. Actually sir, it only took a handful to bring down the WTC and Pentagon not 1000.

Finally, if Jack Murtha had pulled any of his past tricks on FDR while he was fighting WWII, he would have been arrested and put in prison for aiding the enemy. Check WWII history. FDR and Harry Truman were REAL Americans first and Democrats 2nd.

Everyone should remain calm. The "dribble" that Bush has started in Iraq is step one In the Karl Rove exit plan. First we get Malaki commited to action he cannot do. We then have a scapegoat for failure. We really tried but the Iraqis could not do their share.We can now "cut and run" With only the Iraqis, the media and the Dems to blame. At the not unreasonable cost of a few hundred GI deaths and a few thousand wounded we are out of there. As you know, we do not count Iraqi deaths, there are too many of them anyway.

by gene on 02.15.2007 at 11:09 PM

Smarterthanthou Another thing. You mention it would take a 1000 jihadists to do my scenario. If I understand it correctly there are approximately 11,000,000 illegal aliens in the USA now. You suppose there could be a few jihadists among them.

by gene on 02.15.2007 at 11:03 PM

Smarterthanthou. Another scenerio. Let's get about 19 guys into the USA commander some aircraft and fly them into the World Trade Center, Pentagon, White House and murder about 3000 innocent Americans. Nothing is simple you stupid * but given time and money which the terroists seem to have plenty of they could quite possibly do it. Get your head out of your ass and at least try thinking out of the box for a change.

GENE, you make it sound so simple. You say that if we pull out then the iraqis will blow up hundreds of buildings in America and it will ruin us. HOW WILL THEY DO THAT? If the iraqis could just blow up american buildings, THEY WOULD BE DOING IT ALREADY. Your argument makes NO SENSE. the iraqis cannot blow up our buildings, so they won't. That is pretty simple to understand. They are in iraq. Not in america. and you must understand that in order to blow up hundreds of american buildings, they would need atleast 1000 jihadists IN america who would act simultaneously. Not even Osama could plan something that complex. Your argument is baseless because it is IMPOSSIBLE. You need to wake up from whatever craziness you have fallen victim to. You are a paranoid delusional wackjob.

FINALLY... Murtha has figured out how to stop this psycho call President from throwing our men and women into war recklessly. Bush is one out of step, out of sync, Cheney lover. I don't know HOW Bush can look himself in the mirror in the morning. His hands are full of blood, and he is not satisfied yet. He wants more. HAIL MURTHA.... you got my vote!

Send that * Bush into war... is the Commander in Chief supposed to LEAD his troops into battle. Panzie ass, can just sit in the Oval Office, and talking *... and we the people let him get away with it.

I am glad someone in government has the balls to STOP this psycho. Someone needs to start up Impeachment proceedings. Bush is missing in Action in my book. Someone has to get him out of there before he starts pushing buttons. Oh Gawd..... here we go!

A scenario to think about. We pull out of Iraq and let them work it out themselves. After they do they then have time to give more thought to the USA. Since they are not bothered with us over there. We know we can't beat the USA militerily then let's do this. 1. Blow up 500 groceries stores all over the country, then watch how the government provides security and how eager the infadels like to go get their groceries. 2. Blow up 300 to 400 food courts in the largest malls in the country. 3. Start blowing up Wal Mart, Kmart, Sears,Target and other large discounter stores. Any of you guys with all the answers tell me what effect this will have on the economy and the minds of Americans. That's why we need to win this thing over there by cliff.crain on 02.15.2007 at 09:23 PM

This announcement should come as no surprise to anyone. Despite their campaign promises to the contrary, John Murtha and the Democratic Party do not support the brave fighting men of the US military. They are using our troops lives to play politics and fulfill their prophecy that the Iraq War is unwinnable. Iraq is far from lost and the troop surge that the President has called for is exactly the type of strategy needed to win the war.

by Hofer on 02.15.2007 at 09:20 PM

It would seem that the Democrats want it both ways. They want to say they support our troops, but they have accepted defeat in Iraq. Isnt this a paradox or something. If you have accepted defeat in Iraq, you are telling our troops that they failed. Way to support our troops!!

Murtha, IF you say you support our troops in Iraq, would you give them the tools they need so they would have an chance at victory? If they needed more humvees, would you give them the humvees? If they needed more vests, bullets, guns, grenades, missiles, tanks, etc. would you give them that? If you answered no to any of the above then you are lying and you do not support our troops one bit. If you answered yes, then why are you blocking another crutial tool our troops need right now, more man power?

by Hardie on 02.15.2007 at 08:45 PM

At 6:23PM In the first post on this story, I asked a couple simple questions, and apparently no one had the brass ones to even attempt to answer them. So here they are again.

Is not wanting to send reinforcements just another way that Democrats suppport the troops in Iraq?

Democrats, why don't you want the United States to win the war in Iraq? And if by chance you do want the United States to win , why are you against sending more troops?

"eman," it's not so much what I hear that you are in incapable of hearing, it's what I can see that you are blind to. After the "peace" movement succeeded in getting the United States out of Vietnam, the ensuing "peace" resulted in a holocuast that saw the Communists murder nearly 3 million people in Southeast Asia. Eman, are you truly blind to the impending nightmarish reality in Iraq if we vacate? And if the terrorists are allowed to chase our troops back to the United States, will they not then have a refuge in Iraq? And then eman, how long till they bring the war here again? Hopefully we can both agree we have to fight the terrorists. I would much rather fight them in Iraq then in New York and Washington, D.C.

by Ardie on 02.15.2007 at 08:41 PM

Ardie to Hardie, stop begging the question assuming things not in fact. There are plenty of reinforcements to save some U.S. Army Rangers from a teenage Sunni Muslim with an AK-47 who can't shoot straight. What Rep. Murtha is trying to do is prevent your side from hastily 'surging' in warm untrained bodies in uniform without proper protection to die needlessly in Iraq.

by POTUS on 02.15.2007 at 08:33 PM

Mr. Murtha, Amend the Constitution, and then you could have the power to stop the surge. The President is the Commander-in-Chief. Have you forgotten that?

Murtha Moves To Forefront Of Iraq Debate (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, February 16, 2007

Rep. John Murtha is quickly emerging as one of President Bush's most formidable foes in the Iraq war debate.

Many Democrats, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, match Murtha's fiery opposition to Bush's policies. But the Marine combat veteran's prowess on military matters, strong relationships with Republicans and — most important — control of the Pentagon's spending bills has put him at the forefront of the debate.

The Pennsylvania Democrat is leading the charge among members of his party to end the war by limiting funding. That fight, which will probably be waged next month, is expected to overshadow this week's battle over a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's troop buildup.

Part kindly Irish Catholic grandfather and part political pit bull with two Purple Hearts in his pocket, Murtha seems the Democrats' best chance of using the budget to curtail the war without appearing to be leaving troops in the lurch.

"Many of the roads (in Congress) lead through Murtha," said Darrell West, a political science professor at Brown University. "So Bush has to deal with him."

Murtha retains clout among his Democratic colleagues, especially on defense issues, despite losing a postelection challenge to Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., to become majority leader. Hoyer and Pelosi have tapped Murtha to address caucus meetings on the issue of the war and used him to assure the more liberal members of their base that Democrats will do everything they can to bring troops home.

So far, Democrats and Republicans alike are listening closely.

"Do most people have enormous respect for Mr. Murtha? Oh, yes," said Pelosi.

By mid-March, Murtha will offer legislation that he says would set such stringent rules on combat deployments that Bush would have no choice but to begin bringing troops home.

His legislation would dictate how long troops can stay, the equipment they use and whether any money could be spent to expand military operations into Iran. Murtha says few units could meet the high standards he envisions, meaning Bush's plan to keep some 160,000 troops in Iraq for months on end would be thwarted.

Under his plan, he says, Democrats would be helping and not hurting troops by making sure they have what they need before being thrown into combat.

"This vote will be the most important vote in changing the direction of the war," Murtha, D-Pa., told an anti-war group in an interview broadcast on the Internet Thursday.

"The president could veto it, but then he wouldn't have any money," he later said.

Murtha, 74, joined the Marine Corps during the Korean war and volunteered to return to active duty in Vietnam, where he earned his two Purple Hearts — awards given to troops wounded or killed in action.

On Capitol Hill for 33 years, the retired Marine colonel rarely seeks the limelight, often avoiding reporters and speaking on the House floor only to debate the annual defense spending bill.

In November 2005, he stunned his colleagues by turning against the war. Three years after voting in favor of the Iraq invasion, Murtha declared in a tearful speech: "It's time to bring them home."

But it is his reputation as a defense hawk that makes him such a threat to Bush. As a staunch supporter of military spending in the past, Murtha has earned a strong alliance of Republican friends, who say they are watching to see precisely what he proposes.

"I will say it's an interesting concept," said Sen. John Warner, a leading Republican defense figure who opposes sending more troops to Iraq.

"He is a fighter," Warner, R-Va., later added. "Be he right or wrong, he is a fighter and that says a lot."

Rep. Wayne Gilchrest, one of about a dozen House Republicans who announced this week they oppose Bush's Iraq strategy, said he thinks Congress should seriously consider Murtha's ideas.

"To brush these (proposals) off the table is irresponsible," said Gilchrest, R-Md.

Murtha also has his opponents.

"While Rep. Murtha is unveiling his plan to choke off funding for American troops serving in harm's way, Republicans like Rep. Sam Johnson — a distinguished Vietnam War veteran — are on the House floor explaining the demoralizing impact that the majority's political maneuvers will have on our men and women in uniform," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0132776

Bush this week seemed keenly aware of Murtha's political momentum. In recent days, the president shrugged off the significance of House vote expected Friday on a symbolic resolution stating opposition to his war plans. Instead, the president has focused his sights on the upcoming war supplemental.

Bush says he needs $93 billion more to continue paying for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan through Sept. 30; the military is expected to run out of money by May, making passage of the bill critical.

"We have a responsibility, Republicans and Democrats have a responsibility to give our troops the resources they need to do their job and the flexibility they need to prevail," Bush said in speech Thursday.

House Set To Vote Against Troop Increase (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With the House poised to vote Friday against adding more U.S. troops in Iraq, Speaker Nancy Pelosi said the action represents a "huge statement" that President Bush can't "completely ignore" even if he is unwilling to change course militarily.

"I don't know if the president is moveable in terms of the course of action he wants to take militarily," Ms. Pelosi conceded, but she said she hopes "he would be open to a truly robust initiative" to find a diplomatic and political settlement to the fighting.

The California Democrat said the Republicans were using a "stale" argument in accusing the Democrats of not supporting the troops in the war. "I think the American people have spoken on that point…They know that they support the troops and they know they oppose the war."

"This is a huge statement that a majority of Congress in a bipartisan way disapproves of the president's increase of the troops…It's big. This is very big," she said. "There's no more blank check for George Bush," Ms. Pelosi argued, but as Congress reasserts itself on the issue of Iraq, both lawmakers and the White House had to recognize each others role.

"Can you stop it? It has already begun," she said of the proposed addition of combat brigades representing at least 21,000 more soldiers and Maries over the coming months. "The president is the commander in chief. Congress has a role in all of this, and I think you will now see a calibration of those two responsibilities. Neither one of us should abuse our power."

The speaker, who made her comments in an interview with reporters, also shed some light on what she sees as her party's domestic agenda for the next 100 days leading up to Memorial Day. She said she remains optimistic that a minimum wage increase can be worked out with the Senate, and despite White House objections, Democrats will press for adding an estimated $750 million to a wartime supplemental spending bill next month to meet a projected shortfall in funds for a joint state-federal child heath program.

"I think he wants the leanest of supplementals," Ms. Pelosi said, after speaking to Mr. Bush about the matter this week. "But we have some emergencies and as I said to him, these are governors, Democrats and Republicans, who have a shortfall, and something has to be done for these children."

Known as the State Children's Health Insurance Program or SCHIP, the program builds on the state-federal Medicaid program for the poor by trying to reach households above the poverty level. The Congressional Research Service has estimated that 14 states, including Illinois, Georgia, and New Jersey, are facing shortfalls totaling $746.5 million before the end of this fiscal year, Sept. 30.

The same spending bill includes $93.4 billion for the Defense Department to help fund military operations overseas in Iraq and Afghanistan. As such it is the chief focus of the next stage in the war debate, and the bill manager, Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) has said he will recommend adding restrictions that would make it harder for the Pentagon to maintain the higher troop levels anticipated after the proposed surge this spring is completed.

For example, he wants service chiefs to certify that each new unit sent to Iraq has the training and equipment needed. Language could be added to prohibit some of the shortcuts commonly used to maintain troop strength and the integrity of units, given the shortage of personnel. He would restrict "stop-loss" procedures, which are used to keep soldiers such as young non-commissioned officers in a unit about to deploy even when their enlistments are running out. Extended tours in Iraq would be prohibited; soldiers would be guaranteed a year at home before going back.

If enacted, these requirements would have real impact on an Army already straining to complete the increased troop-level target by late May. The combination of allowing no extensions plus a full year of "dwell" time in the U.S. between tours could set a cap on U.S. strength below current levels, one Defense Department official estimated.

House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio said Democrats hoped to "choke off funding for American troops serving in harm's way," but Ms. Pelosi, a close ally of Mr. Murtha's, dismissed these arguments as political.

"What can I tell you about Republicans? They will say what they want to say," she said, defending Mr. Murtha's right to appear in a video interview with the liberal moveon.org. ""We have freedom of speech here…This is a democratic process."

"He is putting out ideas," she said of her friend. "Until you see his proposals in writing, nobody can tell you here what the level of support is. You have to see what it is, what its ramifications are."

"Do most people here have enormous respect for the judgment of Mr. Murtha. Oh yes. But he has to get this through his committee and he's `Mr. Consensus,' if nothing else. He always comes to the floor with a bill that has bipartisan support. And that has been something that has been his hall mark."

But on two related points, also expected to be part of the debate on the spending, bill she was clearly supportive.

She said razing Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, which Mr. Murtha wants to shut down, would send a "great signal to the world." And Ms. Pelosi said she favored adding language that would make it clear that Congress hasn't authorized any military invasion of Iran.

She said in every meeting she has been present with Mr. Bush, the president has said "over and over again that he supports a diplomatic solution to the situation in Iran. I take him at his word."

"I do believe Congress should assert itself though and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president -- and president -- to go into Iran," she said. After years on the House Intelligence Committee, she declined any comment regarding special forces and covert operations. "What I'm talking about is invasion," she said.

Broad Swath Of GOP Defecting On Iraq Vote (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

From the moderate suburbs of Delaware to the rural, conservative valleys of eastern Tennessee, House Republican opponents of President Bush's latest Iraq war plan cut across the GOP's ideological and regional spectrum.

Numbering a dozen or more, these House Republicans have emerged as some of the most prominent opponents of the plan to increase troop presence in Iraq. They admit to being a ragtag band, with no scheduled meetings and little political cohesion.

"We aren't organized at all," said Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.), whose district includes suburbs of the Twin Cities. "It's about as diverse a group as is possible."

Borrowing time from House Democrats, these Republicans have gone to the floor to condemn the latest attempt at stabilizing Iraq, which they see as mired in civil war, and have vowed to support a Democratic-driven resolution condemning the buildup.

The conventional wisdom on Capitol Hill has been that those Republicans facing the most tenuous political hold on their seats would be in open revolt against Bush's unpopular decision to send more troops into Iraq. But the lion's share of GOP opponents of the Bush plan come from comfortable to very safe congressional districts.

Of the first 13 Republicans identified as supporters of the resolution, only three received less than 55 percent of the vote in winning reelection last year -- Reps. Ric Keller (Fla.), Phil English (Pa.) and James T. Walsh (N.Y.). A handful of other GOP supporters received 65 percent or more of the vote last November, placing them among the safest batch of incumbents in the House.

"This is a matter of conscience -- not just your conscience but the conscience of your district," said Rep. Walter B. Jones (N.C.), who has become an unofficial leader among the antiwar Republicans, along with the Eastern Shore's Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.).

DOJ_NMG_0132778

Jones won reelection last year with 69 percent of the vote in a district that gave just 32 percent of its vote to Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) in the 2004 presidential election. He and others predict that 30 to 50 Republicans will vote against the troop increase.

Republican leadership aides expect the bulk of those votes to come from incumbents sitting in marginal districts, or those from the moderate wing of the party.

But these same aides pointed Thursday to a number of Republicans who barely survived the 2006 Democratic wave but have opposed the resolution.

Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), who won by less than 7,000 votes, and Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), who won by less than 2,000 votes, both announced Wednesday that they would oppose the Democratic resolution, condemning it as nothing more than "symbolic."

"The majority is clear on what it is against, but does not say what it is for, leaving us with what exists right now, the status quo," Shays said on the floor. "The resolution sends the wrong message to the president, to our troops and to our enemies. It will not get my vote."

The range of Republican opponents to the war can be seen in Reps. John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr. (R-Tenn.) and Michael N. Castle (R-Del.).

Duncan, from eastern Tennessee, is widely regarded as a solid conservative. Castle, from the Wilmington area, is one of only two publicly declared antiwar Republicans whose districts tilted toward Kerry in 2004. Both he and Duncan are safe politically: Duncan received 78 percent of the vote last year, and Castle, a former two-term governor, won with 57 percent.

Yet Duncan was among the six Republicans who originally opposed the war in 2002, while Castle gave it his full support. Today, they'll both be opposing the troop buildup.

"Conservatives have traditionally been the strongest opponents to interventionist foreign policies that create so much resentment for us around the world," Duncan said Wednesday.

"Notwithstanding the heroic efforts of our military personnel," Castle said, "the Iraqi government has been unable to overcome the constant instability and sectarian violence that has marked much of the last four years."

House Republicans Opposed To Surge May Pressure Senate (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Democrats aim to jump-start Senate debate on Iraq with House GOP defections today.

"As the House vote goes up, the Senate vote goes up," says Democratic caucus chairman Emanuel; predictions range from 20 to 40. Senate leader Reid plans vote tomorrow seeking floor action on House resolution after next week's recess.

Democrats pressure vulnerable Republican Sen. Sununu as new poll shows Bush's job approval dropping to 31% in New Hampshire. War unhappiness shadows 2008 presidential ticket's Granite State prospects as well as Sununu's re-election bid.

Representatives Give Rationale (USAT)

By Eugene Kiely And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 16, 2007

House members debating the Iraq resolution raised the same issues to support their arguments but came to different conclusions. Here are some examples.

For the resolution

Rep. Lincoln Davis, D-Tenn.: Our actions this week do not dishearten the troops, nor reflect a lack of support. … Defense Secretary (Robert) Gates and Gen. (Peter) Pace both testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee that a resolution disagreeing with the president's proposal would not dishearten the troops. In my opinion, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff may have a little better idea of troop morale than members of Congress.

Against the resolution

Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Ga.: If the troops in Baghdad were watching what we were doing today, they would be outraged, but when you are in harm's way, you don't exactly sit around and watch C-SPAN and silly politicians with silly resolutions. Here is what the Democrats are up to: Dearest troops, we support you, but your mission is in the tank. We don't support your mission. Americans are dying, the situation is dire, but we are not going to send more reinforcements. You are on your own.

For the resolution

Rep. Mike McIntyre, D-N.C.: We cannot continue to increase troop levels in Iraq at the expense of allowing the Taliban to come back into power in Afghanistan. The global war on terrorism is exactly what the name says. It is a global war, not just an Iraqi war, and we cannot let our troop strength be so focused on what is becoming a civil war in Iraq that we lose focus on threats that face us elsewhere in the world. Previous surges have not solved the problems in Iraq. Let us not be fooled into thinking that this one will.

Against the resolution

Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla.: Some of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle seek to focus on the abstract rather than on the reality. They believe that security will come from withdrawal and surrender. On the contrary, retreat guarantees that the Islamic militants will intensify their efforts against us. … They won't stop in Iraq, they won't stop in Afghanistan. They have made it abundantly clear that they will not stop until they dominate the world.

For the resolution

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich.: Last Nov. 7, the American people sent a clear message to Congress and the president: We must end the war in Iraq. … No longer will Congress stand by while the president wages a war that defies logic, common sense and human decency. This week, we shall take a stand. This week, we tell this administration enough is enough; stop ignoring the American people; stop ignoring your generals.

Against the resolution

Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J.: The commander of the national VFW put out a press release, and I have the text of it here. "My generation," he said, "learned the hard way that when military decisions are second-guessed by opinion polls or overruled by politicians, it's the common soldier and their families who pay the price." … Mr. Speaker, I think the commander of the national VFW is absolutely right.

For the resolution

Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, D-Mich.: As noted genius Albert Einstein once said, "Insanity is doing the same over and over again and expecting different results." Over and over, Congress has spent over $503 billion in Iraq. Over and over, America's finest have died, with more than 3,000 women and men, in Iraq. Over and over, women and men are wounded or maimed, some for life, with more than 25,000 today. Today, we still cannot safely fly planes on a reliable basis in and out of Baghdad. This is progress?

Against the resolution

Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind.: I am convinced after studying history and watching what happened in the past, that if we don't deal with this problem now, we will deal with it later, and the costs will be a heck of a lot more than it is today, and it may involve millions and millions of lives. Deal with them now, let them know we are going to stand firm, Iraq is going to be a democracy. We are not going to let Iran or any of the terrorists prevail, and we are going to stop a holocaust in the future.

Bush, Congress Could Face Confrontation On Issue Of War Powers (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

President Bush has not been shy about asserting robust powers for the presidency in waging war, but lately he has seemed to concede that Congress has a role to play as well. Lawmakers, he has indicated, are within their rights to try to cap total deployments or limit where troops can go in Iraq.

"They have the right to try to use the power of the purse to determine policy," the president told editors of the Wall Street Journal recently, in an interview that took some of his strongest conservative supporters by surprise.

For a president who has asserted broad executive authority to conduct aggressive interrogations of detainees and electronic surveillance of terrorism suspects without a court warrant, such comments may reflect as much pragmatism as any serious legal analysis. White House aides concede they are not interested in unduly antagonizing lawmakers at a time they need all the help they can get on Capitol Hill.

But as the debate in Congress shifts from nonbinding resolutions of disapproval for adding troops in Iraq to attaching conditions on funding for the war, a constitutional clash between the legislative and executive branches may be inevitable, say lawmakers and legal scholars with close ties to the administration.

After a vote today on a resolution condemning the new deployments to Iraq, House Democratic leaders will serve notice that they intend to attach conditions to the coming spending bill on the war that could arguably encroach on the president's constitutional powers as commander in chief to control tactics and operations.

These include riders that would prevent Bush from sending units to Iraq unless they are certified as combat-ready and that would require Army troops be given a year at home before an additional deployment to Iraq.

Democrats have described these conditions as part of a slow strategy to stop the war without cutting funding completely, which most parties agree would be legally permissible -- but politically difficult.

White House press secretary Tony Snow declined to be drawn into a discussion with reporters yesterday about whether such provisions would be "micromanaging" the war -- which some scholars think would be unconstitutional. The new White House counsel, Fred F. Fielding, is considered a pragmatist not particularly interested in new fights with Congress, but administration allies in the conservative legal world predicted that the White House would eventually chafe at such restrictions.

"The administration might try to be as accommodating as possible on issues short of a complete shutdown of the war, but if Congress clamps down on a core commander-in-chief power that the president thinks might be necessary to use in the war on terrorism, I do not think pragmatism will prevail," said one former top administration lawyer, who conditioned his comments on anonymity.

David B. Rivkin Jr., a White House lawyer in the George H.W. Bush and Ronald Reagan administrations, described the proposed congressional restrictions as the "epitome of micromanagement." He said he thinks "the White House will end up fighting the congressional micromanagement and, if it continues, will publicly articulate the view that it is unconstitutional and not binding on the executive."

Others speculate that Bush may be backpedaling a bit from his broad assertions of presidential power, some of which the Supreme Court rejected last summer when it struck down his plan for trying terrorism suspects in military tribunals.

"He had said on quite a number of occasions that he's the decider," said Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee. "He [is] not the sole decider. . . . As this debate has progressed, the president is acknowledging the constitutional role of Congress."

The administration declined to make available lawyers to discuss the constitutional issues surrounding the war debate, saying it does not want to discuss hypotheticals, but a Justice Department spokesman pointed to a number of opinions from the Office of Legal Counsel suggesting clear limits on congressional power.

In 1996, then-Assistant Attorney General Walter E. Dellinger III wrote a memo stating that congressional language prohibiting the president from placing U.S. forces under United Nations control during peacekeeping operations "would unconstitutionally constrain the President's exercise of his authority as commander-in-chief."

In an interview this week, Dellinger indicated that the Democratic proposals being floated on Capitol Hill -- such as a cap on troops in Iraq -- do not amount to that kind of tactical interference. He said there is a "striking consensus" on both the left and the right that Congress has the power to limit the scope and duration of the war -- not only through the power of the purse but through other war powers.

As Dellinger suggested, there is little question among most scholars that Congress has ample constitutional authority to shut down the war. "I am not aware of a serious dispute over whether it is constitutional for Congress to defund or otherwise terminate the war in Iraq," said Brad Berenson, who was in the White House counsel's office from 2001 to 2003. "The big debate is over whether it is wise."

Indeed, some Republicans seem to be baiting the Democrats to try to defund the war. John Yoo, a former Justice Department official who became well known for his expansive assertions of presidential authority, co-wrote a piece in the New York Times this week suggesting Congress has all the power it wants to stop the war but is engaging in "bluster" with nonbinding resolutions.

Dellinger said he is baffled by such arguments. "Although it does not become law, how can it possibly be considered meaningless for each house of the Congress to exercise the view in a formal recorded vote that a planned addition to U.S. forces is a mistake?" he said. "I think that the framers of the Constitution would be astonished that a president would proceed to increase U.S. involvement in a foreign war over the expressed objection of both houses of Congress."

Democrats Face A Struggle Over War Strategy (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Now comes the hard part.

Congressional Democrats quickly and easily united behind a nonbinding resolution denouncing President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq. But after the measure's expected approval in the House today, party leaders will confront more divisive questions: how to force a determined president to back down from his plan, and whether to push for a complete withdrawal.

Senior House Democrats are crafting a strategy to block a troop escalation in Iraq without exposing the party to charges that it is undermining the military.

But antiwar advocates would rather set a firm target date for withdrawing all troops. More moderate Democrats, especially those in Republican-leaning districts, are worried that direct steps to limit Bush's war powers are fraught with political peril.

In the Senate, meanwhile, a more immediate obstacle looms.

Facing procedural hurdles set up by Republicans, Democrats are still struggling to pass a nonbinding resolution that mirrors the House measure. On Thursday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he would hold an unusual Saturday session to bring the issue to a head, although it remained unclear whether he had enough votes to break the deadlock that stalled action earlier this month.

Regardless of the outcome of the Senate tiff, Capitol Hill's focus in the weeks ahead will turn to Bush's request for additional funding for the war. As they consider it, Democrats will be exploring just how far they can go in challenging him.

One thing is clear: Democratic leaders will be under pressure from the party's rank and file — especially activists who will play a major role in choosing their 2008 presidential candidate — to go beyond symbolic denunciations of Bush's policy.

"Congress has no choice but to do some binding action after the nonbinding resolution, or the antiwar community will go berserk if they are perceived as hesitating," said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of Moveon.org, the liberal online group.

Today's House vote will stand as Congress' first formal repudiation of Bush's Iraq policy, a rare wartime rebuke for a commander in chief. Support for the measure demonstrates that Democratic lawmakers who just a year ago were wary of criticizing Bush over Iraq have been emboldened by the GOP's shellacking in the November election.

Democratic leaders acknowledge the limits of their power to change Bush's policy, noting their party's narrow majority in the Senate and Bush's veto power. But they say they are pushing to create a political climate that forces Bush to change his approach.

Bush has said the House resolution would not affect him, but House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Thursday told reporters, "I don't know that the president can completely ignore it; this is the voice of the American people."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said he and other party leaders "are going to keep ratcheting up the pressure so that public opinion and congressional opinion is so strong that the president will have no choice but to change strategy."

But he added, "There is not just one vote at any one time that is going to be the magic pill that changes it."

As part of their efforts, Democrats and political activists are planning to ramp up pressure on Republicans during next week's recess on Capitol Hill.

In an opening volley, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee today will start running newspaper ads in New Hampshire and Oregon — two states where antiwar sentiment runs strong — attacking Republican incumbents who face reelection next year and who voted with their party last week to block Senate debate on Iraq.

On the eve of the House's vote, Moveon.org Thursday hosted 1,300 meetings around the country where activists viewed an antiwar documentary and a video message from Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), an influential war critic.

During next week's recess, the group plans antiwar rallies at congressional offices of 180 Republicans and Democrats who are deemed insufficiently committed to ending the war.

"The message that keeps going out is: 'Stop the escalation; stop the war,' " said Matzzie.

Republicans are putting out a different message: that the nonbinding resolution denouncing Bush's troop buildup is a stalking horse for future efforts to roll back funding for the war.

DOJ_NMG_0132783

Echoing comments by other GOP lawmakers throughout this week's House debate, Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) said, "My opposition lies not in what [the nonbinding] resolution says, but in what I fear it is intended to do — and that is to lay the foundation to begin cutting funding from our troops."

That line of attack is, in part, why many Democrats worry about the consequences of trying to block the troop increase by tying strings to the supplemental war appropriations bill Bush has requested. These Democrats warn that Republicans will accuse the party of undermining the military because it is difficult to isolate funding for the troop increase without affecting military personnel already deployed.

"It is a Gordian knot," said California Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Alamo), who supports the nonbinding resolution.

Murtha, chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee that will deal with the war funding request, Thursday announced his plan for trying to thwart the troop buildup. He proposed that the bill include a proviso banning the deployment of units that do not meet strict standards of readiness in their equipment and training.

Murtha said that with the military stretched thin, that requirement would make it difficult, if not impossible, for Bush to proceed with the troop increase. He also proposed prohibiting military action against Iran without congressional approval.

Although Murtha's proposal falls short of cutting off funding for the war or setting a timeline for withdrawal, it is embraced by leading antiwar activists.

"We're going to make sure people understand we're supporting the troops and protecting the troops," said Murtha in an interview broadcast on the Web by antiwar group Win Without War. "On the other hand, we are going to stop this surge."

That did not stop Republicans from immediately attacking Murtha, saying his approach amounts to "a slow-bleed" plan to undercut the mission in Iraq.

Conversely, Murtha's measure does not go far enough to satisfy some antiwar Democrats. Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Petaluma), for example, said she would vote against the war funding bill even if the House accepted the conditions aimed at blocking the troop increase.

"People voted for Democrats [in November] because they want us to change the course in Iraq," Woolsey said.

Pelosi stopped short of fully embracing Murtha's plan, while endorsing its thrust of putting a premium on troop readiness.

"It remains to be seen where the committee will go," she said.

Democrats In State Capitols Push Antiwar Resolutions (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 15 — Frustrated by the inability of Democrats in Congress to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's policies in Iraq, state legislators across the country, led by Democrats and under pressure from liberal advocacy groups, are pushing forward with their own resolutions.

Resolutions have passed in chambers of three legislatures, in California, Iowa and Vermont. The Maryland General Assembly sent a letter to its Congressional delegation, signed by a majority of the State Senate and close to a majority of the House, urging opposition to the increase in troops in Iraq.

Letters or resolutions are being drafted in at least 19 other states. The goal is to embarrass Congress into passing its own resolution and to provide cover for Democrats and Republicans looking for concrete evidence back home that anti-Iraq resolutions enjoy popular support.

"The end of this war has to start sometime and somewhere," the president of the Iowa Senate, John P. Kibbie, a Democrat, said Thursday. "And stopping the expansion of these troops needs to happen now."

The activity was spurred in a conference call last month that included state legislators; Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts; and advocacy groups like the Progressive States Network and MoveOn.org.

Mr. Kennedy said pressure by the states would push Washington to oppose the Iraq plans of the Bush administration. "Your voices, your calls, your e-mails and your resolutions have an impact on the debate," Mr. Kennedy said.

Many Republicans in state legislatures have remained silent on the resolutions, seeing no advantage in signing or voting for them. Others have called the actions essentially votes of no confidence in the troops on the ground.

DOJ_NMG_0132784

"These resolutions are a colossal waste of time," said Kris Kobach, chairman of the Republican Party in Kansas, where a resolution was killed in committee. "Legislatures are spending valuable and limited time acting in an area where they have no authority. If all we are doing is sending messages, we should be concerned about the fact that soldiers are being told that their states are not behind them. I think that is particularly troubling."

Many resolutions use language from the Progressive States Network that apes language in a proposed resolution in Congress that says President Bush should obtain explicit Congressional approval before adding troops in Iraq.

Other resolutions go further, calling for a deadline for departure, immediate troop withdrawal or stopping the financing of the war. The votes have largely fallen along party lines — Democrats for and Republicans against — although there have been exceptions. In North Dakota, a Democrat and a Republican are sponsoring a resolution urging Congress and Mr. Bush to "disengage American combat forces in Iraq."

In a vote on Thursday in the Iowa Senate, Republicans insisted on a voice vote rather than a roll call on a resolution to condemn the increase in troops. The measure, which passed, is headed to the House, where its fate is uncertain.

The resolutions, much like the ones that Congress is considering, are nonbinding and have little effect beyond politics. But the states' debates function as an echo chamber for the debate over withdrawing troops from Iraq and help demonstrate growing concerns on the war.

"These resolutions have generated an incredible amount of local media," said Joel Barkin, executive director of the Progressive States Network, a liberal group that works to influence bills. "So they raise awareness that this is a local issue. But it is aimed at pressuring the Congress."

In California, Democrats and Republicans in the State Senate spoke passionately about a resolution that passed on Tuesday.

"As a people, we are getting fed up and want to express it and not be haunted by the effects of silence," said State Senator Carole Migden, Democrat of San Francisco, who sponsored the resolution. "We are trying to capture the mood of the people and offer some guidance as to how the largest state in the union is disposed in the matter."

State Senator Dennis Hollingsworth, Republican of Temecula, an opponent of the measure, said: "This resolution talks about not only opposing the troop increase but cutting off their funding. It lays bare the Democrats' true intentions. So they can stop the platitudes about supporting the troops but not supporting the mission. They want us to lose this war."

In states where Republicans control the legislatures, passage of such antiwar resolutions seems unlikely. Kansas lawmakers held a perfunctory hearing, only to have the committee chairman, Senator Pete Brungardt, Republican of Salina, say he would not schedule a vote.

"A number of people felt that was a rather public vote without an upside," Mr. Brungardt said. "There is not really a winning answer for them."

Bush Regains His Footing (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

It may seem perverse to suggest that, at the very moment the House of Representatives is repudiating his policy in Iraq, President Bush is poised for a political comeback. But don't be astonished if that is the case.

Like President Bill Clinton after the Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994, Bush has gone through a period of wrenching adjustment to his reduced status. But just as Clinton did in the winter of 1995, Bush now shows signs of renewed energy and is regaining the initiative on several fronts.

More important, he is demonstrating political smarts that even his critics have to acknowledge.

His reaction to the planned House vote opposing the increase he ordered in U.S. troops deployed to Iraq illustrates the point.

When Bush faced reporters on Wednesday morning, he knew that virtually all those in the Democratic majority would be joined by a significant minority of Republicans in voting today to decry the "surge" strategy.

He did three things to diminish the impact of that impending defeat.

DOJ_NMG_0132785

First, he argued that the House was at odds with the Senate, which had within the past month unanimously confirmed Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new commander in Iraq -- the man Bush said was the author of the surge strategy and the man who could make it work. Bush has made Petraeus his blocking back in this debate -- replacing Vice President Cheney, whose credibility is much lower.

Second, he minimized the stakes in the House debate by endorsing the good motives of his critics, rejecting the notion that their actions would damage U.S. troops' morale or embolden the enemy -- all by way of saying that the House vote was no big deal.

And third, by contrasting today's vote on a nonbinding resolution with the pending vote on funding the war in Iraq, he shifted the battleground to a fight he is likely to win -- and put the Democrats on the defensive. Much of their own core constituency wants them to go beyond nonbinding resolutions and use the power of the purse to force Bush to reduce the American commitment in Iraq.

But congressional Democrats are leery of seeming to withhold resources from the 150,000 troops who will be fighting in that country once the surge is complete; that is why they blocked Republicans from offering resolutions of their own in the House or Senate pledging to keep financing the war. Democrats did not want an up-or-down vote on that question, but Bush has placed it squarely before them.

In other respects, too, Bush has been impressive in recent days.

He has been far more accessible -- and responsive -- to the media and public, holding any number of one-on-one interviews, both on and off the record, leading up to Wednesday's televised news conference. And he has been more candid in his responses than in the past.

While forcefully making his points, he has depersonalized the differences with his critics and opponents. He has not only vouched for the good intentions of congressional Democrats, he has visited them on their home ground, given them opportunities to question him face to face, and repeatedly outlined areas -- aside from Iraq -- where he says they could work together on legislation: immigration, energy, education, health care, the budget.

With the public eager for some bipartisan progress on all these fronts, Bush is signaling that he, at least, is ready to try.

At his news conference, he also stepped away from personal confrontation with the rulers in Iran, making it clear that he does not necessarily hold its political leadership responsible for shipping arms to the insurgent Shiites fighting in Iraq. He insisted the U.S. military would do whatever is necessary to halt the shipments and protect the troops, but he said repeatedly that these defensive measures are not a prelude to aggressive action against Iran.

All this is to the good. But Bush, unlike Clinton, is in the middle of a bloody civil war, which can be ended only by the Iraqis themselves. All he claims to be able to do is to provide some breathing space for them by attempting to reduce the violence. As he said, "What really matters is what happens on the ground. I can talk all day long, but what really matters to the American people is to see progress."

And whether the American people will see it, no one knows.

Reluctantly, The Senate's Weekend Warriors (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Now this is war.

After four years of fighting in Iraq, and two weeks of trying to force senators to debate the conflict, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid yesterday wheeled out the ultimate weapon.

He ordered his colleagues to work on Saturday.

To the average American, this would be an inconvenience. To a senator, a Saturday vote is a hardship reserved for national crises such as impeachment or Terri Schiavo. Votes have been held on Saturday only five times in the past 10 years.

"Time is of the essence," Reid told a rapt audience in the Senate television studio yesterday afternoon. "That's why the Senate will have another Iraq vote on Saturday."

DOJ_NMG_0132786

The "vote on Saturday is a crucial vote not just for the moment or for the week, but for the history of America," added an overwrought Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.). "We're calling their bluff. We're staying here. Now vote yes or no."

But in trying to force Republicans to debate Iraq, Reid caused untold pain and suffering for his Democratic colleagues, many of whom prefer to spend their weekends running for president. Hillary Clinton was supposed to be campaigning in New Hampshire on Saturday. Barack Obama had plans to be in South Carolina and Virginia. Joe Biden had an Iowa trip scheduled. Chris Dodd had events scheduled in South Carolina.

And then there was Republican John McCain, who had an Iowa engagement, and all those senators on both sides planning to leave on trips for the Presidents' Day recess.

The Post's Shailagh Murray asked Reid whether he had considered the burden his Saturday plan was placing on his ambitious colleagues.

"I'm confident they will be -- most of them will be here," he hedged.

Moments after Reid's bombshell, one presidential candidate, Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), went to the Senate floor to voice his dissent. "I don't think that is a fair or appropriate process for this body to follow," he said. Particularly because he had plans to attend the National Religious Broadcasters convention in Florida on Saturday.

The prospective loss of his Saturday caused great distress to the Senate minority leader, Mitch McConnell (Ky.). He scheduled a news conference for 4 p.m., then moved it to 4:15, then 4:45, then back to 4:30, and finally arrived at 4:40. There, he was asked how his colleagues felt about surrendering their Saturday. "You'll have to ask all of them," he said tightly.

"We could have had a civilized, well-structured debate," McConnell lamented, "but that appears to be not possible at the moment."

It's not entirely clear why Senate Republicans were so determined to avoid a debate. If it goes anything like the three-day House debate this week, the world will little note nor long remember what they say.

House members spent much of their debate exchanging playground-style taunts. Each side tried to tar the other with supporting a "stay the course" plan -- a phrase that, not long ago, was seen as an expression of resolve.

"After months of campaigning against 'stay the course,' the Democrats are proposing just that," said Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.). Countered Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.): "Stay the course? My Lord, that is not remotely what we are talking about here."

"The bottom line of this resolution tells the president to stay the course," insisted Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.). Offered Steve Cohen (D-Tenn.): "The Republicans have come in here today and said that we need to in essence stay the course."

When they weren't bickering about the "stay the course" label, lawmakers fought about whose policy qualified as a "plan" for Iraq.

"If you have an alternative plan, introduce it," Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) challenged.

"What is the plan, Mr. President?" asked Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick (D-Mich.).

"I have presented this Congress with a 12-point plan," said Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Fortunately, Ric Keller (R-Fla.) was on hand to restore gravity to the debate. He spoke about lawn care as a metaphor for Iraq:

"Imagine your next-door neighbor refuses to mow his lawn and the weeds are all the way up to his waist. You decide you are going to mow his lawn for him every single week. The neighbor never says thank you, he hates you, and sometimes he takes out a gun and shoots at you. Under these circumstances, do you keep mowing his lawn forever?"

Hearing such soaring rhetoric from the other chamber only made Senate Democrats more determined to have their own debate. "We demand an up-or-down vote on the resolution that the House is debating," Reid declared. He went to the Senate floor and announced that the vote will begin at 1:45 pm on Saturday. "There's really no time that meets everyone's expectations," he observed.

It appeared Democrats were serious. Then, just before 5 p.m., came official confirmation: an e-mail titled "Revised Hillary Clinton New Hampshire Schedule." The candidate's "Conversation with Granite Staters," which was to have been held at 2:30 Saturday in the Dover High School cafeteria, had been scrapped.

Democratic Leader Gambles That Weekend Detention Could End Senate's Squabbling On Iraq (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Robin Toner

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — As the House prepared to pass a symbolic resolution denouncing President Bush's war policy, Senate Democratic leaders on Thursday abruptly scheduled a weekend debate on Iraq in an effort to break a stalemate and avoid impressions that partisan bickering was weighing down deliberations over the war.

A steady line of Republicans and Democrats made their way to the House floor for a third straight day of debating Mr. Bush's troop buildup plan before the matter comes to a vote Friday. The Senate, stung by its own failure so far to act, spent much of Thursday locked in a debate about debating until Senator Harry Reid, the majority leader, called the rare Saturday session.

"We demand an up-or-down vote on the resolution the House is debating as we speak," said Mr. Reid, a Nevada Democrat. "We're determined to give our troops and the American people the debate they deserve."

But when they convene Saturday afternoon, senators will not debate the Iraq resolution itself. Instead, they will be taking up a procedural vote required under Senate rules to move forward to the actual debate.

Democratic leaders were hoping that 10 days of mounting public pressure would lure enough Republicans in the Senate to their side to attain the 60 votes necessary to move to the Iraq resolution. A procedural vote on a similar resolution last week fell 11 votes short, but since then several Republicans who voted to block consideration of that resolution have taken the floor to express dismay that the Senate was, in effect, sidelined in the debate.

Senate Republican leaders on Thursday forcefully rejected suggestions that they were blocking an Iraq debate. By the end of the day, they trooped into a news conference to declare that they were "disappointed" that they were not allowed a vote on a resolution of their choosing. Scrambling for the moral and political high ground, the Republicans asserted that it was the Democrats — not they — who were freezing the debate.

Throughout the week, as the House debated the Iraq war from morning to night, many senators came to the floor to complain that the upper chamber of Congress was "in real danger of becoming irrelevant," as Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, put it Thursday.

"I don't think we ought to be dominant over the House of Representatives," he said. "But I think we ought to be at least equal. What we have here is close to anarchy. We've been debating the debate all week."

In the Senate, Mr. Reid's announcement essentially called the bluff of Republicans who were increasingly unhappy with the stalemate and had threatened to vote against a motion to adjourn for the Presidents' Day recess. After a closed caucus with his fellow Democrats, Mr. Reid announced his decision for a Saturday vote.

Many Americans, of course, often have to work weekends. But the threat of a Saturday roll-call vote — attendance is taken, absences are noted — sent alarms across the Senate, particularly among those who hastily rearranged their presidential campaign schedules.

At least two Democratic senators, Barbara Boxer of California and Patty Murray of Washington, were already on planes for the West Coast, but aides said they intended to return to Washington for the Saturday vote.

"We hope everyone will be here," Mr. Reid said. "It's an important vote."

Republican leaders have asked to vote on a resolution of support for the troops and the full financing of the war effort. They have accused some Democrats of pursuing a strategy to cut war financing gradually — "a slow bleed," Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, the Republican whip, put it, "a terminology that horrifies me."

Allowing a vote on war financing, Republicans said, would show that Democrats are just as divided.

In an interview on Thursday, Speaker Nancy Pelosi said that the Democrats were unified in their pledge to protect the troops already deployed in Iraq. She added that the House intended to provide the money and resources the troops needed to survive and perform their jobs.

"That's so stale," she said of the recurring Republican argument that Democrats would cut troop financing. "I think the American people have spoken on that point."

DOJ_NMG_0132788

Ms. Pelosi said the House resolution, which is expected to pass with bipartisan support, represented the first Congressional message of disapproval over the war.

“I don’t know that the president can completely ignore us,” she said. “We are the voices of the American people. They were clear in the election that they wanted a new direction, no place more clear than in Iraq.”

After the symbolic Iraq resolutions, a fight over the war’s financing is coming into view. The president has asked Congress to approve $100 billion for wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, a request Democrats have vowed to examine carefully.

Also Thursday, Senator Joseph R. Biden, a Delaware Democrat who leads the Foreign Relations Committee, said he would work to repeal the 2002 war authorization vote in an effort to close down the war.

Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat who leads a defense appropriations subcommittee, said Congress could block at least part of the new deployments to Iraq by requiring troops to meet a series of conditions and training guidelines. There could also be a requirement that troops spend a year between tours of duty in Iraq.

Senate Vote Upsets '08 Hopefuls' Plans (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

The Senate's informal caucus of presidential hopefuls faces its first test in balancing their jobs with their White House ambitions tomorrow: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid has scheduled a key vote on the Iraq war.

The Nevada Democrat yesterday said he did not take members' 2008 aspirations -- or planned weekend visits to Iowa and New Hampshire -- into consideration for his procedural move to debate President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

"We hope everyone will be here," Mr. Reid told reporters. "It's an important vote."

At least six senators are considering or actively pursuing presidential bids, and most had trips planned to early primary or caucus states in anticipation of Congress' first weeklong recess this year.

The news sent the 2008 hopefuls scrambling to rearrange schedules or, in one case, to insist their candidate potentially missing the vote was a non-story.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, was the first to say he would scrap plans for an Iowa visit to make sure he participated in the 1:45 p.m. Iraq vote.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, has a much-publicized visit to a high school in Dover, N.H., from 9:30 a.m. to noon tomorrow.

She already had to cancel one visit to the Granite State because of a death in the family, but staffers said she will keep the Dover event, fly back for the vote and attempt to keep another scheduled campaign stop in Portsmouth, N.H.

As for Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat with plans to travel to South Carolina, the schedule was a work in progress.

"We're still trying to find that out," one Obama staffer said when asked if the senator would still hold a 10 a.m. town-hall meeting in Orangeburg, S.C., tomorrow.

He is slated to deliver the keynote address at Virginia's annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner in Richmond tomorrow night. But he will head to Las Vegas, Los Angeles and Austin, Texas, early next week, plans that Mr. Reid's scheduling could pressure him to change.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, will stay for the vote. He was scheduled to attend an all-day convention of the National Religious Broadcasters, but he will try to do both.

There was no indication Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, would reschedule his morning town-hall forum in Des Moines, Iowa.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, had a full slate of events planned in South Carolina, starting with a breakfast in Columbia and ending with a happy hour in Myrtle Beach.

His staff did not have an answer last night.

Democratic leaders were unapologetic, though Mr. Reid did say he had tried to be accommodating.

"This is an unfortunate fact of life that they're going to have to deal with in the weeks and months to come," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

DOJ_NMG_0132789

Mr. Reid, clearly irritated, yesterday further threatened to keep members in town for Iraq debate next week, refusing to speculate on which days or how long the chamber would be in session.

It is not his own Democratic senators who are making him angry. Mr. Reid, instead, is pushing back against Republicans who last week blocked debate on a different Iraq resolution.

Republicans who oppose the president's plan still voted with their party to stop debate on that measure because they wanted to consider amendments and other versions of Iraq resolutions. This week, the same Republicans had threatened to resist the recess adjournment if they could not vote on Mr. Bush's troop-surge plan.

Democratic leaders said yesterday they were "calling the bluff" of Republicans who wanted to stay in town.

Mr. Reid said he wanted to force an "up or down" vote on the House's nonbinding resolution that states lawmakers support the troops but oppose the president's plan.

Aides conceded privately it will be difficult for Democrats to get the 60 votes needed to pass the procedural vote, but Mr. Reid said if cloture passes, he would proceed immediately to debating war policy.

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, in 2004 faced scrutiny for missing dozens of votes during his presidential campaign.

However, some 2008 staffers privately said yesterday the importance of the procedural "cloture" vote compared with overall Iraq policy was debatable.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, argued the vote is more than a political maneuver.

"That's why the cloture vote on Saturday is a crucial vote, not just for the moment, or for the week, but for the history of America because it will say where do you stand. ... Are you for the escalation or are you not?"

Plenty of other members weren't planning to be in Washington tomorrow at the beginning of a recess, and a three-day weekend to boot.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut has skipped previous Saturday votes and political events because he observes the Jewish Sabbath. Aides for the independent, who caucuses with the Democrats, did not respond to inquiries as to whether he would vote tomorrow.

Mr. Lieberman is one of the few members of the Democratic Caucus who supports Mr. Bush's Iraq plan.

Biden Vows To Narrow Bush's Iraq Mandate (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 16, 2007

Current rank: # 2,015 of 15,674 articles WASHINGTON - Democratic presidential candidate Joe Biden said Thursday he would move to repeal the authority Congress gave President Bush in 2002 to send U.S. troops into Iraq and replace it with a narrower mandate.

The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said the legislation was based on the idea that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction and was designed to oust Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

"The WMDs were not there," Biden said in prepared remarks at the Brookings Institution, a private research group. "Saddam Hussein is no longer there. The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq."

The Delaware senator, who voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq, said he was working to repeal the authorization and to replace it with "a much narrower mission statement for our troops in Iraq."

Congress should make clear the mission is to draw down U.S. forces in Iraq while continuing to combat terrorists, train Iraqis and respond to emergencies, he said.

"We should make equally clear what their mission is not: to stay in Iraq indefinitely and get mired in a savage civil war," Biden said.

Biden long has criticized Bush's strategy in Iraq. It is not clear whether he would be able to draw enough congressional support to succeed in his effort which also would face a Bush veto.

He renewed his proposed roadmap for a political settlement in Iraq, one that gives its warring factions a way to share power peacefully "and offers us a chance to leave with our interests intact."

DOJ_NMG_0132790

"Federalism is Iraq's best possible future," Biden said. "But unless we help make federalism work for all Iraqis, the violence will not stop."

Auditors: Billions Squandered In Iraq (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, February 16, 2007

About $10 billion has been squandered by the U.S. government on Iraq reconstruction aid because of contractor overcharges and unsupported expenses, and federal investigators warned Thursday that significantly more taxpayer money is at risk.

The three top auditors overseeing work in Iraq told a House committee their review of $57 billion in Iraq contracts found that Defense and State department officials condoned or allowed repeated work delays, bloated expenses and payments for shoddy work or work never done.

More than one in six dollars charged by U.S. contractors were questionable or unsupported, nearly triple the amount of waste the Government Accountability Office estimated last fall.

"There is no accountability," said David M. Walker, who heads the auditing arm of Congress. "Organizations charged with overseeing contracts are not held accountable. Contractors are not held accountable. The individuals responsible are not held accountable."

"People should be rewarded when they do a good job. But when things don't go right, there have to be consequences," he said.

Also testifying Thursday were Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, and William H. Reed, director of the Defense Contract Audit Agency.

The appearance before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee came as Congress prepares for a showdown with President Bush next month over his budget request of nearly $100 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

So far, the Bush administration has spent more than $350 billion on the Iraq war and reconstruction effort.

The Army, which handles most of the Iraq contracting, said Thursday it had not reviewed the latest contract figures.

"The U.S. Army, along with the Departments of Defense and State, continue to help thousands of Iraqis daily with reconstruction projects to provide them with better lives," said spokeswoman Mary Ann Hodges. "We look forward to examining its findings and applying some of its recommendations in the future."

Senate Democrats said recently cited cases of waste were "outrageous rip-offs of the American taxpayer" and introduced legislation Thursday to stiffen punishment for war profiteers and cut down on cronyism in contracting.

According to their testimony, the investigators:

_Found overpricing and waste in Iraq contracts amounting to $4.9 billion since the Defense Contract Audit Agency began its work in 2003. Some of that money has been recovered. An additional $5.1 billion in expenses were charged without proper documentation.

_Pointed to growing Iraqi sectarian violence as a significant factor behind bloated U.S. contracting bills. Iraqi officials, they said, must begin to take primary responsibility for reconstruction efforts. That is an uncertain goal, given the widespread corruption in Iraq and the local government's inability to fund projects.

_Urged the Pentagon to reconsider its growing reliance on outside contractors in wars and reconstruction efforts. Layers of subcontractors, poor documentation and lack of strong contract management are rampant and promote waste even after the GAO first warned of problems 15 years ago.

Walker complained that GAO investigators have difficulty getting basic detail about reconstruction contracts such as expenses and subcontractors involved because many Pentagon divisions fail to consistently track or fully report them.

"It's absolutely essential if Congress wants to make an informed decision on authorizations and appropriations that we get this information," he said. "We're talking about billions of dollars and thousands of American lives at stake."

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the committee chairman, has pledged scores of investigations of fraud, waste and abuse — with subpoenas if necessary — on the administration's watch.

DOJ_NMG_0132791

Of the $10 billion in overpriced contracts or undocumented costs, more than $2.7 billion were charged by Halliburton Co., the oil-field services company once headed by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Noting that auditors still have $300 billion of Iraq spending to review, Waxman said the total amount of waste, fraud and abuse "could be astronomical."

"It's no wonder that taxpayers all across our country are fed up and demanding that we bring real oversight to the 'anything goes' world of Iraq reconstruction," he said.

Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., the top Republican on the panel, pointed to ongoing, "systemic" problems in Iraq contracting. "This much is clear: Poor security, an arcane, ill-suited management structure, and frequent management changes have produced a succession of troubled acquisitions," Davis said.

Contract Probe Raises More Questions (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A congressional investigation into waste in Iraq reconstruction work by U.S. contractors threatens to mushroom into a wider inquiry into Pentagon contracting practices in general.

Under questioning by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Defense Contract Audit Agency chief William Reed confirmed that unsupported and questionable costs found in Iraq reconstruction contracting total more than $10 billion -- nearly three times the previous public estimate.

David Walker, head of the Government Accountability office, Congress's audit agency, said lax contracting practices in Iraq are merely "the tip of the iceberg." They are symptomatic of loose Defense Department contracting practices over all, he said, and he urged the committee and Congress in general to conduct a broad investigation into the way the Pentagon awards and oversees contracts.

Mr. Walker said, "There is no accountability. Organizations charged with overseeing contracts are not held accountable. Contractors are not held accountable."

Under Chairman Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) the committee is holding a series of hearings into contracting abuses in Iraq. Staffers confirmed that Mr. Waxman and other committee Democrats likely will take a much wider look at defense contracting after the Iraq hearings conclude.

Mr. Walker cited multiple problems with Pentagon contracting practices. He attributed these to a lack of control by senior leaders, a shortage of personnel to oversee contractor performance, poorly defined requirements for contractors, and "poor business arrangements," he said.

Said Shay Assad, director of the Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy Office, said, "GAO has made a number of recommendations to improve the Department of Defense's management and use of contracts." Mr. Shay said, "In general we have agreed with these recommendations, and we have been, and are continuing, to work on implementing improvements to address them."

• The Situation: A House panel is holding a series of hearings examining waste in Iraq reconstruction contracts.

• What's at Stake: The Defense Contract Audit Agency chief says unsupported and questionable costs found in such contracts totals more than $10 billion -- nearly three times the previous public estimate.

• What's Next: The congressional investigation could lead to a much broader look into how the Pentagon awards and oversees contracts.

In recent years increasing amounts of military work have been let out to private contractors, and the percentage of no-bid contracts -- those awarded with no competition -- has risen. Until now, Congress hasn't focused in depth on the problem, while many members of Congress have been criticized for awarding "earmarks" that funneled defense contracts to particular favored companies.

Mr. Reed said during the House panel hearing that the Defense Department had disallowed and withheld from contractors working in Iraq only 25% to 37% of the amounts his agency had identified as improper or questionable. The defense audit agency has no power to order compliance with its audits, and the final decisions are made by the individual military services or other officials.

A report by the committee's staffers said the estimate of $10 billion in possibly illegitimate contracting costs in Iraq likely is low. Mr. Reed confirmed that while his agency had audited $57 billion in Iraq contracts, it doesn't know the total amount spent on contracts there. The staff report estimates at least $75 billion spent on contracts in Iraq.

During the hearing, Dyncorp International Inc., a large government contractor, was one of several firms singled out for criticism. An audit report last month by the Special Inspector General for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, raised questions about work Dyncorp did and was paid for that the government hadn't requested, particularly on a new police training camp in Baghdad.

During the hearing, members of the committee raised questions about a luxury swimming pool and hundreds of trailers that were built for the camp but ended up unused. Mr. Bowen told the committee he is launching an in-depth audit of Dyncorp's work in Iraq.

A Dyncorp spokesman said all of the work had been specifically authorized by U.S. officials of the Coalition Provisional Authority that ran Iraq until a new Iraqi government took over: "Everything that we've done, we did in good faith, and everything we've done was authorized by the U.S. government."

Leader Of Al-Qaeda In Iraq Injured In Clash, Official Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 15 -- The leader of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, who is known by the alias Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was injured in a clash with Iraqi police Thursday night, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry said.

One of Masri's deputies, Abu Abdullah al-Mujamie, was killed in the gunfight, which occurred about 11 p.m. near Samarra, ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said.

U.S. officials have said Masri took over the leadership of the insurgent group following the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by U.S. forces in a June 2006 airstrike. In December, Iraqi officials said security forces had killed another aide to Masri, whom officials describe as a longtime associate of Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri.

A senior al-Qaeda in Iraq leader, Abu Amar al-Dulaimi, confirmed the death of Mujamie, whom he described as Masri's "personal escort," but questioned whether Masri was even in the area. "We don't know if [Masri] was with him or not, or if he was wounded or not," Dulaimi said Thursday night in a phone interview.

Kinani, the ministry spokesman, said Iraqi forces conducted the operation "without U.S. intervention," but Dulaimi said people in the area reported seeing helicopters and fighter planes roaming the sky afterward, a possible indication of a U.S. role in the clash.

Also Thursday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has ordered his top deputies to leave Iraq in order to ease the implementation of the Baghdad security plan, which U.S. and Iraqi forces began to roll out this week.

Sadr, the leader of the powerful Mahdi Army militia, recently went to Iran, according to U.S. officials.

During a news conference Thursday night, Talabani said Sadr told government officials that he was "eager for the stability of the state and the success of the security plan. He gave the government the green light to detain any outlaws."

In Washington on Thursday, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said he believed that Sadr's followers were concerned about the new operation to secure Baghdad and suggested that Sadr and his militia would "go to ground" over the coming months. "And the question is, during that space . . . can we and the Iraqis provide enough security so that economic development, improvements in governance, political reconciliation can all begin to make real progress in Iraq?" Gates said.

Gates said it was "an assumption" that Sadr has gone to Iran. "I haven't seen any factual proof of it at this point, but that's what people -- that's what I hear people think," Gates said.

In recent days, some of Sadr's aides in Iraq have denied that Sadr has left the country.

DOJ_NMG_0132793

The security plan includes an increase in U.S. and Iraqi troops, a crackdown on civilians carrying weapons and increased security measures at the Iranian and Syrian borders. U.S. and Iraqi forces this week have been cordoning off sections of the city to root out insurgents and seize weapons. Several of the areas targeted recently are Sunni insurgent strongholds.

Also Thursday, the leader of one of Iraq's most revered Shiite mosques suspended Friday prayers to protest a raid conducted Wednesday.

U.S. military officials said in a statement that Iraqi forces raided the Barantha Mosque in north-central Baghdad because they suspected it was "used as a place to conduct sectarian violence against Iraqi civilians as well as a safe haven and weapons storage area for illegal militia groups." The officials said they confiscated three heavy machine guns and 80 assault rifles.

The mosque's imam, Jalal al-Din al-Saghir, a Shiite cleric and member of parliament who belongs to the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, decried the raid during a telephone interview Thursday night. He said it was conducted solely by U.S. forces.

"They insulted the mosque and they did not inform the Iraqi government of the operation," he said. "We had an agreement with the government. They should tell us before doing such a thing."

Meanwhile, violence continued in Baghdad, where additional checkpoints have been set up recently and a nighttime curfew was extended by one hour.

A car bomb in Sadr City and other explosions killed at least seven people on Thursday, a police spokesman said.

The heavily fortified Green Zone was struck by rocket or mortar fire early Thursday, injuring two people, including an American citizen, said Lou Fintor, the U.S. Embassy spokesman. Fintor also said an Iraqi employee of the embassy was killed Wednesday in central Baghdad in what he described as a "random and senseless" act of violence.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military disclosed in a statement the death of an American soldier killed Wednesday in Anbar province in western Iraq while "conducting combat operations."

Al-Qaeda In Iraq's Leader Reportedly Hurt In Clash (USAT)

USA Today, February 16, 2007

N

BAGHDAD — The leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq was wounded and an aide was killed in a clash Thursday with Iraqi forces, an Interior Ministry official said.

Brig. Gen Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a ministry spokesman, declined to say how Iraqi forces knew that the al-Qaeda leader, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, had been wounded in the clash north of Baghdad. There was no report on the matter from U.S. authorities, and the deputy interior minister, Maj. Gen. Hussein Ali Kamal, said he had no information that such a clash had occurred.

Khalaf said the skirmish happened near Balad, a major U.S. base about 50 miles north of the capital.

Al-Masri took charge of al-Qaeda in Iraq after its charismatic leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, was killed in June in a U.S. airstrike in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

Meanwhile Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi forces pushed deeper into Sunni militant strongholds in Baghdad as part of a wide-ranging security sweep of the capital.

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers set up dozens of roadway checkpoints around the city and conducted top-to-bottom searches of vehicles as part of their new campaign to disarm militias and pacify the capital.

Low-flying fighter jets thundered over the capital. A spokesman for the U.S. military in Baghdad, Maj. Steven Lamb, said 17 suspects were arrested and three weapons caches seized.

Waiting in a snarl of traffic at one blockade, Mohammed al-Jubouri said people are willing to put up with the trouble as long as the security sweep shows some results. A wave of bombings has killed hundreds of civilians since the beginning of the year.

"We are fed up," al-Jubouri said. "We want only the security and stabilization."

In Baghdad's Dora neighborhood, long a stronghold of Sunni militants, two parked cars wired with explosives blew up as a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol rolled past. The convoy was unharmed, but the blast killed at least four civilians and injured 15 others.

Two other car bombings came as security forces moved through the city. Those attacks killed at least three civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0132794

A leader of the main Sunni bloc in parliament, Adnan al-Dulaimi, complained that the U.S.-led sweeps are attacking mostly Sunni areas. "It should concentrate on those who are perpetrating the violence and terrorist acts in all districts," he said — a possible reference to the Shiite militias and their stronghold of Sadr City.

In other developments:

•In southern Iraq, British and Iraqi security forces closed two crossings on the Iranian border at Sheeb and Shalamcha and expanded coastal patrols to monitor maritime traffic into southern Iraq.

•Authorities also set up checkpoints ringing Basra, Iraq's second-largest city and the commercial hub of the Shiite-dominated south. The British military said the operation would last for 72 hours.

•Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said in a statement that he believes that radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has ordered leaders of his Mahdi Army militia to leave Iraq.

There continued to be conflicting reports about al-Sadr's whereabouts. On Tuesday, a spokesman for al-Sadr disputed the U.S. military's claim that he was in Iran.

Baghdad Crackdown Underway (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

BAGHDAD — It was just after lunch Thursday when the "surge" arrived at Haidar Karam's doorstep.

Out of nowhere, about 50 U.S. troops appeared and circled his northeast Baghdad neighborhood. Half a dozen Humvees arrived 15 minutes later. Snipers took up positions on rooftops. Troops stopped vehicles from moving.

They were the leading edge of a Baghdad security plan called Operation Law and Order, part of what the Bush administration has dubbed a "surge" in U.S. troops in Iraq.

After weeks of delay, the promised crackdown and troop increase were boldly evident Thursday during an hours-long tour of neighborhoods throughout the war-weary capital of 6 million people, where sectarian fighting kills an average of 100 residents a day.

A U.S. officer approached Karam, handing the government clerk a piece of paper with a phone number and an e-mail address to contact authorities if there was any trouble in his Shiite-dominated Shaab neighborhood.

He told Karam through an interpreter that American and Iraqi forces were going to secure the neighborhood. They were going to install a one-megawatt power generator.

"I told him, 'I find that difficult to believe,' " Karam said. "Our government always lies to us."

At that, the U.S. officer laughed, Karam said.

"We will prove it to you!" he said the American told him.

U.S. and Iraqi forces conducted raids, searched abandoned buildings and patrolled neighborhoods as part of the security plan, which officially began Tuesday evening.

At least 3,000 additional U.S. troops and about 2,000 Iraqi counterparts have arrived so far.

Despite the crackdown, authorities discovered the bodies of at least 20 men shot dead and dumped in west Baghdad. Dozens were killed or found slain around the country.

Troops to stick around

Under the security plan, units of U.S. and Iraqi forces will attempt to clear neighborhoods of unauthorized weapons and insurgents. They will stay rather than returning to base, in an attempt to halt spiraling sectarian warfare between Shiite Muslim and Sunni Arab gunmen, lure residents back to their homes and rebuild the economy.

"We are establishing a stronger presence throughout the city," said U.S. Army Maj. Steven F. Lamb, a spokesman for American forces in Baghdad. "We're going to have a 24-hour presence, which is going to stem the sectarian violence. All available troops that we can have on the street are on the streets."

On Thursday, U.S. forces often found themselves back at the small bases they used in the early months after the 2003 invasion. The facilities were abandoned as U.S. commanders under the direction of Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. decided to lower the American profile in neighborhoods and hand security over to Iraqi forces.

Since then, a once-vibrant Baghdad has become a forbidding maze of concrete walls and concertina wire roamed by mysterious gunmen, where petrified residents rush to their homes before dark.

The Dora district in south Baghdad was among the first neighborhoods targeted by the security plan. With Humvees and armored vehicles protected by aircraft, U.S. troops swept in Wednesday, setting off stun grenades before storming houses in search of insurgents.

By Thursday morning, explosions were shaking the district and security forces at newly established checkpoints had begun searching cars.

"Just four days ago, gunmen never stopped attacking checkpoints and firing at the Iraqi army," said journalist Ghesan Jabouri, a Dora resident. "Now that's all over."

Still, two car bombs killed at least four Iraqis and injured 20 in Dora, and by midafternoon the district's bullet-scarred main streets testified to the enormous challenges facing U.S. and Iraqi forces. Many of the closed shops were painted with an encircled X, a warning by insurgents not to reopen. Jittery Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint stood guard, waving past the smattering of drivers braving the streets.

In nearby Sadiya, a violent Sunni neighborhood, U.S. troops stood near the kitchen of a home and watched Iraqi counterparts search the modest single-story house for weapons.

"What, grandma?" an Iraqi soldier joked to the family's matriarch, a woman in her 70s. "Don't you have any rocket-propelled grenades or roadside bombs?"

"No, son," she replied, laughing. "What would we do with such cursed things?"

The soldiers seized a handgun but let her family keep an AK-47.

Numerous checkpoints staffed by Iraqi soldiers and police directed the sparse traffic.

"We are very motivated," said a burly young Iraqi army lieutenant standing guard on the outskirts of the Yarmouk district downtown. "This security plan is a significant turn of events."

Streams of unmarked white SUVs filled with masked security officers pointing assault rifles at motorists passed by. Blue-and-white police pickups with makeshift plates of armor slapped to the sides kicked up dust and exhaust as they sped past motorists.

The heavy police and army presence, as well as the advance publicity, may have scared off many of the gunmen. Few shops were open, and traffic was scant along the once-glittery 14th Ramadan Street in the Mansour district of west Baghdad, the site of frequent battles over checkpoints between insurgents and security forces.

Insurgents expected back

U.S. and Iraqi officials think the initial shock of the plan will wear off and the insurgents will be back.

"That's a common issue that you have to deal with in any combat environment," Lamb said. "They're going to evaluate what we're doing and adjust to it, just as we have to evaluate what they're doing and adjust to it."

Iraqi troops, often criticized for lax responses, appeared to move more aggressively. Their Humvees were arrayed along the main road through the Kadhimiya district. Two truckloads of soldiers wound their way along a narrow street in the Adhamiya neighborhood. A soldier wearing a purple bandana grinned as he manned a .50-caliber machine gun and gestured for vehicles to stop.

The situation was similar in neighborhoods of every sect and economic class.

Security forces also sealed off Sadr City, the Shiite district that is the power base of the Al Mahdi militia. Even so, a car bomb there killed three people and injured 25.

U.S. officials say that unlike previous efforts, the security crackdown has the support of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's government, which had blocked American efforts to target certain individuals and neighborhoods.

Raids in the last two days targeted the Baratha mosque, the base of a powerful Shiite politician, the Hillah offices of a local leader of Maliki's Dawa Party, and an office of radical cleric Muqtada Sadr's movement in Hillah.

In the southern city of Basra, officials launched a simultaneous security crackdown and sealed the nearby borders with Iran, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. One British soldier was killed and another injured during attacks on checkpoints west of Basra.

DOJ_NMG_0132796

A U.S. Marine died in western Iraq on Wednesday, where 4,000 of the 21,500 additional U.S. troops being added for the security plan will be deployed by May.

U.S. officials, including President Bush, have urged patience in measuring results of the crackdown.

Six weeks ago, U.S. forces converted nine abandoned homes into a small military base in the once-leafy west Baghdad neighborhood of Ghazaliya.

"The first two weeks after the base was completed were really calm," said the owner of an electrical shop in the neighborhood who asked not to be identified.

But Sunni and Shiite gangs soon resumed attacking each other, he said. Shiites burned down a cherished library adjacent to a Sunni mosque. Sunnis responded with a killing spree.

"U.S. troops never did anything," the resident said. "I do not know what will happen, or whether this plan to secure Baghdad will succeed…. It seems like someone is always trying to make sure it doesn't."

Dispute Over Iraqi Cleric, Said To Have Gone To Iran (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 15 — Questions and accusations continued to swirl about the whereabouts of the militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr on Thursday, and American and Iraqi forces deepened their security push in Baghdad.

An Interior Ministry official said that the Iraqi police had wounded Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the leader of the terrorist group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, and killed his top aide in a gun battle near Balad, in Diyala Province. But there were no further details, including whether Mr. Masri had been captured or how it was known he had been wounded, and the United States military declined to comment on the report.

Two Shiite leaders stepped forward on Thursday to confirm American reports this week that Mr. Sadr had gone to Iran.

But the two, a senior official in Mr. Sadr's organization who spoke on condition of anonymity, and Sami al-Askari, a Parliament member from a different Shiite party, took exception with suggestions that he had fled because of a crackdown on militias and had permanently moved to Iran. They said that the cleric often visited the country and that it was unclear why he had left or when he would come back; the Sadr official said he could return to Iraq on Friday.

In a sign of how volatile the topic has become, several of the cleric's aides continued their vehement denials that he had left at all, and accused the Americans of a propaganda campaign to paint him as a coward. "This is an American lie that aims to get information about the whereabouts of Sadr in any way possible," said Abdul Razzaq al-Nadawi, a top Sadr aide, in an interview on Al Arabiya. "Through this they can accomplish two things: the first is that either Sadr shows up on TV and announces that he is here, and in this case they can make sure that he is in Najaf, Iraq. If he doesn't show up they will also have achieved something, by depicting Sadr as a coward who fled to Iran fearing for his life."

For his part, Mr. Askari said he did not understand why either the Americans or Mr. Sadr's group were making such a fuss. The cleric has frequently traveled to Iran, he said, and rarely appears in public even when he is in Iraq. "I don't know why the Sadrists are denying that Moktada al-Sadr has left," he said. "Maybe because of the provocative statements by the Americans."

The American military has not divulged its motivation for highlighting Mr. Sadr's purported absence. Senior White House officials said that they believed that Mr. Sadr left several weeks ago and that it was unclear what led him to go. If he actually did leave, it is now unclear whether he could come back: the Iraqi government said Thursday that it had closed its borders with Syria and Iran as part of the new security plan.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite who owes much of his political rise to early support from Mr. Sadr, has struggled under recent pressure to show progress in reining in the militias. United States officials insist that the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias have been taking a bigger role in attacking American troops, sometimes with help from Iranian materials and expertise. Meanwhile, Sadr loyalists portray themselves as nationalists, legitimate partners of the Shiite-led government, and the only capable defenders of Shiite families from attack by Sunni Arab groups.

The report on Thursday about the wounding of the Qaeda leader in Iraq came after the official, Maj. Gen. Hussein Ali Kamal, the deputy interior minister, had canceled a scheduled news conference. In making the announcement, General Kamal said he had no further information.

Mr. Masri was identified as the new leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia last summer, after the terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed in June. Mr. Masri, an Egyptian who said he was a founding member of the group, has been the subject of speculation before. On Oct. 5, news reports suggested that he had been killed. A month later, an audio recording surfaced with a voice attributed to Mr. Masri taunting President Bush.

In Baghdad, the top Iraqi and American commanders for the city — Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar and Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr. — visited a market area in eastern Baghdad recently hit by several car bombs.

In the southern Sunni area of Dora, gunshots and mortar fire rang out all morning as American troops set up tanks on corners and surrounded parts of the neighborhood, residents said. In the northeastern Shiite districts of Shaab, Ur and Bayda, American troops with Iraqi policemen continued to search homes for weapons. About 300 Iraqi security forces worked in the area with 2,500 American troops, said Col. Steve Townsend, the commander of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team.

For the second day of their sweep, American troops found almost no resistance, instead mostly encountering compliant residents and children begging for attention. In the afternoon, some troops decided to cruise through nearby Sadr City. From the hatch of a 19-ton Stryker armored vehicle, the district appeared far less friendly than the three nearby neighborhoods had. There were lots of antagonistic hand gestures, hard stares and grimaces from young men.

About an hour later, near a restaurant in Sadr City, six people were killed when a minibus exploded outside a popular restaurant. With American troops on the neighborhood's edges and Iraqi forces inside, witnesses said that the heightened security presence helped evacuate bombing victims more quickly.

Salaam Sabri, 35, a microbus driver who ran to the scene after hearing the explosion, said that police cars and army vehicles were hauling bodies to the hospital while policemen and soldiers searched cars and pedestrians for signs of who might be responsible for the attack.

"It wasn't like before," he said. "They surrounded the area and they checked all the cars and all the people walking by."

Two car bombs exploded in Dora just after 1 p.m., killing four Iraqi civilians not far from where American tanks gathered on corners. Twenty bodies were found in Baghdad on Thursday, an Interior Ministry official said. At least one was headless, according to a hospital official.

A sniper killed an Iraqi Army soldier in the Sunni area of Adhamiya, an Interior Ministry official said. An Iraqi police commando was also killed by gunfire in the Amil neighborhood, another Sunni area.

In another Sunni district, the Jamaa neighborhood of western Baghdad, a car packed with explosives blew up near an Iraqi patrol, wounding two soldiers. The United States military said in a statement that a marine was killed Wednesday during combat in Anbar Province.

A missile or mortar round hit a building just across the Tigris River from the Green Zone, wounding two people, including an American Embassy contractor, said Louis J. Fintor, an embassy spokesman.

Iraq Troop Boost Erodes Readiness, General Says (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Outgoing Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said yesterday that the increase of 17,500 Army combat troops in Iraq represents only the "tip of the iceberg" and will potentially require thousands of additional support troops and trainers, as well as equipment -- further eroding the Army's readiness to respond to other world contingencies.

Although final decisions on deployments have not been made, Schoomaker said, U.S. commanders in Iraq have requested an additional 2,500 soldiers to serve as embedded trainers for Iraqi forces, and 5,000 to 6,000 additional soldiers could be needed to provide logistical and other support to the five Army combat brigades flowing into Baghdad.

"We are having to go to some extraordinary measures to ensure we can respond," he said, but he added that even then he could not guarantee the combat units would receive all the translators, civil affairs soldiers and other support troops they request. "We are continuing today to get requests for forces that continue to stress us."

Schoomaker, in one of his last congressional testimonies as Army chief, also made it clear that he had raised concerns in advance about President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq because it would further deplete Army units at home.

"We laid out . . . exactly what the risks are in terms of other contingencies . . . to include my concerns about the lack of adequate dwell time," he said, referring to the fact that active-duty soldiers now spend only about a year at home between 12-month war zone rotations.

Schoomaker noted that Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was "obligated to present any dissenting opinions and he did that, as did we," in discussions on the troop increase with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and the president. Still, Schoomaker added that "our mission now is to support the commander in chief."

Virtually all of the U.S.-based Army combat brigades are rated as unready to deploy, Army officials say, and to meet the immediate needs in Iraq and Afghanistan they are finding it necessary to transfer personnel and gear to those units now first in line to deploy.

"I am not satisfied with the readiness of our non-deployed forces," Schoomaker told the Senate Armed Services Committee, noting that the increased demands in Iraq and Afghanistan "aggravate that" and increase his concern. "We are in a dangerous period," said Schoomaker, adding that he recently met with his Chinese counterpart, who made it clear that China is scrutinizing U.S. capabilities.

The Marine Corps commandant, Gen. James T. Conway, said in the same hearing that his chief concern is that Marines are not training for other types of conflicts beyond the insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan -- such as conventional ground wars. "My largest concern has to do with training," he said. "We're not doing amphibious training, we're not doing mountain training," as well as some large-scale exercises, he said.

About 40 percent of Army and Marine Corps equipment is now in Iraq or Afghanistan or undergoing repair or maintenance. To outfit the additional forces for Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army is drawing gear from prepositioned stocks of armored Humvees, tanks and other major equipment that would not then be available for another conflict, Conway said.

Schoomaker stressed the ongoing need for funding to repair, replace and upgrade Army equipment, criticizing funding shortfalls in 2005 and 2006 that forced layoffs and slowdowns in production at Army repair depots.

Even if the United States were to carry out a significant troop reduction in Iraq, Schoomaker said he would advise going ahead with the Army's plan for a permanent increase of 65,000 active-duty soldiers by 2013. "The Army's too small for the century we're in," he said.

House Call (WSJ)

By Martin Peretz

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Our political imagination of evil is impoverished, and nowhere is it more impoverished than in Iraq. Even today, when the blood of innocents flows so richly and regularly, we do not seem to grasp its origins, or its power. That is, we do not seem to grasp the centrality, and the perdurability, of culture. And in this regard, the president and his party, as well as the Democratic Party, are equally blinded by their respective orthodoxies.

When the administration took us into Iraq, it was in transports of universalism, as all democratizers must be. All that it wished to know is that people, all people, people everywhere, yearn for liberty and for a fair state. This was not the traditional Republican view of these matters, and it took some courage for George W. Bush to buck the cynical and cynically elitist view of his father and James Baker that arrangements can always be made with dictators, and satisfactory arrangements at that. It was actually refreshing to hear this Four Freedoms trace of Franklin Roosevelt from the smug Grand Old Party, although we had already heard it once before from its slightly dopey but truth-seeing president, Ronald Reagan. All men and women want to be free, Mr. Bush said, and Iraqis too.

The problem is that this belief, which is probably true, is not all we need to know. Whatever people want, they want in their particularity. General aspirations are always locally inflected, sometimes to the vanishing point. The people we set out to liberate were not just human beings, they were also Arabs, and Muslims; and more particularly, they were Shia Muslims and Sunni Muslims, and Kurdish Muslims as well. We did not invade only an enslaved country, we invaded also an ethnos, a religion, a culture -- none of which have been historically (and frankly philosophically) receptive to the great blessing that we wished to confer. The president's belief in the omnipotence of the American military -- that it can outsmart and outfight militias that butcher indiscriminately -- only confirmed him in his sense that the persistence of cultural and sectarian hatreds would be no problem, that a 1,300-year-old fact of culture and religion could be effectively overcome by a new doctrine of counterinsurgency.

The Democratic opposition went through a similar process, but in the reverse. It is true that liberals are keenly aware of difference, and lovingly celebrate difference. That is what multiculturalism is about, and moving towards open borders too. But they do not like to see the virulence of diversity -- the historical persistence of the enmity of one element of the crazy quilt for the other, even one seemingly quite akin to the other. The liberal appreciation of the hateful dimensions of tribal and clannish identity generally extended no further than the blood rituals of "The Sopranos." Now they are so much wiser, and sagely lecture everyone within earshot about the permanent hatreds between Sunni and Shia, although their House chairman of intelligence oversight had not the foggiest notion of who was in discord and what the discord was about. In any case, they counsel smugness, since none of these inter- and intra-sectarian hostilities will ever come to our shores.

Where, then, are we in the war? No one knows exactly what to do about it. Everybody knows that we are in trouble. Even those of us who are skeptical about the ideological inclinations of many Democrats cannot but dignify the national anxiety that they represent. The House is now debating a nonbinding resolution supporting our troops already in Iraq and disapproving the dispatch of 20,000 more. The debate is, strategically speaking, pointless: The new troops are already on their way. The Senate will figure out how to make its own sense of the politically fraught perplexity. Now, both houses of Congress are perfectly entitled to debate anything of this magnitude. Indeed, they have a responsibility to do so. A war should not shut down free opinion, or -- worse yet -- informed opinion. So the attempt of the House minority leader, John Boehner, to scare them away from a serious debate with demagogic references to the American Revolution is unseemly. This is a weighty war, very weighty. The absence of a serious debate about its ends and its means would rightly earn the national legislature the contempt of all Americans.

But the formula that the House Democratic leadership has fixed on is a charade. It allows each of the 435 representatives five minutes at the podium, enough for them to posture for local television but not so much that anybody can say anything serious, let alone deep or even brave. And the resolution's text itself is rather cowardly. For, since it purports to be a declaration of support for American soldiers actually fighting in Iraq -- whatever "support" actually means -- why does it criticize the only help that can possibly enable the military in the war: more soldiers and more weapons? And, if the Democrats do not want the war to be continued, then they should bring forth legislation either cutting funds or setting a date for withdrawal, in the manner of George McGovern. There is no rationale for troops in terrible danger to be held hostage to the political expediency of nervous Democrats, who are not prepared to do what they really mean to do and to say what they really mean to say.

Only one resolution is being debated on the House floor, and no amendments will be permitted. Not quite a debate, is it? One sees in Nancy Pelosi's iron-fisted eagerness to get everyone into line a measure of her years in the wilderness. She will have her way. And the political hothouse is even more torrid in the Senate. There, after all, sit the candidates for president. One would think that, given the threat to her nomination posed by Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton would be more flexible in her views on the war. Her insistence on not saying that she had made a "mistake" in voting for the 2003 deployment of troops to Iraq puts her out of the center of gravity of her party. Mr. Obama has set the tone and the pace for the Democrats, and he has the advantage of having been clearly antiwar from the beginning. I suspect that almost all Democrat aspirants will end up imitating him. Why won't Mrs. Clinton capitulate to Democratic orthodoxy that the war was always a "mistake"? Out of pride, of course: Hillary Clinton doesn't make mistakes. Only other people do, and especially George Bush.

Senate Democrats are also making sure that no real debate will be held in that body. But, in a certain material sense, the Senate has already approved the administration's enhanced strategy in the war by confirming Gen. David Petraeus's appointment as the U.S. commander in Iraq. Whose strategy do the Democrats imagine our soldiers will be following? If they didn't want this strategy and they didn't want to continue the war, they should have turned him down. That would have been a real message, and a true one.

But the Democrats want it both ways. One of the tropes of many Democratic critics of the war is that, in going to war in Iraq, we squandered our near-victory in Afghanistan. The defeat of the Taliban was actually exhilarating, what with women out in the streets with normal clothes they wanted to wear and children even playing musical instruments. But the enthusiasm of the Democrat Party for Afghanistan is rooted in the fact that Afghanistan is not a strategic asset for the West. It is only a moral triumph. The Democrats prefer to look away from the colder long-term calculations of American and Western interests in the Middle East. We need more than moral triumphs there. We need strategic triumphs. If Iraq turns out not to be the latter sort of triumph, it will be remembered as one of the most momentous blunders in our history.

I think the odds against us are huge. One reason is that Iraq is neither a state that coheres nor a society that coheres. Its civil society, if that is what it is, is not quite a civilized society. The carnage between Shia and Sunni, and the carnage among other religious and ethnic communions, since the end of Ottoman rule have left deep and bloodied breaches in Iraq. If these cannot be repaired, it will be a huge defeat for George Bush -- and, whatever many liberals think of it, for liberalism as well.

Out Of Stricken Baghdad, Into Uncertainty (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

AMMAN, JORDAN

A mortar tumbled out of the sky and onto the Baghdad elementary school. Two of their three children were inside. The girls escaped, panicked but unharmed. Parents Mayada and Ali Hussein al-Obeidy decided enough was enough. They were getting out of Iraq.

That was six months ago. Since fleeing Adamiyah, a once middle-class area turned nightmare-zone even by Baghdad standards, the Obeidy family has taken shelter in Amman, Jordan. They spend days waiting. Like most Iraqis here, they aren't allowed to work and haven't been able to renew their temporary residency permits that expired months ago.

But they consider themselves fortunate: At least the children are safe and in school. The Jordanian government has said this is the last year it will allow Iraqis to send their children to class. With anywhere from 700,000 to 1 million Iraqi refugees pushing Jordan's already-stretched public services to bursting, the Iraqi presence in Jordan has become – in the words last month of the chief government spokesman – "a burden."

On the wall of their apartment are snapshots of the Obeidy's relatives, some living halfway around the world in Texas. There, the Obeidys have a slew of relatives. Mayada's older brother and mother, both citizens of the US, live in El Paso. They have been trying for several years – and recently, with great intensity – to get her and another brother in Amman to join the rest of the family in America.

They haven't been successful and they are not alone. Only 202 Iraqis were permitted to take refuge in the US in 2006. Since the US-led invasion, 466 Iraqis have been allowed entry to the US as refugees, according to figures given by the State Department at a Senate hearing last month. The numbers are particularly stark in comparison with the scope of a burgeoning refugee problem.

The UN High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that there are some 2 million Iraqi refugees, most in the region, with the numbers in Jordan rivaled only by those in Syria. Add to that number another 1.8 million Iraqis who are internally displaced. During the first half of 2006, the UN says, Iraqis became the largest asylum-seeking nationality in Europe.

US policymakers are gradually waking up to the reality of the scale of the refugee crisis caused by the war, and the likelihood that the numbers of people seeking a haven will increase. Under growing international pressure to do more, this week Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced a task force to enable more refugees to come to the US. The Bush administration this week said it would allow about 7,000 Iraqis into the US this year.

But to the Obeidys, change feels far off. Despite having immediate family members in the US keen to sponsor them, they've made no progress on their two-year attempt to come to America. Mayada's brother, Mustafa Ali, reached at his home in El Paso, said that he was told by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) that the process could take five to eight years.

"For some reason, no one wants Iraqis in their countries," says Mr. Ali. "We've been suffering long enough. We were hoping we'd get a better life. The INS should process the Iraqi applications more quickly, because their situation is different from any other country. [The US] could make a special effort and arrangement, couldn't they?"

Adjusting to life in limbo

It's getting close to noon on a recent chilly February day at the residency office in Amman, a place through which any foreigner seeking permission to stay in Jordan must pass. Mayada and Ali Hussein are leaving after a long morning in which they, along with hundreds of other Iraqis, sought help in extending their residency permits. Hundreds of thousands (numbers are difficult to pinpoint) are now in Jordan illegally, fearing expulsion.

"The residency office isn't giving us an answer. Not 'yes' and not 'no,' " says Mayada. She looks down at the notepad of the reporter who has come to speak to her and, seeing that her name was misheard as "May," she begins to well up with tears. May was the name of her sister, who was killed when Baghdad was under bombardment by the US military four years ago next month.

Her husband's face locks up, he looks away. So many people have it worse than they do, he says. They are the fortunate ones. They're out. They and the throngs of Iraqi couples walking up and down the hill, looking for solutions.

Jordanians imagine them to be rich. Some are comfortable, but more typical are people like the Obeidys, who were both longtime schoolteachers. She taught primary school, he taught math. He's supposed to be getting an Iraqi pension now. He can't work here, and their money is quickly disappearing.

"If they see you working illegally, they'll throw you out," Ali Hussein says. "We just want to assure our survival. I'm ready to pay to stay here, if they would let us."

"We're spending our savings and we don't know how long it will last," he says. "We don't blame the Jordanians – they don't have so much money. But why doesn't the world help the Jordanians so we can survive?"

When they arrived, Mayada went to the UNHCR and registered as a refugee. However, unless she can prove they are specifically targeted for violence, it's unlikely they'll meet the current standards for asylum here or in most Western countries.

She displays the card, which has yet to be of much use to the family, and shrugs. "Does America not know how terrible things are for us?" She asks the question with a quiet calm, as if genuinely unsure of whether people in the US are aware of the scale of the carnage in Iraq. "Why are we allowed to come only to Jordan and Syria? Our situation is just getting worse. If we go back, we will be killed."

In Baghdad they knew several other middle-class families whose children had been kidnapped. They were sure it would happen to them sooner or later.

Before leaving, they invited a poor family who'd been living in a slum to come and stay in their home. Few would pay rent for a home in Adamiyah. And if the Obeidys left the place empty, it would be sure to be taken over by squatters or militant groups.

So began the dynamics of becoming a reluctant refugee: handing over the keys to your house in the hope that one day, they'll be returned in peace. You make a choice: your belongings or your very being. When you leave this way, you really never know when you are coming home again.

The Iraq effect in Jordan

It's afternoon in Jebel Hussein, a busy part of Amman that is so heavily populated with Iraqis that Baghdad-accented Arabic dominates the streets.

Jordanians complain that the influx of Iraqis has driven up real estate prices and the cost of living in general, making it harder to find affordable apartments. At the other end of this resentment, Amman society is buzzing with chatter about the crime rate going up due to the Iraqi refugee population. In the Iraqis' defense, one Jordanian analyst pointed to the fact that Iraqis here are economically trapped: They can spend but they can't earn. Many are getting desperate, and in such circumstances, it wouldn't be surprising for them move into the black market or find other ways to survive.

All of that is to say nothing of the fear that the Sunni-Shiite conflict could spill over into Jordan.

DOJ_NMG_0132802

Newspapers reported that Shiites here might want to build a Shiite mosque, drawing ire from several Islamic leaders in Jordan, which has always been an almost exclusively Sunni nation.

The Obeidys, who are Sunnis, dislike even talking about the sectarian divide, which they prefer to leave behind. Before 2003 and today, they say, they've always simply been Muslims.

At home, Mayada and Ali Hussein are in a much smaller apartment than the home they had in Baghdad. They spend a lot of time watching TV and then calling people back home to make sure they are OK.

"You hear the news and we know we have friends and family there," says Mayada. "It's in your head all the time. It's not like you take everyone you know out with you. Things are shaky. We're not sure of anything now. Mortars fell yesterday right on the area we lived in."

Five days earlier, a mortar landed on a school just like the one their daughters went to, killing five girls.

The children are confused, unsure of where they'll be attending school next year. The adjustment was rough at first. Other children made fun of their Iraqi accents, but soon enough, they caught to the new dialect. Jordan is a hospitable country. Still, Jordan is not home.

And where is that? The children can't decide. They sit, quiet, and well-behaved, watching "The Biggest Loser," a US reality show about obese Americans competing to lose weight.

What should the family do now? Each child has a different answer.

"Stay here," says Nur, 9.

"Go back to Iraq," answers Mustafa, her fraternal twin brother.

"To America," declares Shams, 13 and slender, and stares back at the TV.

My War Away From War (NYT)

By Ayub Nuri

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

I WILL always remember last Aug. 13 as one of the best days of my life. On that day, after 47 days of waiting, and just four days before classes were to begin at Columbia, where I had received a scholarship, I was granted an American visa. Not only would I be able to fulfill my dream of studying in the United States, but I would also find some peace.

I am an Iraqi, and although I love my country, I needed to get out. I thought the 13-hour flight and the oceans would distance me from the tragic reality of the war. But on my first day in New York, I realized that I had not left the war. Rather, it had followed me here, and I had to fight it every day.

Every time I talked to someone at a party, in a taxi or at the store, the same chain of questions would follow after I said I was from Iraq. Some people gaped. Others sat silent for a second, then shook my hand differently. “Wow, so interesting,” they would say. “So what do you think of the whole situation? What went wrong over there?” Finally, the inevitable: “Do you think we should pull out?”

At school happy hours, while everyone was socializing and enjoying their drinks, I found myself having to explain the insurgency, the sectarian violence and what I thought would happen if American troops withdrew from Iraq. That was the question that troubled me most.

To me, it sounded like a question that only the defense secretary should be contemplating. Did people here feel entitled to ask it because they had voted for this government, and they therefore felt responsible for their government’s policies? I decided to think this was the reason, and it consoled me.

Soon, there was another question that began to trouble me. It mostly came from Arabs or other Muslims I encountered. “Who is behind these killings?” they would ask.

“It is difficult to point to a specific group,” I would tell them. “But most of the killings are perpetrated by Iraqis themselves, Shiites and Sunnis. I have witnessed it with my own eyes.”

But they were never satisfied with my answers. Most of them blamed America for everything. I agree that the American army is part of the problem, but Iraqi militias are now responsible for most of the killings.

DOJ_NMG_0132803

Explaining the complexity of the situation in Iraq to everyone I met made me tired, and after a while I did not enjoy meeting people anymore. I stopped going to happy hour. I wished I could have a conversation about a different subject — American history or the American electoral system — but it rarely happened.

I realize now that there simply is no way for me to escape the bitterness of this war. It has become part of my life. One night, after a dinner party with some classmates, I turned on my computer to read my e-mail messages. The first message I opened was from Iraq. It carried the news of the death of a dear friend of mine. He was killed by a car bomb in Baghdad. I cried most of the night. A few days later I erased his e-mail address from my address book.

A month later, my phone rang very early in the morning. The voice on the other end told me that another close friend — a reporter in Ramadi — was killed while covering a story in Baghdad. I mourned alone in my apartment.

I slept very well my first two nights in New York and had no dreams, but I think it was because of the jetlag. The rest of my nights have been full of dreams and nightmares.

In one dream I am stuck in Falluja and I can't get out. I am on the ledge of a high wall that separates the American soldiers from insurgents. They both see me and are ready to shoot.

In another dream I am kidnapped by the Iraqi Army and thrown into a dungeon with a foreign reporter. In yet another, I go to Baghdad and find the streets empty. There are only roofless houses and ruined walls.

When I wake up, I remember that I am in New York City, and I feel at peace. But that little escape from the nightmare of the war does not last long. At some point during the day I will have to give another war lecture. No matter how I perceive the war, no matter how many more friends I lose, no matter who is killing whom, as long as there is a war, I have to live with its nightmares and fight them thousands of miles away.

Marines Honor 100 Who Sacrificed Their Lives (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

CAMP PENDLETON — In a ceremony filled with tears and expressions of pride, 100 members of the Regimental Combat Team 5 killed during the recent deployment in Iraq were remembered Thursday as among "the finest young men our nation has ever produced."

Col. Larry Nicholson, the regiment's commanding officer, said the 100 were part of the "newest greatest generation" who answered their nation's call after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"The fact is that Iraq is a better and safer place because of the services and sacrifices made by the Marines, sailors and soldiers" of the 5th regiment, Nicholson told the hundreds of Marines and dozens of family members assembled for the memorial.

It was a day when the sprawling base was filled with Iraq-related activity: In one area, combat Marines were being trained for deployment; in another, 300 Marines returned from Iraq to a joyous greeting from family members; and, in a courtroom, a sentencing hearing was underway for Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington, who confessed to conspiracy and kidnapping in the death of an unarmed Iraqi man.

The memorial service was held on a parade ground near the headquarters of the regiment, known as the "fighting fifth," the most heavily decorated regiment in the Marine Corps. The 5th was the first unit across the Line of Departure into Iraq when the assault on Baghdad began nearly four years ago; for its latest deployment, it was assigned to Al Anbar Province, the heart of the Sunni insurgency.

Breaking with a Marine tradition that says Marines from the "old corps" were the toughest ever, Nicholson said that Marines of the past "are no match for the caliber of the Marines of today." As their commander, each death was a "numbing" experience, said Nicholson, who was himself severely wounded in a previous deployment to Iraq.

Each of the names was read solemnly, to the accompaniment of a tolling bell. For each name a Marine marched toward a row of inverted rifles and placed a dog tag on them. There were 13 inverted M-16s, each representing a battalion or company that made up the regiment.

The reading of the names took nearly 20 minutes. Among the dead were 91 Marines, 7 soldiers and 2 Navy corpsmen. The most common rank was a Marine lance corporal.

Family members, some of whom had traveled across the country for the ceremony, listened and wept and, when the ceremony was over, talked of their grief but also their pride in their family member's military service.

"I feel our family is broken," said Madeline Buerstetta, mother of Lance Cpl. Richard Allen Buerstetta, 20, killed Oct. 23. "We're missing a part, and the hurt won't stop."

With tears streaming down her cheeks, Buerstetta explained how her son, a reservist, was killed in a roadside bomb explosion that ripped apart his Humvee, also killing another Marine and injuring a third.

"He died doing something he loved," she said. "He was a Marine's Marine."

Buerstetta's father, Paul, a healthcare consultant in Tennessee, said he has trouble coping with the fact that "many people don't seem to realize there is a war going on, that young men are dying for them. Every day is hard."

Some of the 100 were on their second or third tours in Iraq. Others were on their first.

"He was only there 18 days and he was blown up," said K'Ann Hines of Ventura, mother of Lance Cpl. Joshua Hines, 26, killed Oct. 25 by a roadside bomb while on foot patrol.

Hines is survived by his parents, his wife and their son, Rylie, born just eight weeks before Hines was killed. "People should remember my son's smile," his mother said. "He'd do anything for anyone. He even put his life down for his buddies."

During the ceremony, regimental Sgt. Major Melvin Roundtree quoted from John 15:12-13: "This is my commandment: Love one another as I have loved you. There is no greater love than this: To lay down one's life for one's friends."

Lance Cpl. Lucas Bell, 22, still recuperating from a gunshot that shattered his femur, came to show respect for Marines from his unit, a reserve group from the Midwest. He was evacuated after being wounded Dec. 7 and remains on crutches.

"For me, it was the first time I was able to mourn for my brothers," said Bell, his eyes red-rimmed. "It was good to get it off my chest. It was beautiful."

Madeline Buerstetta said she prays daily for the Marines still in Iraq.

"They're men, but to me they'll always be boys, my boys," she said as her husband tried to comfort her.

A Higher Calling Than Duty (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

"WHY I joined: The question has been asked of me so many times in so many different contexts that I thought it would be best if I wrote my reasons for joining the Army on my page for all to see."

Oct. 29, 2006. On the night before he deployed to Iraq, Army 2nd Lt. Mark Jennings Daily sat down at his laptop in his Texas apartment and began tapping out an essay for his MySpace Web page. Daily, a 23-year-old Irvine native who considered himself a liberal humanist, had decided to join the fight despite initial doubts about the war.

Before shipping out, he wanted to explain why.

The decision had befuddled some. After all, Daily was a UCLA political science graduate with a wide circle of friends and dreams of becoming a senator, or a history professor, or a foreign correspondent. Why join the Army?

His essay would turn out to be a last testament to one soldier's courage and convictions.

And that essay, in recent weeks, has ricocheted throughout the Internet, taking on a life of its own. It was read on the U.S. Senate floor and posted on the websites of columnists and talk show hosts. It has prompted hundreds of letters from strangers. Daily's words, his astonished parents say, seemed to resonate with all kinds of folks, stirring a common altruistic impulse.

He wrote it in just 20 minutes, his parents say, as he chatted with his family in his packed-up El Paso apartment near Ft. Bliss, Texas, where he was assigned to the 2nd Squadron, 7th Cavalry Regiment, 4th Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division.

"First, the more accurate question is why I volunteered to go to Iraq. After all, I joined the Army a week after we declared war on Saddam's government with the intention of going…. "

Daily's parents, John and Linda Daily of Irvine, didn't particularly want to see their eldest son ship out to Iraq. They would never tell him that directly. They respected their children too much to try to interfere.

"If not me, then who?" Linda Daily remembers her son asking, his earnest eyes leaving her with no good answer.

So the Dailys did what they believed parents should do: They embraced their son, affirmed his decision and sent him off, shielding as best they could their fears and doubts. His wife of just three months, Janet, did the same.

"Anyone who knew me before I joined knows that I am quite aware and at times sympathetic to the arguments against the war in Iraq. If you think the only way a person could bring themselves to volunteer for this war is through sheer desperation or blind obedience then consider me the exception."

Mark Daily, born on the Fourth of July, grew up in Irvine's Woodbridge Village, on a street of spacious homes and well-manicured lawns. His father, John, is an aerospace project manager; his mother, Linda, an audiologist.

His family says he became a registered Democrat who read voraciously and delighted in fervent debate. He read liberal intellectual Noam Chomsky, conservative Sen. John McCain of Arizona and everything in between.

His first passions were animal rights and environmental protection, prompting him to become a vegetarian and Green Party member in high school for a few years. He defended American Indian rights so loudly in one backyard debate that Linda Daily imagined the neighbors would think it a family brawl. His heroes were immigrants because "they risk their lives to achieve better ones," he wrote on his MySpace page.

Fascism and anti-Semitism particularly troubled him. If you really want to understand me, he wrote on MySpace, watch "Schindler's List."

He sought out neo-Nazis for online debates. In a string of e-mails, Daily invited one young man who featured swastikas on his MySpace page to explain his sentiments. After a wide-ranging discussion over German history, the Holocaust, African DNA, North Korean fascism and democratic values, Daily turned the Nazi lover around. "I think most certainly a lot, if not all of my beliefs have changed," the young man wrote. Daily, he said, was right. "Nothing was ever created with a system of hate."

After the 9/11 attacks, Daily was not convinced that a military response was the best option. In his MySpace essay, he runs through the gamut of reasons he used at one time or another to argue against confronting the Taliban and Saddam Hussein: cultural tolerance, the sanctity of national sovereignty, a suspicion of America's intentions. Weren't we really after their oil? he wondered.

Somewhere along the way, he changed his mind. His family says there was no epiphany. Writings by author and columnist Christopher Hitchens on the moral case for war deeply influenced him. A 2003 phone conversation with a UCLA ROTC officer on the ideals of commitment and service impressed him.

Ultimately, his family says, Daily came to believe that his lifelong altruistic impulses and passions for the underdog had to extend to Iraqis crushed under decades of oppression. It was time to stop simply talking about human rights and actually do something to help secure them.

And he decided that joining the Army was the best way to do that.

One thing is certain, as disagreeable or as confusing as my decision to enter the fray may be, consider what peace vigils against genocide have accomplished lately. Consider that there are 19-year-old soldiers from the Midwest who have never touched a college campus or a protest who have done more to uphold the universal legitimacy of representative government and individual rights by placing themselves between Iraqi voting lines and homicidal religious fanatics. Oftentimes it is less about how clean your actions are and more about how pure your intentions are.

Daily had read historian Stephen Ambrose's writings on World War II and the generation of soldiers who fought for freedom from the forces of fascism. If not Iraq, Daily thought, he wanted to help save those being slaughtered in Sudan.

In the fall of 2003, he entered the UCLA ROTC program. The UCLA military science faculty selected Daily as cadet of the year for 2005. He was named a Distinguished Military Graduate, an honor given to 20% of cadets nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0132806

Lt. Col. Shawn Buck, who headed the UCLA military science department at the time, said Daily was a deep thinker and natural leader who persuaded many cadets to stick with the program. "Once he made the decision to join, he jumped in with both feet and gave it everything he had," Buck said.

In a 2005 videotape of his officers' commissioning ceremony, Daily told the crowd that the U.S. Army is one of the few militaries in the world that teach not only tactics but also ethics. "I genuinely believe the United States Army is a force of good in this world," he said.

He was not blind to military transgressions and fumed to his father that the abuse of Iraqi prisoners by U.S. soldiers at Abu Ghraib was a failure of leadership. But that was exactly why he needed to get over there, he said. He was going to make sure that his men upheld Army values of integrity and honor.

So that is why I joined. In the time it took you to read this explanation, innocent people your age have suffered under the crushing misery of tyranny.

Don't forget that human beings have a responsibility to one another and that Americans have a responsibility to the oppressed. Assisting a formerly oppressed population in converting their torn society into a plural, democratic one is dangerous and difficult business, especially when being attacked and sabotaged from literally every direction.

So if you have anything to say to me at the end of this reading, let it at least include "Good Luck."

Daily touched down in Iraq on Nov. 19 and was sent to the northern city of Mosul. In calls and e-mails home, he began asking for presents for his new Iraqi friends: cigars for the soldiers, candy and soccer balls for the children. He vividly described his adventures with them: a Thanksgiving Day game of musical chairs, a rooftop cigar session; his first Kurdish meal, his first local haircut.

In one video he sent, Iraqi soldiers surround him with grins, crowning him with a turban as a gesture of friendship.

In typical fashion, he sought out new points of view. In one discussion, he wrote that he asked a Kurdish man whether the insurgents could be viewed as freedom fighters. The man cut him off. "The difference between insurgents and American soldiers," Daily said the man told him, "is that they get paid to take life — to murder — and you get paid to save lives."

"That Kurdish man's assessment of our presence means more to me than all of the naysayers and makeshift humanists that monopolize our interpretation of this war," Daily wrote in a Dec. 31 e-mail.

He was equally expansive with his troops. His wife, Janet, says he was constantly asking for tea bags so he could invite his soldiers to his room for tea and talk. They asked him for advice about careers, finances and family problems, discussed politics and philosophy. His troops jokingly posted a sign on his door: "Mark's Tea Hour."

In January, Daily was transferred from a support operation to a security one. He told his family that if he should die, he would never regret a thing.

In an e-mail to his brother, Eric, Daily wrote: "I know it is hard for you knowing that I am over here in danger, but never forget that I came here on behalf of the countless brothers who were torn apart by the savage exploits of this region's tyrants."

On Jan. 14, the family received another e-mail:

"All is well. More war stories then I can fit in this e-mail. Having the time of my life!"

It was his last e-mail.

The next day, Jan. 15, Daily was killed when a roadside bomb detonated beneath his vehicle in Mosul. Three of his comrades died with him.

But his words have become a living appeal for his most treasured Army value — selfless service — as it rips through the Internet and reaches unimagined audiences.

U.S. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) recently read part of the essay on the Senate floor. It has been posted on the websites of syndicated columnist Michelle Malkin and Los Angeles radio talk show hosts Larry Elder and Hugh Hewitt. It has traveled overseas to places as far-flung as Bulgaria, where it is being translated for publication in the local newspapers.

His family has received official letters of condolence from President Bush, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, California First Lady Maria Shriver, senators, congressmen, judges. Most touching to them are the hundreds and hundreds of heartfelt notes from ordinary folk, most of them strangers, who read Daily's essay and wanted to share how it inspired them to serve others.

DOJ_NMG_0132807

One woman said she had begun volunteering in a children's cancer hospital. Others have donated to Make-A-Wish-Foundation and other charities in Daily's name. Trees have been planted, scholarships planned.

So many people reached out that the family scrapped plans for a 175-person memorial service and moved it to Mariners Church in Irvine instead. More than 1,600 people attended the Jan. 27 service.

The response has filled the Dailys with a strange mix of grief and pain, mingled with gratitude and awe. All of it, his parents muse, affirms Daily's faith in the decency of people and the value of community.

Which doesn't make his loss any easier to bear.

"I'd give it all back a thousandfold," his father says, "just to hug him one more time."

The Forgotten Families (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Her daughter was killed by a bomb in Iraq. Eight months later, Susan Jaenke is both grief-stricken and strapped -- behind on her mortgage, backed up on her bills and shut out of the $100,000 government death benefit that her daughter thought she had left her.

The problem is that Jaenke is not a wife, not a husband, but instead grandmother to the 9-year-old her daughter left behind. "Grandparents," she said, "are forgotten in this."

For the Jaenkes and others like them, the toll of war can be especially complex: They face not only the anguish of losing a son or daughter but also the emotional, legal and financial difficulties of putting the pieces back together for a grandchild.

They confront this without the $100,000 "death gratuity" that military spouses ordinarily get -- a payment intended to ease the financial strain as families await government survivors' benefits.

"It really does get complicated for them," said Joyce Raezer of the National Military Family Association. The load of responsibilities placed on that generation -- both during deployment and if a service member is injured or killed -- "is a huge issue."

The case of Petty Officer 2nd Class Jaime S. Jaenke, a Navy construction-battalion medic killed last June in Anbar province, is particularly striking because she was a single parent who clearly meant to assign her mother the benefit. Jaenke, 29, filled in her mother's name on a form and carefully spelled out her wishes in a letter.

But by law, the $100,000 benefit goes first to a spouse or a child. So 9-year-old Kayla Jaenke collects the $100,000 -- plus $400,000 in life insurance -- after she turns 18, leaving Susan Jaenke to ask, "What about the next nine years?"

In some other families, the $100,000 death benefit has gone to neither the children nor the grandparents who are raising them.

In California, Barbie and Matt Heavrin are caring for a 2-year-old grandson without the death gratuity or life insurance. Their daughter, Pfc. Hannah McKinney, assigned her $400,000 in life insurance to the man she wed just before deployment, her father said; by law, her husband also received the gratuity.

The Heavrins are happy to raise the boy -- from an earlier relationship their daughter had -- but wonder why he would get nothing. Five months after their daughter died last September, their only assistance is monthly benefits they expect will total about $800, most of which goes to day care.

In Missouri, grandmother Gail Kriete is raising 9-year-old Taylor Purdy, the child of Lance Cpl. Erik R. Heldt, a Marine killed in Iraq in June 2005. His wife collected the full $500,000. Kriete said none went to his daughter, from a previous relationship.

"It just needs to be thought out a little more carefully," Kriete said. "There are so many blended families that the suffering is very spread out."

The death gratuity, more than many other benefits, adheres to a strict next-of-kin rule, which Pentagon officials say makes it possible to pay out the $100,000 within a few days. They say that, in the "vast majority of cases," spouses are most in need when paychecks stop.

DOJ_NMG_0132808

But there have been thousands of single parents deployed into combat zones since 2001. How many have died at war is unclear, but the Jaenke case shows that, in those cases, the benefit may be at odds with its original intent: to help the grieving family stay afloat when a service member's income suddenly stops.

Susan Jaenke said her family fell behind shortly after Jaime died -- and has never caught up.

Larry Jaenke is a truck driver, and Susan worked as a letter carrier for 23 years until an accident left her disabled. Their daughter Jaime and granddaughter Kayla lived with them. Susan provided child care when Jaime worked, and Jaime contributed to the family income.

Jaime's passion for horses led the Jaenkes to start a business with her on their 10-acre Iowa property. When Susan Jaenke got an insurance settlement from her accident, she put much of it toward building a horse stable on the property, which was Jaime's dream. Jaime -- energetic and skilled with power tools -- did the drywall and flooring.

Not long afterward, Jaime -- a reservist who was an emergency medical technician in her civilian life -- went to war.Unable to Make Ends Meet

It was a June afternoon last year, and the Jaenkes were returning from Kayla's softball game. She had made her team's only hit -- and her first hit ever. In a celebratory mood, they stopped to buy ice cream.

When they pulled into their driveway, the scene was one that no parent of a deployed soldier wants to see: two uniformed Navy men, waiting.

They soon learned that a roadside bomb had exploded near Jaime's Humvee, killing her and a fellow Seabee.

At the funeral, Kayla stood solemn next to her mother's flag-draped casket, the folded flag laid into her small arms.

Then came the dawning of the family's new reality -- the emotional, the practical, the financial.

There was a lawyer to hire to get legal guardianship. There were survivors' benefits to apply for. There was a trust to set up. There was health insurance to obtain for Kayla. Inexplicably, there was no official will left behind.

For the Jaenkes, the trouble was not that raising Kayla is so expensive but that their entire financial picture shifted with Jaime's death. Jaime's checks immediately stopped. Larry Jaenke was out of work for a time. The family paid $2,800 for a handsome headstone. The stable was still losing money.

Last fall, Susan Jaenke watched as Jaime's pickup truck, and then her car, were repossessed.

The family scraped by, thanks to acts of kindness, Susan Jaenke said. When the Jaenkes' dryer broke, nearby Seabee units stepped up to replace it. The Seabees have come three times to do finishing work on the stable, which Susan Jaenke says she will not give up. Kayla is there all the time, she said, and giving it up would be like losing what is left of Jaime.

The local Veterans of Foreign Wars gave the family a $1,000 Target gift card, which she said made the family's Christmas.

Since October, the Jaenke family has been collecting monthly government benefits for Kayla's care -- $1,700 in all -- but not enough to replace Jaime's contributions. From Iraq, she had been sending home $3,200 a month, her mother said. The child's father, long estranged, does not pay child support, Susan Jaenke said.

The Jaenkes can request money from Kayla's trust for certain expenses related to the girl's "health, education, maintenance and welfare," but the process involves lawyers and court appearances. The court recently agreed to a $200 monthly stipend for the family.

"The court is just very conservative here in Iowa," said Mona Bowden, an attorney for the Jaenkes.Clear Wishes, Clear Rules

Every now and then, Susan Jaenke rereads the letter that Jaime left behind for her:

"I have got all my paperwork done and here is what I did. My big policy [$400,000] goes to Kayla. That has to be put away for when she gets 18. You will know what to do and how to handle it. There is a smaller policy that goes to you. That is for 100,000. That is for you to raise Kayla with and 25,000 goes to the barn. . . . I can't wait to get home to my girl and my horses, so you had better take care of them all."

Patrick J. Palmersheim, executive director of the Iowa Department of Veterans Affairs, explained that the problem came down to the fine print on death gratuities. Jaime had written in her mother's name as beneficiary, but in the same blank the form said "No spouse or child surviving."

Susan Jaenke could be awarded the benefit only if there were no spouse or child to receive it.

The tight regulations are meant to guard against fraud and abuse, said Chief Petty Officer Randy Erdman, the Navy casualty assistance officer who has worked closely with the Jaenke family. "I see the need for the money going to the right spot and being protected," he said, "but at the same time I see what the family needs."

In Washington, Lt. Tommy Crosby, a Navy spokesman, said the Navy "recognizes the significant loss the family has suffered" and has done all it can, within the law, to help.

The death gratuity, created in 1908, originally was equal to six months' pay and was intended to ease financial burdens after a military death.

During the war in Iraq, the gratuity was increased markedly; it had been at $6,000, then grew to $12,000 and finally $100,000. Lawmakers had said the original award seemed offensively low, especially in contrast to the large settlements awarded to families of those killed in the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Still, there was little rethinking about beneficiaries for the $100,000 gratuity, several experts said. To troops, the large lump sum came to resemble life insurance, said Raezer, chief operating officer of the National Military Family Association.

Jaime's handwritten letter and possibly her form suggest she did not realize the gratuity could not go to her mother.

Whether that is because she misunderstood what was said during a benefits briefing or was not advised well is unclear. "They don't always get that kind of counseling that they need," Raezer said.

The problem could have been avoided altogether if Jaime had directed part of her life insurance money, rather than the death gratuity, to her parents.

Steve Strobridge, government relations director of the Military Officers Association of America, said Jaenke's case suggests that the regulations should be reexamined.

"We certainly need to look at whether there needs to be some additional flexibility in who the member can assign the death gratuity to and whether we need to adjust the counseling requirements to help protect people from unintended consequences," he said.

In her three-bedroom house in Iowa, Susan Jaenke said she has been reduced to worrying about grocery money and dreading calls from creditors. "It just hurts bad in so many different directions," she said. "My girl was supposed to come back."

Some days, the whole episode overwhelms her. Three of her four children have served in the Navy, and she said she considers herself "a flag waver." But she gets angry that her daughter's wishes are not being honored and that the family now struggles.

"It's not bad enough that I lost my daughter," she said. "What else do they want me to lose?"

Post Offices Honor Troops (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya And Monica Hortobagyi

USA Today, February 16, 2007

Federal lawmakers are increasingly naming post offices in their states after troops killed in combat, a tribute traditionally reserved for former members of Congress and famous figures such as Bob Hope and Ronald Reagan.

Since 2003, the gesture has honored 26 servicemembers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan: 17 soldiers, seven Marines, a Navy SEAL and an Air National Guardsman.

They include Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul Smith and Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham, both posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor for gallantry in Iraq.

A mail center in Thomaston, Ga., will be renamed in a ceremony in April for hometown postal worker Robert Lee "Bobby" Hollar Jr. He was killed in Iraq by a roadside bomb in 2005 while serving with the Georgia National Guard. "I was ecstatic," says his widow, Amanda Hollar. "He was modest. He didn't like to brag. He didn't expect credit and recognition. … He would really be honored."

Laws naming post offices are the most common U.S. legislation, according to a 2005 Congressional Research Service study.

The 108th Congress (2003-2004) passed 89 such bills — eight that honored troops. The 109th Congress (2005-2006) passed 98 bills — 17 that honored fallen soldiers or Marines. One of the bills honored two servicemembers. Four bills are pending in the current Congress.

"It just seems to be a great way to honor our fallen soldiers back home where people have known them," says Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, R-Fla., who sponsored two of the laws. "I always give the family time to grieve. At about anywhere from three- to eight-, nine-month period, I will ask them if they believe it would be appropriate to have a post office named after their loved one."

Postal Service guidelines require that a person be deceased for at least 10 years before his or her name is placed on a post office. Congress has ignored the restriction for decades, the Research Service study says.

The laws are easy, inexpensive gestures, the report says.

The name on the outside of the building — commonly a geographical designation — is usually unaffected, says Postal Service spokeswoman Yvonne Yoerger.

The only practical difference is the posting of a plaque explaining the honorary name change in the post office lobby, Yoerger says. Each plaque measures 11 by 14 inches and costs the Postal Service $250 to $500.

Democrats and Republicans alike push the bills.

DOJ:

White House Is Reported To Be Linked To A Dismissal (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — A United States attorney in Arkansas who was dismissed from his job last year by the Justice Department was ousted after Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, intervened on behalf of the man who replaced him, according to Congressional aides briefed on the matter.

Ms. Miers, the aides said, phoned an aide to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales suggesting the appointment of J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to Karl Rove, the White House political adviser.

Later, the incumbent United States attorney, H. E. Cummins III, was removed without explanation and replaced on an interim basis by Mr. Griffin. Officials at the White House and Justice Department declined to comment on Ms. Miers's role in the matter.

Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a hearing last week that Mr. Cummins had done nothing wrong but was removed to make room for Mr. Griffin. It was not known at the time Mr. McNulty testified that Ms. Miers had intervened on Mr. Griffin's behalf.

Her involvement was disclosed on Wednesday by Justice Department officials led by Mr. McNulty, who held a closed-door briefing for senators on the Judiciary Committee after Democrats criticized the dismissals of 7 to 10 United States attorneys as politically motivated.

Ms. Miers, whose resignation as White House counsel was effective Jan. 31, could not be reached for comment Thursday.

At the briefing, Justice Department officials denied that the White House had been involved in any of the other dismissals, suggesting that the department had acted on its own after advising the White House of its intention to remove incumbents.

Democrats have said the removals represented an effort to make room for rising political favorites of the Bush administration and to be rid of independent-minded prosecutors, all of whom had been appointed by President Bush.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said that he was not satisfied by the Justice Department's explanations at the briefing.

"Yesterday's briefing by the deputy attorney general did little to alleviate our concerns that politics was involved and, in fact, raised those concerns," Mr. Schumer said. "Some may have been fired for political reasons because they may have not done what Justice Department wanted them to do."

DOJ_NMG_0132811

Justice Department officials have said that because United States attorneys are presidential appointees they may be replaced at any time without a specific reason, although they have said that none were removed for pursuing politically sensitive cases.

Another United States attorney asked to resign was Carol C. Lam of San Diego, who departed on Thursday at the request of the Justice Department. Two days earlier, Ms. Lam announced two indictments, including one against a former high-ranking Central Intelligence Agency official, in a corruption inquiry that began with last year's guilty plea by a former Republican representative, Randy Cunningham, who was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Karen P. Hewitt, an assistant in Ms. Lam's office, was named Thursday to serve as the interim United States attorney in the Southern District, while Scott N. Schools, a general counsel in the Justice Department, will fill the interim role in the Northern District, in San Francisco.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said in a statement on the Senate floor Thursday that Ms. Lam had been dismissed despite a strong record of prosecutions.

"Ms. Lam has had a distinguished career, and she served the southern district of San Diego well and everyone in that district knows that," Ms. Feinstein said. "I regret that main Justice does not. I am quite disappointed that main Justice chose to remove her, especially given the ongoing work in which the office is involved."

Republicans Block Bill To Curb Justice Department's Power Over Prosecutors (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, The Associated Press

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans blocked a bill Thursday that would curb the Justice Department's power to fire and replace federal prosecutors. Democrats had sought to give the courts a role in the appointments of U.S. attorneys, to GOP opposition.

The objection by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., to the proposal was long anticipated. So Democrats used the occasion to complain anew about the firings of at least seven prosecutors, including John McKay in Seattle, under a little-known part of the Patriot Act.

Democrats say Attorney General Alberto Gonzales used the law to get around the Senate confirmation process and install Republican allies.

"I believe that their intent was to bring in people from the outside to give some of their bright people an opportunity," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "That is wrong."

Her bill says a replacement U.S. attorney could serve no longer than 120 days without confirmation. After that time, an interim replacement would be named by a U.S. District Court.

Gonzales, Kyl and other Republicans say this approach could lead prosecutors to be appointed for reasons other than their qualifications.

Republican and Democratic leaders tried for a compromise that might lengthen the 120-day period or curb a district court's appointment power, but those efforts were abandoned early Thursday, according to officials on both sides.

A private briefing Wednesday night by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty did not change any Democrats' minds about the firings of the prosecutors, senators said.

Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., said that if the Justice Department does not provide detailed performance reports on the fired prosecutors, the Senate Judiciary Committee would subpoena them.

"I am not satisfied with the answers we've gotten. There are just too many holes in too many different places," Schumer said.

Newly empowered Democrats are seeking to curb what they say is the Bush administration's virtually unchecked power during the years of GOP congressional control. Yet the version of the Patriot Act that contains the disputed provision passed overwhelmingly last year with bipartisan support.

Senators from both parties, including the Republican author of the law, say they were unaware of the way the Justice Department might use that rule.

Gonzales has said that he intends to submit the name of every newly installed prosecutor to the Senate for confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0132812

Democrats contend that prosecutors were forced to resign to make way for Republicans' political allies and that the White House slipped the provision into the Patriot Act to permit such indefinite appointments.

Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president, subject to Senate confirmation. U.S. attorneys can be fired for any reason or no reason at all.

Was McKay Ousted Over 2004 Election? (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, February 16, 2007

Two months after John McKay was fired as U.S. attorney for the Western District of Washington, the reason for his dismissal remains a mystery.

One of the most persistent rumors in Seattle legal circles is that the Justice Department forced McKay, a Republican, to resign to appease Washington state Republicans angry over the 2004 governor's race. Some believe McKay's dismissal was retribution for his failure to convene a federal grand jury to investigate allegations of voter fraud in the race.

McKay was appointed by President Bush in October 2001.

The Evergreen Freedom Foundation filed a formal complaint with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in 2005 about what it considered McKay's lax oversight of the election, in which Democratic Gov. Christine Gregoire defeated Republican Dino Rossi by 129 votes. Many influential Republicans publicly criticized McKay.

But a Justice Department official on Thursday rejected the idea and said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty has repeatedly insisted politics did not influence the controversial firings of McKay and six other U.S. attorneys in December.

McNulty had previously said the firings were "performance-related" despite the fact McKay received a positive evaluation seven months before he was fired.

McKay said he was not given a reason when he was asked to step down.

McNulty defended the dismissals during private briefings with a handful of senators Wednesday.

Democrats were not mollified.

"There was nothing that was said to me ... that I found was a credible reason for dismissing" McKay, said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash.

Murray said McNulty did not detail what was lacking in McKay's work.

"They gave some general things, alluded to things, but gave me nothing specific," she said.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., also said McNulty wasn't telling the whole story.

"I am not satisfied with the answers we've gotten. There are just too many holes in too many different places," he said.

The Justice Department official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, accused Democrats of mischaracterizing the briefings because they didn't agree with the department's conclusions.

"Any suggestion that we were not thorough or forthcoming is just political gamesmanship," the official said.

Senate Republicans blocked a bill Thursday that would curb the Justice Department's power to fire and replace federal prosecutors. Democrats had sought to give the courts a role in the appointments of U.S. attorneys.

Democrats believe the White House was trying to use a new provision in the Patriot Act to get around the Senate confirmation process and install Republican allies as U.S. attorneys.

McKay has always had strong support among moderate Republicans such as King County Prosecutor Norm Maleng, who spoke out on his behalf earlier this month.

But many conservative Republicans have been incensed with McKay since the 2004 governor's race.

Tom McCabe, executive vice president of the Building Industry Association of Washington, summarized the complaints in a BIAW newsletter after McKay announced in December he was stepping down.

In a column titled "Good Riddance," McCabe said McKay "had a disastrous six years as U.S. Attorney. Two years ago, he steadfastly refused to investigate voter fraud despite overwhelming evidence." McCabe also said he had "urged the President to fire McKay."

McCabe could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Republicans argued that illegal votes by felons and others, and errors in the election count, cost Rossi the race.

Emily Langlie, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle, said that in 2004 and 2005 prosecutors and the FBI jointly monitored the election.

"We not only had senior people within our office coordinating our investigation, but we worked jointly with the Department of Justice's Public Integrity section," she said.

Diane Tebelius, who was chairwoman of the Washington State Republican Party when McKay was asked to step down, acknowledged that many Republicans had been upset with McKay after the 2004 election.

But Tebelius said no one from the Justice Department or the White House contacted her about McKay in the months before he was dismissed, and she doubts anyone lobbied for his ouster because of the 2004 race.

"I do not believe anybody in this state would have asked for his resignation," Tebelius said.

Justice Department Names Interim U.S. Attorneys For San Diego, SF (AP)

By Allison Hoffman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

The Justice Department announced temporary replacements Thursday for two recently ousted U.S. attorneys in San Diego and San Francisco.

Outgoing San Diego chief federal prosecutor Carol Lam will be succeeded by Karen Hewitt, a career federal prosecutor who is currently the executive assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California.

In San Francisco, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will be replaced by Scott Schools, a career federal prosecutor who currently works for the Justice Department overseeing legal guidance and personnel matters for all 94 U.S. attorney's offices across the country.

Hewitt's appointment was announced as staff and local law enforcement personnel gathered for a simple office farewell party just hours before Lam was due to leave her post. Ryan was scheduled to depart on Friday.

Both Hewitt and Schools will serve on an interim basis until new U.S. attorneys are nominated by the White House and confirmed by the Senate.

Lam and Ryan were among more than seven federal prosecutors recently fired, some without cause, by the attorney general under, under a little-known part of the Patriot Act.

Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president, subject to Senate confirmation.

Democrats contend that prosecutors were forced to resign to make way for Republicans' political allies and that the White House slipped the provision into the Patriot Act to permit such indefinite appointments.

Lam's dismissal, in particular, prompted criticism from Democrats who questioned whether her departure was linked to the prosecution by her office of disgraced former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican who is currently serving more than eight years in federal prison after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

On Tuesday, Lam's office won a pair of long-awaited indictments against a former top CIA official and a defense contractor implicated Cunningham case.

Also on Thursday, San Diego-based wireless technology giant Qualcomm, Inc., announced that Lam will join its legal department as senior vice president and legal counsel starting on Feb. 26.

The chip maker is currently embroiled in a global web of lawsuits with Nokia Corp. and other major equipment makers claiming that Qualcomm levies unjust, inflated licensing fees to use its patented technologies in their products. Regulators in Europe, South Korea and Japan are probing Qualcomm's business practices as the company trades lawsuits with rivals across the U.S. and Europe.

"From our perspective, she's the ideal person," said Louis Lupin, Qualcomm's general counsel. "She's got experience managing large and very complex cases and a very large staff, and she'll be involved on a global basis."

Hewitt Named To Fill In For U.S. Attorney Lam (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 16, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Karen P. Hewitt, third-in-command at the San Diego U.S. Attorney's office, has been chosen by Justice Department officials to replace outgoing top prosecutor Carol Lam on a temporary basis while a committee searches for a permanent candidate.

Hewitt joined the San Diego office in 2000 and prosecuted civil fraud cases before she was appointed Executive Assistant U.S. attorney a year ago.

Senate Republicans block bill to curb Justice power over U.S. attys

Before coming to San Diego, she was a lawyer in the Justice Department's civil division in Washington, where she specialized in constitutional law and civil rights cases for about eight years.

Thursday is Lam's last day.

Justice Department officials asked her to step down because of declining prosecutions of immigration-related cases. Critics contend Lam's ouster was politically-motivated because of her pursuit of corrupt public officials like ex-Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

NEW: Interim U.S. Attorney Named To Succeed Ryan (OAKTRIB)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Oakland Tribune, February 16, 2007

The Justice Department named an interim replacement today for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who'll spend his last day as Northern California's top federal prosecutor Friday.

Ryan was one seven U.S. Attorneys across the nation who recently resigned or were forced out by the Bush Administration. U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., spoke today on the Senate floor in favor of a bill protecting her chamber's constitutional power to confirm those appointed to these jobs.

The interim U.S. Attorney for this region -- including coastal counties and a few inland counties from Monterey Bay to the Oregon border -- will be Scott Schools, who has been general counsel to the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys. That Washington, D.C.-based agency provides legal guidance in ethics and employee matters to federal prosecutors' offices from coast to coast.

From 2001 to 2005, Schools was First Assistant U.S. Attorney in South Carolina, overseeing about 125 attorneys and support staff; before that, he'd served as interim U.S. Attorney there for nine months. He was a prosecutor in that office from 1989 to 1992 and from 1997 to 2001; between those periods, he was in private practice. Schools holds a mathematics degree from Duke University and a law degree from the University of Texas.

U.S. Attorneys typically have been appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate, but under a provision inserted in the USA Patriot Act at its reauthorization last year, the Attorney General now can name interim replacements to fill vacancies indefinitely without confirmation.

Seven recent vacancies in rapid succession raised concerns on Capitol Hill that the Bush Administration was making politically motivated choices; Senate hearings ensued.

A bill approved today by the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which Feinstein sits, would restore the old process. The Attorney General would be able to name an interim U.S. Attorney for no more than 120 days; if the president hasn't nominated someone for permanent appointment and had that person confirmed when that period ends, that district's federal court judges would then be empowered to pick an interim U.S. Attorney.

Ryan, formerly a San Francisco Superior Court judge, served four and a half years as Northern California's U.S. Attorney, supervising a staff of more than 200, including 115 prosecutors, and an annual budget of about $25 million.

His tenure included high-profile prosecutions such as the BALCO sports-doping case; aggressive gang prosecutions; convicting former Ukrainian Prime Minister Pavel Lazarenko on extortion and money laundering charges; and several crackdowns on counterfeit and pirated music, software and videos. His time also was marked, however, by reports of massive employee turnover and low morale.

U.S. ATTY. RYAN LEAVING, INTERIM REPLACEMENT NAMED (KPIX)

KPIX-TV, CBS 5, San Francisco, February 16, 2007

United States Attorney Kevin Ryan announced this afternoon that Friday will be his last day on the job, and the Justice Department simultaneously named a former South Carolina federal prosecutor as his interim replacement.

Ryan had announced last month that he was stepping down after more than four years heading the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, which encompasses 14 coastal and Bay Area counties stretching from Big Sur to the Oregon border.

"I am grateful to have had the opportunity to serve as the United States Attorney. I sincerely thank all of the staff at the office for their hard work to make our community a safer place to live. I also thank all of our partners in law enforcement who have put in countless hours in investigating and prosecuting crimes in Northern California," Ryan said in a statement.

Ryan's interim replacement will be Scott Schools, who currently works for at the Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C. From 1989 until 2005, with a five year break between 1992 and 1997, he worked as a federal prosecutor in the United States Attorney's Office for the District of South Carolina serving as interim U.S. Attorney there for 10 months in 2001. He was in private practice in Charleston, South Carolina from 1992-1997. He graduated from Duke University and the University of Texas School of Law.

A permanent replacement for Ryan must be nominated by President George W. Bush and approved by the Senate.

The U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California supervises a staff of more than 200 people, including 115 Assistant United States Attorneys, and manages a $25 million annual budget, according to the district's website.

Qualcomm Hires U.S. Attorney for San Diego Who Was Among Several Recently Ousted

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- Qualcomm Inc. said Thursday that recently ousted U.S. Attorney Carol Lam will join its legal department as senior vice president and legal counsel, effective Feb. 26.

The San Diego-based wireless technology giant is currently embroiled in a global web of lawsuits with Nokia Corp. and other major equipment makers that claim Qualcomm levies unjust, inflated licensing fees to use its patented technologies in their products.

Regulators in Europe, South Korea and Japan are probing Qualcomm's business practices as the company trades lawsuits with rivals across the U.S. and Europe.

"From our perspective, she's the ideal person," said Louis Lupin, Qualcomm's general counsel. "She's got experience managing large and very complex cases and a very large staff, and she'll be involved on a global basis."

Qualcomm's announcement came as the Justice Department announced temporary replacements for Lam, whose last day as the chief federal prosecutor in San Diego was Thursday, as well as Lam's counterpart in San Francisco.

Lam will be succeeded by Karen Hewitt, the executive assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California. In San Francisco, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will be replaced by Scott Schools, who currently oversees legal guidance and personnel matters for all 94 U.S. attorney's offices across the country.

Hewitt and Schools will serve on an interim basis until new U.S. attorneys are nominated by the White House and confirmed by the Senate.

Lam and Ryan were among more than seven federal prosecutors recently fired, some without cause, by the attorney general under a little-known part of the Patriot Act.

Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president, subject to Senate confirmation.

Democrats contend that prosecutors were forced to resign to make way for Republican political allies, and that the White House slipped a provision into the Patriot Act allowing the interim appointments to remain indefinite.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has pledged to submit the name of every replacement to the Senate for confirmation.

Lam's dismissal, in particular, prompted criticism from Democrats who questioned whether her departure was linked to the prosecution by her office of disgraced former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican who is currently serving more than eight years in federal prison after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

Senate Consternation Process (WSJ)

By Kimberley Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

The House spent this week debating an Iraq resolution that will damage U.S. efforts to fight terror overseas. Never to be outdone, the Senate got busy undercutting the war on terror here at home.

That's one way to view the fight Senate liberals are picking with President George W. Bush over the issue of Justice Department nominations -- a battle that bubbled to the surface this week with regard to U.S. attorney appointments. California ringleader Dianne Feinstein is hoping to score a few political shots, as well as give the White House a taste of what's to come in future Senate confirmation brawls. If a little thing like national security gets in the way, so be it.

Ms. Feinstein and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid picked up the U.S. attorneys football in January, after the news leaked that the White House was dismissing seven federal prosecutors. The administration says it's unhappy with these lawyers' performance, and at least it is firing its own appointees. One of Bill Clinton's first acts was to cashier pretty much every sitting U.S. attorney, all of whom had been appointed by Mr. Clinton's predecessors. Nothing in the record suggests either Mr. Reid or Ms. Feinstein were all that cut up over the Clinton dismissals.

This time, however, Mr. Reid is labeling the firings "cronygate," and accusing the administration of ousting capable U.S. attorneys in order to award political allies with plum posts. Ms. Feinstein went further, suggesting the administration's real goal was to circumvent the Senate confirmation process. She noted that a 2006 Patriot Act amendment gives the attorney general -- rather than federal courts -- the right to appoint interim U.S. attorneys, and to keep those interims in place until the Senate confirms a permanent replacement. Clearly, said Ms. Feinstein, the White House intended to pack the Justice Department with shady prosecutors and avoid the Senate altogether.

What we have here, then, is Ms. Feinstein, the serial filibusterer, the woman who rarely saw a Bush judge who deserved an up-or-down vote, accusing the administration of abusing the confirmation process. It might be fall-down hilarious, if everyone weren't taking the Californian so seriously. Instead, Ms. Feinstein recently convinced a majority of her fellows on the Judiciary Committee (including Republicans Arlen Specter, Orrin Hatch and Chuck Grassley) that the Senate was getting slapped about, and to vote to revoke the Patriot Act amendment.

Thus is the Senate lurching back to a pre-9/11 mentality, putting politics and turf ahead of key security issues. If Ms. Feinstein wins this battle, the appointment procedure reverts to the status quo ante. Under that old process, the attorney general can appoint an interim U.S. attorney for 120 days. But if the Senate doesn't get around to confirming a full-time replacement by then, the federal courts get to name a new interim.

That old system was primarily a constitutional oddity, but it also posed a threat to terror investigations. History shows that it is a rare event for a White House to get a permanent attorney through the confirmation process in 120 days; it usually takes closer to a year. Yet after the first 120 days, the federal courts officially get to staff the Justice Department.

Some courts, understandably, see the concept of the judiciary making executive appointments as constitutionally suspect. That's one reason why, in the past six years, courts in Florida, Oklahoma and Virginia have outright refused to make appointments. Courts also have little insight into the Justice Department's ongoing investigations, or who best can step in to fill an attorney vacancy. While many courts will, as a result, re-appoint the AG's interim selection, they aren't required to do so.

That can lead to very bad selections. In 2005, a South Dakota judge attempted to appoint a buddy of former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle; the court pick came from outside the Justice Department and lacked security clearances. This led to a standoff between the attorney general and the court, and a crisis over who was really in charge. Hardly the best way to go about breaking up terrorist cells, or prosecuting Zacarias Moussaoui.

As it happens, nothing suggests the administration is trying to subvert confirmations. Since the Patriot Act amendment in March 2006, the White House has nominated 15 individuals to serve as U.S. attorneys, and all have gone, or are going, through the Senate confirmation process. There's zero reason to believe the next seven won't as well. But try telling that to Mr. Reid, who yesterday unsuccessfully tried to push the Feinstein proposal through the full Senate.

Meanwhile, Ms. Feinstein is only the latest to play politics with key national-security nominees. Carl Levin spent six months blocking the confirmation of Ken Wainstein, who was tapped as assistant attorney general for national security. That position was designed to further break down the infamous "wall" between intelligence and law enforcement, a goal that even Mr. Levin claims is important. Yet the Michigan Democrat was in a strop about documents he wanted from the Bush administration, and was only too happy to hold Mr. Wainstein hostage. Mr. Levin waged a similar war against Alice Fisher -- nominated to head the Criminal Division of Justice -- for more than a year.

The latest victim is Steven Bradbury, who was nominated in the distant past of June 2005 to head up the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel. As acting head of that office, Mr. Bradbury offered legal advice on the administration's domestic wiretapping program. This proved too much for Ted Kennedy, Dick Durbin and Russ Feingold. The last was so incensed over the wiretapping program he proposed censuring President Bush. That didn't fly, so he and fellow critics settled for blocking Mr. Bradbury from even getting a vote.

One big question after Democrats won the election was how they'd handle the all-important question of national security. The public's been getting a taste of that management via the Iraq debate, but the nominations flaps are equally revealing. Democrats like to say that having a robust criminal justice system is key to fighting terror, and that's true. Many Democrats (while they won't admit it) even still believe the courts are the only place to fight al Qaeda. The least they can do is show they mean it and ensure the Justice Department has the people it needs.

Column: OUSTING OUR U.S. ATTORNEY (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 16, 2007

Firing is difficult to justify

By Lionel Van Deerlin

Carol Lam gathers her belongings today, and departs the office of U.S. Attorney in California's Southern District. Because she faithfully honors a Justice Department tradition of silence, no one can be sure why she's leaving. She's not talking about it.

But what an exit line she gave us Tuesday with those eleventh-hour indictments. It was worthy of Charles Dickens, who sent Sidney Carton to the guillotine saying, “It is a far better thing I do than I have ever done. . . .”

Hours before returning to private life, our U.S. attorney took an action widening the net that snared San Diego's Rep. Randy “Duke” Cunningham. Her swan song racked up three more suspected miscreants. The homegrown CIA biggie, Kyle Foggo, added colorful icing on the cake. But the most important new action, by far, was against defense contractor Brent Wilkes. It was this man's bribe money that cemented the government case against Cunningham. But Wilkes himself was left free as a bird. Lam staffers, certain that a guy who has lived spectacularly high on the hog will aim to avoid a prolonged diet of prison food, are now positioned to bargain a plea agreement. They'll likely propose easing his sentence as a swap for information that will help hook bigger fish.

A couple of upstate congressmen, known to have done cash-and-carry business with Wilkes, may now feel understandable trepidation.

And so, the question presses ever more urgently – why has the Bush administration sacked Carol Lam and six other trusted U.S. attorneys? No one, it seems, feels required to say. Only one of the seven, New Mexico's David Iglesia, demanded to be told why he was terminated, but got no explanation.

Custom holds that federal prosecutors serve “at the pleasure of the president,” who is free to appoint or remove them without explanation. Yet the Justice Department has shown itself pretty touchy about these most recent switches. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty seemed shaken before the Senate Judiciary Committee. New York's hard-charging Sen. Charles E. Schumer had wondered aloud if the hiring and firing of prosecutors reflected politics, rather than prudence.

"When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart," McNulty stammered. Perhaps this sensitive fellow should seek a gentler assignment, sparing him the hostility he and others will face if we don't get a fuller explanation of what Justice is up to.

The only hint offered thus far for the change in San Diego has been that the local office seemed so absorbed with corruption cases that it has been less aggressive than certain lawmakers might have wished against illegal immigration and border smuggling. North County Republican Rep. Darrell Issa spoke approvingly of the Lam ouster.

The case against her? Well, something called the Transactional Records Clearinghouse, operating out of Syracuse University, finds that in 2001, its last year before Carol Lam took charge, the San Diego office filed nearly one-third more border-related cases than it managed under her leadership in 2005, the last full year on which records are complete.

So she flunks the bureaucratic bean-counter test? I know at least one person who fervently wishes government prosecutors had spent more time in pursuit of border brigands, and had left him alone – to wit, "Top Gun" Cunningham, currently ensconced under minimum security in Tucson.

It might seem rash to accuse Bush administration masterminds of pulling political strings, but nothing surfacing thus far discourages skepticism. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' child-like mantra, "at the pleasure of the president," rings hollow. Let's nail this idea that the president – any president – handpicks the dozens of lawyers in line for prosecutorial slots across the land. He's not likely to know even the names of most. Recommendation for appointments is usually left to senators of the president's party. Inasmuch as both California senators are presently Democrats, Bush has relied on a selection system said to be headed by the veteran Rancho Santa Fe Republican politico and presidential insider Gerald Parsky.

Parsky is astute enough to know that the way this switch has been managed so far adds up to abysmally bad politics. It suggests that public corruption, which figured so prominently in last year's election outcome, might no longer concern us. Are we to suppose that Congressman Cunningham was a lone stroller on his path to perdition?

We may soon know better – and only, perhaps, because Carol Lam refused to fold her tent as many expected her to do.

Van Deerlin represented a San Diego County district in Congress for 18 years.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Monster General Counsel Pleads Guilty In Options Case (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

The former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to two criminal charges related to backdating stock options, ensnared in large part because of a series of damaging emails that helped prosecutors build the case against him.

Myron Olesnyckyj, 45 years old, entered his guilty plea Thursday in Manhattan federal court to conspiracy and securities fraud. He admitted in court that he systematically backdated stock option grant dates, concealed the expense in company financial disclosures, and provided misleading information to auditors.

In one email filed in court by prosecutors yesterday, Mr. Olesnyckyj instructed a human resources executive not to discuss a company practice of giving new hires options at the lowest stock price in the month after they joined the company, a form of backdating. He wrote: "no written document should ever state lowest price over next 30 days! The auditorw [sic] will view that as backdating options and we'll have a charge to earning in the amount of the difference between price on day 30 and any lower price which is used."

Mr. Olesnyckyj, who joined Monster in 1994 and was fired last year, is expected to cooperate with federal prosecutors against Monster founder Andrew McKelvey. Mr. McKelvey, who hasn't been charged, quit rather than be interviewed by company lawyers examining Monster's options problems.

Based in New York, Monster operates the popular Monster.com job-search Web site.

Separately, the Securities and Exchange Commission filed an eight-count civil complaint against Mr. Olesnyckyj on Thursday alleging that he backdated the vast majority of stock options that Monster granted beginning in 1996 until about April 2003. In court, Mr. Olesnyckyj said the practice went on until 2006, four years after new regulations went into effect that should have curbed the improper activity.

DOJ_NMG_0132819

Options typically allow recipients to buy company shares in the future at the price on the day they are granted. Holders can benefit if share prices rise. Backdating involves pretending that the options were granted at an earlier date, so that the recipient can later buy for a lower price, increasing profits.

As a result of the backdating, Monster inflated its earnings by $339.6 million between 1997 and 2005, according to federal prosecutors.

At Monster, stock options regularly were issued to coincide with dates of low closing prices for the company's stock. Most of the options were "in-the-money" on the day they were granted, but the company failed to properly expense or disclose it to shareholders, according to the SEC.

At a Jan. 15, 1999 meeting, according to the SEC, Monster's then-CEO said he wanted to grant options at an exercise price of $25 a share. After the meeting, a Monster employee selected the Dec. 9 closing price of $26.87 as the exercise price.

Mr. Olesnyckyj also personally benefited from the practice, receiving backdated option grants on at least six occasions from 1997 to 2001, according to the SEC. As part of his guilty plea, Mr. Olesnyckyj agreed to forfeit $381,000 in personal gain from the stock options.

In December 2003, after Monster changed its stock option approval process, Mr. Olesnyckyj emailed members of Monster's finance department saying the company should "get serious about firing people who still fail to realize the accounting repurcussions [sic] of promising someone a total of 1000 stock options 'at a strike price equivalent to the lowest price of the stock on the market within a 30 day period preceding your starting date,'" according to prosecutors.

Mr. Olesnyckyj, of New Providence, N.J., is scheduled to be sentenced Aug. 24. He faces a maximum of 25 years in prison but likely will receive a much shorter sentence as a result of his cooperation.

Former Monster Executive Admits Illegal Backdating (WP/AP)

By Larry Neumeister

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 15 -- A former senior vice president of the company that runs the Monster job-search Web site admitted in court Thursday that he illegally backdated millions of dollars in employee stock option grants.

Myron Olesnyckyj, 45, faces up to 25 years in prison and fines of more than $5.2 million after pleading guilty to securities fraud and conspiracy to commit securities fraud. His guilty plea was part of an agreement in which he promised to cooperate fully in return for leniency.

Olesnyckyj said his crimes occurred between 1996 and 2006, when he agreed with others at the company to backdate options and hide the action from federal regulatory agencies and investors. He agreed to forfeit $381,000, which he said was the amount he gained from the scheme.

The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday filed a civil complaint against Olesnyckyj for securities fraud in connection to backdating.

The charges were the first for a Monster executive related to the backdating scandal at the company, which overstated the value of its earnings by more than $250 million between 1997 and 2005. Backdating involves issuing stock options retroactively to coincide with low points in the share price, thus boosting payouts. It can be illegal if it is not properly accounted for and disclosed to investors.

Monster Worldwide, whose job site competes with newspaper classifieds, is among scores of companies whose stock options backdating practices have been investigated by federal authorities.

The company announced in July that it might need to restate its finances to record additional charges for stock options expenses, and in September it said it had suspended Olesnyckyj, who also was general counsel and secretary, while it reviewed past stock options grant practices. It dismissed him two months later.

In October, Monster said former chief executive Andrew J. McKelvey had resigned from its board after refusing to be interviewed for an internal investigation on the options practice.

DOJ_NMG_0132820

Monster also received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York over stock options.

It said in December that it filed restated financial statements to include charges related to the investigation into its stock option granting.

BEARING DOWN Probes Of Backdating Move To Faster Track (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

On Jan. 4, 2002, the chief financial officer of Broadcom Corp. tapped out an email about stock options to his chief executive and others.

"I VERY strongly recommend that these options be priced as of December 24," he wrote.

They were, and that was fortunate for recipients. Broadcom's share price rose 23% between the two dates. The pretense that the options had been granted on the earlier date made them extra valuable.

It also violated the rationale of stock options. They give recipients a right to buy stock in the future at the price when the options are granted, so that recipients can profit only if the price of their company's stock goes up. Setting a lower "exercise price" for the options gives recipients a head start on profiting.

The Broadcom correspondence, found in an internal investigation at the maker of communication chips, is just one of a number of internal documents that have drawn the attention of federal prosecutors and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in Orange County, Calif. Prosecutors are strongly considering filing criminal charges against the former Broadcom chief financial officer who wrote the email, William J. Ruehle, and at least one other former executive, according to people familiar with the situation.

Mr. Ruehle's lawyer said his client didn't break the law.

The Broadcom probe is a sign of how long-running investigations of stock-options backdating are heating up. Yesterday, a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to securities fraud in federal court in Manhattan. The day before, the founder of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. pleaded guilty to a New York State charge in a backdating scheme.

Prosecutors in a half-dozen jurisdictions are zeroing in on other cases. The filing of criminal charges in some of these in coming months would mark a watershed in the scandal, as prosecutors and regulators winnow the roster of some 140 companies with options problems to a tighter list of promising cases.

The government is nearing charges against a former official of computer-security company McAfee Inc., say people familiar with the situation, and is strongly considering bringing cases against ex-executives of Apple Inc. and semiconductor-equipment maker KLA-Tencor Corp. In St. Louis, at least one former executive of Engineered Support Systems Inc., a defense contractor now owned by DRS Technologies Inc. of Parsippany, N.J., has been told of a likely charge, says a person close to the matter.

The former Monster Worldwide general counsel who pleaded guilty yesterday is Myron Olesnyckyj, 45. He admitted that he and others conspired to systematically backdate stock options, inflate the company's earnings and mislead auditors. Separately, the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil complaint against him. Mr. Olesnyckyj agreed to forfeit $381,000 in personal gains. He faces sentencing in August.

Mr. Olesnyckyj, fired last year, is expected to cooperate with prosecutors investigating Monster founder Andrew McKelvey. Mr. McKelvey, who hasn't been charged, quit late last year rather than be interviewed in an internal company probe of options. A lawyer for him declined to comment.

In a 1999 email cited by the government, Mr. Olesnyckyj wrote to a human-resources official: "No written document should ever state lowest price over next 30 days! The auditorw [sic] will view that as backdating options and we'll have a charge to earning in the amount of the difference between price on day 30 and any lower price which is used." (Read more on Mr. Olesnyckyj's guilty plea3.)

That's the type of evidence investigators are looking for -- "plus factors" that can give a case more promise of success. Such factors might include written indications of deliberate backdating; falsified documents; efforts to hide manipulation from auditors or investigators; or indications that top executives gave themselves backdated options. With so many companies admitting to an improper options practice, investigators have an abundance of possible cases.

Broadcom illustrates some of the elements investigators are focusing on as they set their priorities. The Irvine, Calif., company is one of the biggest companies in the options spotlight. It makes chips that help power all sorts of communications devices and has a stock-market value of more than $19 billion. The SEC in addition to the Justice Department is looking at Broadcom.

Also being investigated are Henry Nicholas -- the former chief executive to whom the CFO's email was addressed -- and Henry Samueli, Broadcom's chairman. Messrs. Nicholas and Samueli co-founded Broadcom. The two made up the committee that handed out options Broadcom has admitted were backdated.

Mr. Nicholas said in a statement his focus was on running Broadcom, and "the minutiae of employee paper-work and documentation were not at the top of my list." Mr. Samueli's attorney declined to comment except to say that some of the Journal's information was "misleading."

Mr. Nicholas founded the company in 1991 with help from Mr. Samueli, his former engineering professor. After they took it public in 1998, its stock soared 20-fold in two years. Together the men sold more than $1 billion in Broadcom shares near the end of the tech boom. Each still holds about $1 billion of Broadcom stock.

A domineering figure, Mr. Nicholas routinely scheduled late-night staff meetings and boasted of working for days without sleep. At a yearly sales conference, he quizzed subordinates about chip designs, forcing those who erred to gulp down shots of hard liquor. He stepped down from his CEO post in 2003. Along the way, he settled into a 15,000-square-foot mansion, which he outfitted with a billionaire's toys: waterfalls, secret tunnels into the hills, a sports bar.

Mr. Samueli cuts a less flamboyant figure. A leading philanthropist in Orange County, he also owns the Mighty Ducks hockey franchise. Two University of California engineering schools bear his name.

Last year Broadcom admitted rampant backdating. It restated several years of results, taking $2.24 billion in charges against earnings -- the biggest restatement so far in the scandal.

Mr. Ruehle stepped down as Broadcom's chief financial officer a few days before he was to be interviewed by outside lawyers doing the internal investigation. Broadcom said in a securities filing that Mr. Ruehle was "at the center" of backdating. Mr. Ruehle's lawyer, Richard Marmaro, said that if his client is charged, he "will not plead guilty because he did not commit any crime."

Broadcom in its filing also blamed a former human-resources chief, Nancy Tullos. It said she "encouraged, assisted in and enabled" the backdating. A lawyer for Ms. Tullos, who left in 2003, declined to comment for this article. The lawyer has said previously that Ms. Tullos followed the directives of superiors, didn't select any grant dates and always acted in the company's best interests.

Broadcom's backdating, which it has said occurred from 1998 to 2003, took place amid a gyrating stock price and a heated technology industry in which valued employees were often poached by others with big options packages. Broadcom emails, described by people who have seen them, suggest that executives sometimes deliberately gave grants earlier dates and sometimes cautioned others not to mention the dating process in writing.

Broadcom's auditor, Ernst & Young, raised concerns in 2000 about an aspect of the options process and reminded executives about the rules, say people familiar with the matter. At that time, options granted at the current stock price didn't affect companies' earnings. But a grant at below-market prices was considered compensation, so that companies had to count it as an expense.

In 2000 Broadcom made a giant options grant to a large number of employees, purportedly on a day in May when the stock had its lowest close for the quarter. Ernst discovered that the company hadn't finished divvying up the grant among employees until months later. Accounting rules say an option isn't recorded as granted until recipients are determined.

Ernst warned company officials, including Mr. Ruehle, not to make such "subsequent allocations" again, according to people familiar with the matter. Ernst reminded executives of how options should be accounted for, taking them through the rules.

Like many stocks, Broadcom's sank after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. It hit its lowest price in three years on Oct. 1, before recovering and then more than doubling by year-end. Broadcom claimed to have granted a slew of options to non-officers on Oct. 1. Investigators are looking at whether the company may actually have made this grant later and backdated it, say people familiar with the situation.

Broadcom said in its federal filing that co-founder Mr. Nicholas was "at times" involved in the backdating, and bore a large responsibility for the problems because of "the tone and style of doing business he set." A person familiar with the grant dated Oct. 1 said it engendered jealousy among those who didn't get options then, and that Mr. Nicholas and others appear to have retroactively added more people to the list.

In an email on Jan. 2, 2002, Mr. Nicholas sent a list of employees included in the Oct. 1 grant to at least two people, including Ms. Tullos, say people familiar with the email's contents. "I found my old share grant spreadsheet from before October," he wrote.

But the electronic time stamp on the computer file indicated the spreadsheet had been created toward the end of 2001, long after Oct. 1, say people familiar with the matter. The discrepancy has led investigators to examine whether the email and spreadsheet might be an attempt to provide written cover for manipulated grants.

Broadcom said in its federal filing that co-founder Mr. Samueli was "involved with" the "flawed option granting process." The company cleared him, saying he "reasonably relied on management and other professionals" regarding proper treatment of the options. According to people familiar with the matter, Mr. Samueli, as a member of the Equity Award Committee, received a number of emails that discussed retroactive date selection.

Mr. Samueli cooperated with the internal probe but so far has declined a request to speak to government investigators -- unusual for a sitting chairman. When weighing how much responsibility corporations themselves bear for fraudulent conduct, prosecutors are supposed to consider how cooperative top officials have been, according to Justice Department guidelines.

An outside lawyer for Broadcom said it wouldn't comment on the investigation except to say that it was cooperating fully. "Dr. Samueli did cooperate fully and voluntarily with the company's independent internal investigation," said the lawyer, David Siegel.

In any effort to link backdating to Messrs. Nicholas and Samueli, prosecutors would face a potential hurdle: The co-founders didn't regularly receive option grants themselves. The two received just one grant, for a million options each, in 2002. Broadcom has said no grants to the founders or to directors were among those misdated.

Ms. Tullos and Mr. Ruehle, by contrast, received numerous options, including grants the company has said were manipulated. Mr. Ruehle had $32 million of unexercised options when he left last year. The company canceled them . Last year the company canceled $4 million of options Ms. Tullos held.

Several emails written by Ms. Tullos suggest she may have been aware the dating practices were troublesome. In a period when Broadcom's stock was falling, a business-unit head repeatedly asked her when his subordinates would get options. Eventually, she told him "I cannot tell you what we are doing" in a "post-Enron" world, according to people familiar with the matter. In a message to another employee asking about options, she wrote, "I cannot answer in writing."

Prosecutors would need more than suggestive emails to make a successful criminal case. A document that seems like a smoking gun can grow cold when the context is explained to a jury by an experienced defense lawyer.

Another obstacle for the government in prosecuting backdating is at some companies the practice was discussed openly, making it harder to argue that executives knew they were engaged in wrongful conduct.

Defense lawyers will doubtless pass blame around. Those representing CEOs are likely to argue that their clients -- being business leaders, not accountants -- relied on others to figure out how options should be issued and accounted for. Those representing subordinates are likely to argue that the boss made them do it.

Helping boost momentum toward the filing of charges is the statute of limitations. It's five years for securities fraud and wire fraud. But there's some flexibility, based on the notion that misdated options might affect earnings in later years.

Executive-Pay Summaries Conceal As They Reveal (WP)

By David Cho And Carrie Johnson

DOJ_NMG_0132823

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

The first overhaul in 15 years of executive-pay disclosures has been billed as the most transparent window ever into the clubby world of corporate compensation.

But as these filings have begun to roll out publicly, analysts are finding there's a catch.

Due to an accounting loophole for stock options and an eleventh-hour rule change made by securities regulators just before Christmas, some of the biggest names in technology, health care and financial services will be able to cloud what their top executives make.

The anomaly is being discovered by compensation consultants who have been hired by firms to draft these filings. In some cases, it is lowering the compensation figures reported by firms, they said. In others, executives who should be named in the filings as the five highest-paid officers in their companies are being replaced with employees making less.

The Securities and Exchange Commission's first changes to pay disclosures since 1992 were meant to be user-friendly. Shareholders could look at a summary table and easily see what the top executives of a company were taking home in salary, perks, retirement bonuses and stock options.

Now, that summary table "won't give you the full picture," said Brian Foley, a compensation consultant based in White Plains, N.Y. "It misses a big part of the puzzle."

SEC officials said they had no control over which companies used the stock options loophole. But they said the agency's late December rule change will provide more accurate figures in the long run and will better reflect what an executive is making in a given year. Although the summary table may not provide full information on options, that data will be included elsewhere in the filing, they said.

No issue in the SEC's history has generated as much interest as the new executive-pay disclosures, Chairman Christopher Cox said last year, adding that the agency had received more than 20,000 comments about it from businesses, trade groups and investor advocates.

While hailing the new filings as a breakthrough, several academics and analysts were critical in interviews of the way the disclosures handle stock options. They also questioned whether the average shareholder could page through these filings to link different tables and charts.

"The proxies will provide you three or four times as much information as before," Foley said. "But . . . now you will have to pick through the mess to get the value of the options. It's not going be in plain English."

Employees who are granted stock options can buy a company's stock at a set price within a specific time frame. They then can reap a windfall if the price goes up, but typically they can sell only a portion of these shares each year. This "vesting period" often keeps prized workers from defecting to a rival.

The story behind the loophole began when an accounting rule, FAS 123R, came into effect last year and changed the way companies account for these options.

The rule had a huge impact on the all-important bottom line: If firms gave stock options to executives, they had to subtract the total value of those grants from their earnings that year. Before, options were not counted as an expense.

Suddenly, under FAS 123R, it could appear as if a company's profit took a big hit, especially in industries such as health care and technology in which granting executives hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of stock options is common.

To avoid the appearance of a profit dip, more than 900 companies, including Dell, Sun Microsystems, CBS, J.P. Morgan Chase, Whole Foods Market, Viacom, Corning and Northrop Grumman, sped up the vesting date of their options to occur before FAS 123R took effect, according to a Bear Stearns report. This was neither illegal nor improper under accounting rules.

But the acceleration helped these firms collectively erase about $8 billion of future stock option expenses from their books, meaning they awarded the options but would not have to include the cost in their financial results, according to Bear Stearns.

"Option-vesting acceleration was used as a means to temporarily benefit reported earnings," the report said. The analysis says Dell accelerated the most options -- $591 million in total -- followed by Sun Microsystems, with $400 million.

Then, on the Friday before Christmas, the SEC gave corporations a present: It changed a rule to allow them to report the amount of stock options that vest per year rather than the total value of the options granted to an executive.

One compensation consultant, who has major technology firms as clients, said the difference in reported compensation levels before and after the SEC's December rule change has been striking.

In almost every case, the SEC change and the acceleration of options altered the total amount of compensation reported on the disclosure's summary table. For many firms, the final number was lower. For other companies, at least on paper, it created a different pecking order for the highest-paid executives. The consultant spoke on condition of anonymity because the filings have not yet been released to the public.

The new summary tables are "potentially misleading if you are looking for a single number to guide you. . . . You don't get a picture of what the compensation committee originally intended the compensation to be," he said. "The number that you get is precisely wrong."

Especially in the first year, the compensation expert added, shareholders should be cautious about taking these figures at face value.

SEC officials said shareholders should not rely solely on the summary tables and should read a company's entire filing. They added that if the December rule altered the composition of a company's "top five," the change made the filing more accurate.

"There are still problems . . . but this reporting season, we will know much more about both the amount and the structure of compensation than we've known for a long time," said Lucian Bebchuk, director of the Program on Corporate Governance at Harvard Law School.

Government Won't Challenge Appeal Court's Decision In Enron-related Case (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 16, 2007

The Justice Department has decided not to challenge an appeals court's decision last year to throw out most of the 2004 convictions against several former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in an Enron-related case.

But three of those former executives — who each served nearly a year in prison before being released pending the result of their appeals — could still be retried on charges of participating in a sham deal to help Enron book bogus profits.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said Thursday that federal prosecutors had decided not to appeal the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Justice Department had until Friday to make that call.

"While we review the matter before the district court, we remain committed to holding accountable those responsible for the massive frauds that accompanied the collapse of Enron," Lesch said.

She declined to say whether prosecutors will retry Daniel Bayly, Merrill's former head of investment banking; James A. Brown, former head of the firm's asset lease group; and Robert Furst, the brokerage's former liaison with Enron.

A status hearing in the case is slated for this afternoon.

Last August, the appellate court threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions of Bayly, Brown, Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs. A jury in 2004 convicted all four of fraud and conspiracy for helping push through a deal in which the brokerage pretended to buy three power barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have made earnings targets in late 1999.

In a 2-1 decision, an appeals panel ruled that prosecutors improperly presented jurors with a theory that the defendants deprived Enron of its right to their honest services.

The panel said the theory was flawed in that case because their actions were consistent with corporate goals and did not rob the energy company or shareholders of money or property.

Had the deal involved bribery or theft, the theory could have been proper, the panel said in reversing most convictions against Bayly, Brown and Furst. Perjury and obstruction of justice convictions against Brown for lying about the nature of the deal were upheld.

Fuhs' convictions were thrown out for lack of evidence, and he cannot be retried. Also, former Enron finance executive Dan Boyle, who also was convicted for his role in the scheme, chose not to appeal and is in prison.

The honest services ruling has permeated other Enron cases.

DOJ_NMG_0132825

Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling aims to raise the issue in his appeal of his 2006 jury convictions last year of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. Skilling is serving a 24-year, four-month prison term.

Prosecutors presented the honest services theory only with the single conspiracy count against Skilling. However, a 5th Circuit panel said in a December opinion denying Skilling's request for bail pending the outcome of his appeal that it found "serious frailties" in his securities fraud and insider trading convictions as well.

Skilling's lawyers expect to file his appeal next month.

Late last month, a Houston federal judge ruled that prosecutors wrongly used the honest services theory in last year's retrial of a former Enron broadband division executive and threw out all five jury convictions of conspiracy, wire fraud and falsifying books.

The government had already conceded that four of the five convictions of Kevin Howard, the unit's former finance chief, should be erased because they likely wouldn't stand up on appeal in light of the honest services ruling. U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore wiped out the fifth count as well, saying it was tied to one of the tainted counts.

Still other cases have been affected. For example, Christopher Calger, a former vice president of power origination at Enron, is seeking to withdraw his guilty plea to wire fraud on the claim that he could not have deprived Enron of his honest services in a power plant deal because his actions were in line with company goals. That request is pending.

2 Former Enron Traders Get Probation For Driving Up Energy Prices During Calif. Power Crisis (AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Two of three former Enron Corp. traders accused of driving up energy prices during California's power crisis were each sentenced in federal court to two years of court-supervised release.

Timothy Belden, the former head of trading in Enron's Portland, Oregon, office, was sentenced Wednesday after pleading guilty in October 2002 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. Belden's plea was the first prosecution of anyone related to the West's energy crisis in 2000 and 2001. He had faced up to five years in prison and must forfeit $2.1 million (â,¬1.6 million).

The second defendant, Jeffrey Richter, was a lower-level trading manager in charge of the so-called "short-term desk" who also pleaded guilty to two counts related to manipulating energy prices. He had faced up to five years and agreed to pay a $410,000 (â,¬313,408) fine.

A third trader, the alleged mastermind behind the scheme, is expected to be sentenced next month for his role in the scam that fraudulently sent California energy prices soaring, causing energy shortages and rolling blackouts.

Internal company memos describe how Belden's trading unit took power out of California at a time of rolling blackouts and shortages and sold it out of state to elude price caps, according to documents obtained by investigators.

Enron bought California power at cheap, capped prices, routed it outside the state, then sold it back into California at vastly inflated prices, authorities said. The sham trades were designed to circumvent the California-only price caps on wholesale energy.

The crisis played a role in Pacific Gas & Electric Co.'s bankruptcy and will leave California consumers paying abnormally high electricity prices for years.

Prosecutor Laurel Beeler said the government sought lenient sentences because of their "extraordinary assistance" in the investigation. Beeler said they gave hundreds of hours of their time to assist authorities at understanding the scheme, assisting authorities in the government's successful case against Enron Chairman Ken Lay, Chief Executive Jeff Skilling and dozens of others.

Beeler, however, said it was unclear how much the energy trading scheme cost ratepayers.

"Calculating a particular loss to that activity is difficult," she told U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins.

The third defendant, John Forney, the manager of Enron's trading desk, pleaded guilty to one of 11 charges in exchange for his cooperation and is to set to be sentenced in March.

Forney pleaded guilty to wire fraud - specifically, that he promised to supply energy Enron did not have and improperly collected electrical grid management fees for Enron.

In Fraud Case, 7 Years In Jail For Contempt (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

On Jan. 14, 2000, Martin A. Armstrong, a globe-trotting investment manager, was told to produce $15 million in gold and antiquities, as well as documents, in response to a civil suit by the government accusing him of securities fraud involving hundreds of millions of dollars.

When he said that he did not have the items and could not produce them, a federal judge ordered him jailed for contempt of court.

Seven years later, Mr. Armstrong sits in the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Lower Manhattan.

Imprisoned two years before Enron and WorldCom brought corporate crime to center stage, Mr. Armstrong, 57, is the white-collar defendant whom time forgot. Over the years, the losses of his former clients have been repaid by a bank involved in his trades.

Still, he remains jailed on one of the longest-running charges of contempt. In many cases, a federal law limits to 18 months how long someone can be held under civil contempt while the court tries to coerce compliance with an order. Even in cases of criminal contempt, whose goal is punishment rather than coercion, an individual is entitled to the full protections of due process after six months.

"A legal proceeding is supposed to be the quest for truth," Mr. Armstrong said in a phone interview last week from the 12-story building, which is used mostly as a temporary holding site for prisoners. "But this contempt was used to stop me from going to trial, and it's been nothing but bad faith from the government ever since."

How Mr. Armstrong has been held for so many years without a trial is a tangled and bizarre tale. Mr. Armstrong, his lawyers say, has been stuck in a surreal situation in which criminal prosecutors have never had to prove their 24-count indictment at trial while the civil case tied him up. Nevertheless, they have gotten their desired result — a lengthy prison term for Mr. Armstrong.

Last August, he pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy in the criminal case. He struck that deal with federal prosecutors after he was moved from the 75-square-foot cell he shared with another prisoner into solitary confinement and had not slept for days, his lawyer said. Over the years, prosecutors have said that they were ready to proceed to trial and that civil contempt had nothing to do with their case. Mr. Armstrong countered that his detainment impeded his efforts to mount a proper defense, blocking his access to essential documents and computers as well as the assets to pay counsel.

Because there has been no jury trial in the case, it is impossible to say which side is right: the government, whose indictment in September 1999 contended that Mr. Armstrong misappropriated hundreds of millions in client funds; or Mr. Armstrong, who said that officials at the bank executing his trades generated temporary losses that could have been recovered in the market. (Two of those officials later pleaded guilty to fraud in a related case involving the bank.)

Exceeding a Sentence

But this much is certain: Mr. Armstrong's years in jail for civil contempt will soon exceed the sentence of 6.5 to 8 years that he would have received if he had been convicted of all 24 criminal counts of securities fraud, commodities fraud and wire fraud. "The case sends a very bad signal," said Bernard V. Kleinman, a criminal lawyer in White Plains who represented Mr. Armstrong until 2004 and argued twice for his release before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in Lower Manhattan. "I think it bodes very ill for anybody held in civil contempt. District court judges can look at this case and feel that the likelihood of the circuit reversing them is small and that time is, in and of itself, no factor in determining whether civil contempt has lost its coercive effect and has become punitive."

John F. Keenan, the Federal District Court judge overseeing the criminal case, has not yet sentenced Mr. Armstrong. It is unclear whether the judge will give Mr. Armstrong credit for the time he has served. Under federal sentencing guidelines, his lawyers expect a sentence of about five years.

A spokeswoman for the United States attorney in Manhattan said that the office did not comment on open cases.

DOJ_NMG_0132827

Judge Richard Owen, the senior district judge who ordered Mr. Armstrong held in contempt, still sits on the bench in the Southern District of New York, where he has been for 34 years. When he ordered Mr. Armstrong taken away by federal marshals, he declared, "Mr. Armstrong has the keys to the jail cell in his pocket by production and telling people where to go to get it and dig it up and turn it over."

Over the years, Judge Owen would revisit the contempt order every 18 months, guided by the federal statute. He repeatedly said that Mr. Armstrong was motivated by greed and was awaiting his release from jail to retrieve the $15 million that the government said was missing. According to lawyers who worked on the case in the early days, the financier's headstrong manner irritated Judge Owen almost immediately.

But Judge Owen was moved off the case in November by a panel in the Second Circuit Court hearing Mr. Armstrong's third appeal on the contempt charge.

The three judges unanimously rejected the appeal to free Mr. Armstrong but found that on the seventh anniversary of his confinement, "his case deserves a fresh look by a different pair of eyes."

It was the second time in less than a year that the Second Circuit had ordered Judge Owen replaced on a high-profile case. In March, a panel overturned the 2004 conviction of Frank P. Quattrone, the former investment banker at Credit Suisse, because Judge Owen failed to instruct the jury properly; the panel assigned the case to a new judge in the "interest of justice." Later, the government decided not to retry Mr. Quattrone.

Judge P. Kevin Castel has taken over the Armstrong civil case. A hearing is scheduled on the contempt matter for March 15. A request to interview Mr. Armstrong in person was denied by corrections officials, and Judge Owen did not return a call seeking comment.

A Budding Businessman

At the peak of his career in the mid-90s, Mr. Armstrong oversaw $3 billion in client assets. He was widely quoted in the financial news media, including The New York Times, on interest rate and currency movements. He began working at a coin and stamp dealership when he was 13 and opened a collectors' store when he was 21. He founded Princeton Economics International, based in Princeton, N.J., in 1981.

Mr. Armstrong, an intelligent and imperious man who claimed to have made his first million by age 15, seems to have begun having trouble in 1999 when trading losses turned up in accounts that were held for the firm at Republic Bank. The problems appeared as the HSBC Group conducted a financial review before acquiring Republic.

The government said that Mr. Armstrong had improperly commingled accounts and overstated the value of the account's securities in client statements.

Mr. Armstrong said that he did not authorize the transactions that produced losses and that he was not involved with commingling of the accounts. He was indicted in September and released on $5 million bond.

In January 2000, the receiver appointed by the court in the civil case said that Mr. Armstrong had purchased gold coins and other assets with his firm's money. His lawyers argued that the assets might have been purchased before the suspected wrongdoing.

When Judge Owen ordered the assets returned, Mr. Armstrong delivered 4 of the 5 computers sought, 8 of the 11 requested boxes of documents and gold coins worth $1.1 million. He said that was all he had. The receiver said assets worth about $15 million were missing. Mr. Armstrong's odyssey in the judicial system began.

His assets frozen, Mr. Armstrong has been unable to pay lawyers. He now relies upon David Cooper and Steven Z. Legon, two lawyers from the Criminal Justice Act panel, set up to help indigent defendants, and Thomas V. Sjoblom, a lawyer at Proskauer Rose, who has received nominal compensation.

"On what grounds can you tie up the system of criminal procedure and civil procedure and hold everything in abeyance during contempt?" Mr. Sjoblom asked. "What about your speedy trial rights? What about the government's need to move forward in the civil case? You're using the contempt process to wring a settlement or a plea out of the person. That, to me, is abuse of the process."

DOJ_NMG_0132828

Over the years, more than half a dozen government lawyers have cycled through the case. In 2003, Mr. Armstrong changed his legal approach in challenging the contempt charge, saying that he did not have to produce the assets and citing his Fifth Amendment right.

The receiver, meanwhile, has recovered the vast majority of money said to have been lost by investors in the case. In January 2002, Republic New York Securities, a brokerage firm that housed Princeton Economics' accounts, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud charges. Republic Bank paid $606 million to victims, all Japanese companies. It was "full restitution," the assistant United States attorney said at the time.

Alan M. Cohen, then a lawyer at O'Melveny & Myers and now executive vice president and global head of compliance at Goldman Sachs, is the court-appointed receiver.

His former colleague, Tancred V. Schiavoni, a lawyer at O'Melveny, said that all the victims had been satisfied. "We tried to do the right thing, and we've gotten nothing but grief," he said. "What this guy wants is to be given credit for time served on the contempt and leave with the money."

O'Melveny & Myers has received at least $3.9 million to cover its fees and disbursement over the years, according to court filings.

The discovery process was protracted partly because of the complexity — hundreds of boxes of materials had to be examined and data transcribed into digital format — and because Mr. Armstrong was in jail and relying on lawyers working pro bono.

In January 2006, criminal prosecutors said they were eager to put Mr. Armstrong on trial in October. Then in early August, federal prosecutors appeared at the correctional center to strike a plea deal. The visit, Mr. Sjoblom said, came a week after Mr. Armstrong had been ordered into solitary confinement — known as "the hole" — for damaging a vent in a common area.

Mr. Armstrong pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud for failing to keep his investors informed about losses and for agreeing to make investor funds available to Republic to cover Princeton Economics' unrelated trading losses.

"I think the government just wore Marty out," Mr. Sjoblom said.

On Dec. 7, Stephen J. Obie, regional counsel for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, visited Mr. Armstrong, with a settlement offer in which he would sign over some $30 million as a penalty. Mr. Armstrong declined.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the C.F.T.C. declined to comment on the case.

The government has said that $21 million is still owed. Even if that must be paid by Mr. Armstrong's firm and not Republic Bank, an estimated $40 million is left in what was once Princeton Economics: $30 million in the United States and $10 million in a British entity. Mr. Armstrong and his lawyers learned of the $10 million three weeks ago.

Weekly Visits

Mr. Armstrong, who is divorced, has two children and an elderly mother who await his release. His daughter, Victoria Armstrong, 30, visits most Wednesdays, spending about one hour with him in a common room with other visitors and prisoners.

"You never stop thinking about where he is and what he goes through," Ms. Armstrong said in an interview last week.

Her brother, Martin, 31, said he was bewildered at what he sees as the breakdown of due process in his father's case. "That you can keep someone in contempt for such a long time with so many unanswered questions — that part of it has been a real eye-opener," he said.

Sonia Sotomayor, a judge on the Second Circuit panel that heard Mr. Armstrong's appeal last year, seemed to echo this point. "The district court's finding that Armstrong is motivated solely by greed is not enough to justify disregard for due process," she wrote. "Courts must exercise caution in their use of the contempt power and must recognize when it has reached the limits of its utility."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Nevada Governor Faces FBI Probe Into Contracts (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Federal prosecutors are investigating whether Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons accepted unreported gifts or payments from a company that was awarded secret military contracts when Mr. Gibbons served in Congress.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is examining whether any gifts or payments violated federal contracting rules or were offered in exchange for official acts by Mr. Gibbons, people briefed on the investigation said. Mr. Gibbons, a Republican, represented Nevada for five terms in Congress, where he served on the House Intelligence and Armed Services committees. He was sworn in last month as governor of the nation's fastest-growing state.

The close ties between the congressman and the contractor, Warren Trepp, were disclosed in a Nov. 1 Wall Street Journal article1, which revealed that Mr. Gibbons accepted private jet flights and a Caribbean cruise from the software-company owner. Mr. Gibbons says accepting the cruise and flight didn't violate House ethics rules.

New evidence has emerged that includes emails to Mr. Trepp -- the majority owner of eTreppid Technologies LLC and the former chief trader for convicted junk-bond dealer Michael Milken -- discussing a payment or gift to then-Rep. Gibbons. They also show Mr. Gibbons repeatedly using his congressional office to help the firm seek classified military and civilian contracts.

The emails show that since at least 2003, Mr. Trepp maintained close ties to Mr. Gibbons, who helped eTreppid get no-bid software contracts from the Air Force, U.S. Special Operations Command and Central Intelligence Agency. The software was used in video tracking of military targets and other, classified applications.

Messrs. Trepp and Gibbons have denied any wrongdoing, and no charges have been filed; indeed, such investigations sometimes end without official action.

'Hit the Ground Running'

In a Sept. 25, 2003, email to Mr. Trepp after Mr. Gibbons had been particularly helpful on a recent contract, eTreppid executive Len Glogauer reports that "Jim really hit the ground running on that one." He adds, "we need to take care of him like we discussed." It isn't clear what Mr. Glogauer meant, and he declined to comment.

A second email, cited in court filings by Mr. Trepp's former partner, was more explicit. On March 22, 2005, days before Mr. Trepp and his wife embarked on the Caribbean cruise with the congressman and his family, Jalé Trepp sent a reminder to her husband. "Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn," referring to Mr. and Mrs. Gibbons.

Minutes later, Mr. Trepp responds, "Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!" Mr. Gibbons failed to disclose the cruise and travel on Mr. Trepp's leased private jet, as required by House ethics rules. He later asked the House Ethics Committee for an exemption, but left office before any action was taken.

The eTreppid emails include dozens to and from then-Rep. Gibbons. In one of the first such exchanges, on Sept. 23, 2003, Mr. Gibbons said he was "greatly impressed" with the technology and that he asked a military aide on his staff to set up a meeting with the National Security Agency to demonstrate the company's products. "No doubt, the Agency will be just as impressed," Mr. Gibbons wrote. He also tells an eTreppid executive to begin using a private email address that is "a direct link to my desk and does not go through anyone else."

In later exchanges, Mr. Gibbons discusses his efforts to set up meetings with the Department of Homeland Security, and arranges meetings with several Pentagon officials, including a top defense intelligence official. An eTreppid executive responds, "now if we can get into the Navy, it would be great."

In a statement yesterday, a spokesman for the governor said Mr. Gibbons has "consistently stated that he and Warren Trepp have a longstanding friendship." Mr. Gibbons, the statement continued, is proud of his efforts "to highlight the good work of Nevada companies as part of his duties to represent his constituents. However, he held no special power in awarding defense contracts, which go through a multilevel approval process."

Mr. Trepp didn't return phone calls or emails seeking comment. His attorney, Steven Peek, said yesterday, "Warren has had no inquires or questions from any federal officials about his relationship with Jim Gibbons." Mr. Peek said Mr. Trepp continues to talk to the FBI "about the theft of his company's intellectual property" by his former partner, the crux of continuing legal disputes between the two men. Mr. Peek also said Mr. Trepp "unequivocally denies that he wrote any emails regarding any payments to Jim Gibbons, and questions their authenticity."

Preliminary Stage

The FBI declined to comment on the investigation, which appears to be in a preliminary stage. The bureau has stepped up its pursuit of public-corruption cases, and says it now has about 620 agents working on federal, state and local cases, compared with 260 in 2002. On Tuesday, former senior CIA official Kyle "Dusty" Foggo was indicted on fraud, conspiracy and money-laundering charges for allegedly accepting jet flights and a vacation from a contractor, Brent Wilkes, who was indicted on related charges. Both pleaded not guilty yesterday. The indictments arose from a continuing FBI investigation of former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, who last year began serving a prison sentence for accepting bribes.

The Cunningham case and claims made against Mr. Gibbons have drawn attention to alleged congressional abuse of the classified or "black" portion of the federal budget, which covers CIA, NSA and other secret government activities and has grown to at least $30 billion. New limits on special-interest spending known as earmarks were enacted by Congress last month, including rules meant to restrict earmarks in the classified budget.

The Nevada case is being watched closely in Washington: John Negroponte, former director of national intelligence, warned in a court filing of "exceptionally grave damage" to national security if details of the secret contracts are disclosed.

The new federal probe follows a Nevada investigation of the dispute over ownership of eTreppid software used in secret government programs. That investigation was initially focused on Dennis Montgomery, the former partner of Mr. Trepp who designed the software on which eTreppid was founded in 1998. The men have accused each other of trade-secret theft, among other claims, and have been battling in court for more than a year.

The new emails and internal documents would appear to support some of the claims made in legal proceedings filed by Mr. Montgomery, who in court papers has alleged that Mr. Trepp gave at least $100,000 in cash and casino chips to Mr. Gibbons. Public records show Mr. Trepp gave $90,000 to the governor's campaign through a series of separate companies, avoiding a $10,000 limit on individual or corporate contributions.

Defamation Suit

In court filings, Mr. Trepp has denied Mr. Montgomery's claims. He also filed a defamation suit against the chairman of the Nevada Democratic Party, Tom Collins, over published comments about the business dispute before last year's election. He cites "false testimony" by Mr. Montgomery, who he says "engaged in a campaign to spread falsehoods...which led up to a story published in the Wall Street Journal." The Journal isn't a defendant in the libel suit, which is pending in state court in Reno.

The Nov. 1 page-one story in the Journal reported that Mr. Gibbons and his family accompanied Mr. Trepp on a Caribbean cruise and that the congressman had helped Mr. Trepp win federal contracts. Mr. Gibbons at the time said his assistance to Mr. Trepp's company was simply intended to promote promising technology, and that the cruise and jet flights didn't violate House ethics rules because of his "close personal friendship" with Mr. Trepp.

Mr. Montgomery has accused Messrs. Trepp and Gibbons of using their political clout to get local FBI agents to raid his home and investigate him. In December, a federal magistrate found flagrant constitutional violations in the FBI raid, according to people briefed on her ruling, which remains under seal. The court found that the local FBI and U.S. attorney's office had effectively acted as armed enforcers for eTreppid's wealthy owner in a private business dispute with a former partner.

Mr. Peek, Mr. Trepp's attorney, said, "If the magistrate decided the search was improper, I'm disappointed in the decision, but without knowing the basis, I can't comment."

In his court filings, Mr. Montgomery alleges that Mr. Gibbons himself called in local federal officials at the behest of Mr. Trepp, who is one of Mr. Gibbons's biggest campaign contributors. In an interview last year with The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Gibbons's wife, Dawn, acknowledged that Mr. Trepp's wife had called her about the dispute. In response, Mr. Peek said: "Any citizen has a right to report a crime like a theft of intellectual property and computer equipment, and the government should rightfully act on the report of a crime regardless of who reports it."

Nevada Governor Facing FBI Probe Of Classified Federal Contracts (LVS)

By Brendan Riley

Las Vegas Sun, February 16, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - Federal authorities confirmed Thursday that Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons is being investigated to see if there are links between any gifts or payments he may have received from a software company and secret military contracts the firm got when he was in Congress.

The newly elected Republican governor denied any wrongdoing and told The Associated Press that "they can look as deeply as they need to and I encourage them to do so, but there would have been absolutely no influence."

A federal law enforcement official confirmed the FBI probe. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said the inquiry is focusing on what role Gibbons played in awarding military contracts to eTreppid Technologies LLC in Reno and whether he received any gifts in exchange.

Gibbons said he had not been contacted by the FBI regarding his contacts with Warren Trepp, a longtime friend and owner of eTreppid who contributed nearly $100,000 to Gibbons' campaign for governor through different companies he controls.

"They never talked to me. They never have given me any kind of hint or whatever," he said.

The governor said he's a "pretty public person" and figured that if an investigation was under way he would have been contacted.

Asked whether he had hired an attorney as a result of the reported investigation, Gibbons said friends have volunteered to help and he would look into the issue if needed.

"I've done nothing wrong though," he said.

Trepp, a former chief trader for convicted junk-bond dealer Michael Milken, also has denied any wrongdoing.

Trepp's attorney, Stephen Peek, said Thursday that he and client were unaware of an investigation, "other than what we read."

"Warren Trepp was not contacted by any governmental agencies with respect to the allegations," Peek said.

The Wall Street Journal first reported that investigators were looking at whether federal contracting rules were violated in the case involving Gibbons, who was sworn in last month as governor after five terms in Congress, where he served on the House Intelligence and Armed Services committees.

Gibbons said he had read the news story and was "disturbed" that it "tried to connect dots where there are no dots to connect."

"I don't think that I have done anything that hasn't been done by others, which is opening doors for businesses in the state of Nevada," Gibbons said.

Gibbons had asked the House ethics committee in November for an opinion about whether he improperly reported flights aboard Trepp's jet and a Caribbean cruise paid for by Trepp, whose company has millions of dollars worth of classified federal software contracts from the Air Force, U.S. Special Operations Command and the CIA. Gibbons did not disclose the trip as required by House ethics rules and later asked the committee for an exemption, but left office before any action was taken.

The Journal reported new evidence had emerged in a federal lawsuit in Reno involving Trepp and Dennis Montgomery, his former technology chief at eTreppid. Montgomery claimed in November that Trepp and Gibbons used political clout to get local FBI agents to raid his home and investigate him.

Trepp and Montgomery are involved in litigation related to the copyrights of the company's video surveillance technology, which reportedly is used with unmanned aircraft to identify terrorism suspects.

The evidence cited includes e-mails to Trepp discussing a payment or gifts to then-Rep. Gibbons. The e-mails also show Gibbons using his congressional office to help the company seek classified military and civilian contracts, the newspaper said.

"Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn," Trepp's wife, Jale Trepp, said in a March 22, 2005, e-mail days before Trepp and his wife embarked on the Caribbean cruise with Jim Gibbons and his wife, Dawn, a former Nevada state assemblywoman.

According to the Journal, Trepp responded minutes later saying: "Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!"

Gibbons said he knew nothing about the e-mails and questioned their authenticity, as did Peek.

"We categorically, unequivocally deny any such e-mails exist or were written," Peek said.

Peek also said Trepp and Gibbons were being "vilified" by Montgomery, who he described as "a disgruntled former employee who will do anything and everything to tarnish the names of two very well-respected citizens."

Gibbons called the Journal report the "misguided" result "of a civil case between two former business associates, which I have now been dragged into."

Tom Collins, the state Democratic Party chairman sued for defamation by Trepp after seeking access to the Reno court records on grounds they might show "potential improper conduct," renewed his criticism of the governor.

"Gov. Gibbons already has made a mockery of his office in more ways than one, and now we learn the FBI is investigating him for political corruption," he said. "This governor has embarrassed the state, and lost most of his effectiveness and respect. And we're not even two months into his term."

Nevada Governor Denies Wrongdoing Over Contracts (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons denied any wrongdoing in the face of a federal investigation into whether he accepted gifts or payments from a company that won government contracts while he was in Congress.

"They can look as deeply as they need to and I encourage them to do so, but there would have been absolutely no influence," the newly elected governor told the Associated Press in Carson City, Nev. The Wall Street Journal reported in a page-one article yesterday that federal authorities are investigating his dealings with a contractor in his state when he was a member of Congress.

A federal law-enforcement official said the preliminary inquiry is focusing on what role Mr. Gibbons may have played in awarding military contracts to eTreppid Technologies LLC in Reno and whether he received any gifts in exchange. Mr. Gibbons said he hadn't been contacted by the FBI regarding his contacts with Warren Trepp, whom he described as a longtime friend; Mr. Trepp is the majority owner of eTreppid and contributed nearly $100,000 to Mr. Gibbons's campaign for governor.

"They never talked to me. They never have given me any kind of hint or whatever," Mr. Gibbons said.

FBI Reportedly Investigating Nevada Governor Over Contractor's Gifts (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

The FBI is investigating whether Nevada's governor failed to report gifts from a military contractor that he received while serving in Congress, law enforcement officials said yesterday.

Investigators are also examining whether Jim Gibbons, a Republican, performed any official acts on behalf of the contractor in exchange for gifts or payments, according to the officials.

The governor released a statement yesterday in which he defended his efforts to "introduce" the contractor's software products to fellow members of the House intelligence and Armed Services committees. He said he has "never been notified of any investigation by the FBI."

"I am confident that my actions were ethical," he said in his statement. "However, if there is ever found to be an inaccuracy or mistake, I will rectify it."

Reporting yesterday on the investigation, the Wall Street Journal published a series of alleged e-mail exchanges about Gibbons's dealings with Warren Trepp, the software entrepreneur whose company won millions of dollars' worth of classified military contracts during the time Gibbons served in Congress.

Among the dozens of e-mails is one allegedly sent days before Trepp and his wife prepared to set sail on a Caribbean cruise with Gibbons and his wife. In it, Trepp's wife allegedly wrote to her husband: "Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn." Trepp's reply, according to the Journal report, was: "Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!"

The gifts allegedly included the cruise and travel on Trepp's private jet, as well as some suggestion of a payment that Trepp made to Gibbons, the Journal reported. Gibbons was first elected to the House in 1996 and served five terms.

The probe is at an early stage, and no conclusions have been reached about whether any crime was committed, one of the law enforcement officials said.

Trepp's attorney, Steven Peek, told the Journal that the software company executive has not been contacted by federal investigators about his relationship with Gibbons. Peek said yesterday that his client is unaware of any investigation and questions the authenticity of the e-mails cited in the Journal report.

None of those involved has disputed that Gibbons and Trepp are friends. Trepp and his relatives have donated more than $30,000 to Gibbons and his wife, who unsuccessfully made her own bid for Congress, in the past five years.

"My relationship with Mr. Trepp has no bearing on the effectiveness of the technology created by his company or its ability to aid in our efforts to improve national security," Gibbons said.

Details about the relationship between Gibbons and Trepp appear to have become public through a legal dispute between Trepp and a former employee of his company, eTreppid Technologies LLC. The case concerns the fair use of software technology, according to court papers.

The Reno, Nev., firm holds several federal software contracts, the nature of which has largely remained concealed because of the secrecy surrounding some aspects of military and intelligence budgeting.

In September, then-Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte filed a declaration in the eTreppid lawsuit, in which he said that if some elements of the case became public, it could be "reasonably expected to cause serious, and in some cases exceptionally grave damage to the national security of the United States."

The probe of Gibbons has also raised questions about the impending departure of U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada, whose office will oversee the investigation. Bogden is among seven U.S. attorneys who were abruptly fired by the Justice Department without explanation. His last day is Feb. 28.

Libby Defense Skirted Conspiracy Theory (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — In his opening statement three weeks ago in the federal perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, defense lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr. dropped a bombshell. In dramatic tones, Wells declared that Libby had been the victim of a White House conspiracy to make Libby the fall guy for the CIA leak scandal.

But when the jury begins deliberating the fate of the former vice presidential aide next week, it will have seen virtually no evidence to back up the provocative claim.

The difference between what Wells promised and delivered, and how it will play with the 12-member panel, is just one of the wild cards as the trial winds up. Libby himself did not take the stand, and the unusually spare defense seemed built on the hope that prosecutors did not make their case.

Indeed, the case is hardly a slam-dunk for the government. The defense punched some holes in the stories and memories of government witnesses, including journalists.

The biggest worry for the prosecution may be whether the jury will think it fair to convict Libby, the only person charged in the three-year federal probe, when he was neither the first nor the only high-level government official to talk about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Libby is charged with attempting to conceal his involvement in the events that led up to the disclosure of Plame's identity in published reports in the summer of 2003. Plame, a CIA arms-proliferation analyst, is married to Bush administration critic Joseph C. Wilson IV. The New York Times published a scathing anti-administration op-ed article by Wilson in July 2003, and eight days later his wife's identity was exposed by syndicated columnist Robert Novak.

Testimony at the trial indicated that Libby and several other administration officials were discussing Plame with journalists, offering up her identity to explain Wilson's CIA-directed trip to Africa, which turned up evidence that contradicted administration claims about Iraq's nuclear intentions.

Libby denied to a federal grand jury that he knew about Wilson's wife, but conceded that at one point he had heard it from a journalist, and then passed along the information as gossip.

The government said that he was lying, and that he had fabricated a story after realizing he may have disclosed classified information.

DOJ_NMG_0132834

Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald's parade of witnesses gave testimony indicating that Libby had come to know about Plame through a number of official sources, including Vice President Dick Cheney, well before he said he learned about her from a reporter. The government also called three journalists who spoke with Libby and who all disputed the version of conversations about Plame that Libby offered investigators.

By comparison, the defense that Wells offered was short and uneventful; the most provocative move was the decision not to call Libby to the witness stand.

His lawyers argued that if Libby misspoke to anyone, it was because he was swamped at work, essentially doing double duty as Cheney's chief of staff and national security advisor. His former right-hand man testified that Libby was a workaholic who was constantly dealing with life-and-death issues.

Many experts believe the jury wanted to hear that from the defendant himself, and that they will question why he chose to stay mum.

"This is a case that cries out for Libby to take the stand," said Jeffrey Frederick, a Charlottesville, Va., jury consultant. Under the law, the jury is not supposed to consider the fact that Libby did not testify in weighing his guilt or innocence. "Still, a number of jurors will be disappointed," he said.

But some lawyers said the move made sense. If Libby had taken the stand, Fitzgerald would have launched a far-reaching attack on his credibility.

"He stood the risk of being branded a liar," said John Hueston, a Los Angeles lawyer and former federal prosecutor who helped convict former Enron chief executive Kenneth L. Lay.

Hueston said the Lay case was an object lesson in why lawyers should think hard before subjecting their clients to cross-examination; Lay was quickly exposed as duplicitous.

Hueston said he thought that in Libby's case, "the defense made a sensible move in not risking everything."

How Wells will handle the once-jarring conspiracy theory is unclear.

In his opening statement, the lawyer produced a note from Cheney expressing concerns that Libby was being "sacrificed" and being put through "the meat grinder." The theory was that the White House was angling to protect political strategist Karl Rove and dispense with Libby — a theory that cast Libby in a sympathetic light.

But the conspiracy theory never really took root in court. Libby's lawyers never called Cheney or Rove to explore the theory.

Fitzgerald attacked the scapegoat theory by introducing videotape of former White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, who it was insinuated was part of the alleged anti-Libby cabal, publicly clearing Libby of any wrongdoing. The defense did not call McClellan either.

Legal experts said Wells could deal with the dropped conspiracy claim during his closing statement Tuesday by saying that the defense strategy changed because the lawyers thought the government case was so weak that it did not have to be addressed.

But lawyers said failing to follow up such a dramatic claim with harder evidence could backfire. Undelivered promises can raise questions in jurors' minds about other defense claims.

"It gives the government an opportunity during closing arguments to cast doubt on the entire defense case," said Daniel French, a former U.S. attorney. Fitzgerald, he said, "is now free to say … 'You didn't hear about a conspiracy because it did not happen.' "

Libby Trial Offers Little On Rove Theory (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told jurors at the onset of the CIA leak trial last month that Libby was the victim of a conspiracy to protect White House political adviser Karl Rove. But like the anticipated testimony from Libby and Vice President Dick Cheney, details of any save-Rove conspiracy were promised but never materialized.

That leaves defense attorneys, who will spend the long weekend fine-tuning their closing arguments, to decide how to describe Rove for jurors when summing up their case on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0132835

Libby is charged with lying and obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said Plame's name was leaked to the press as part of White House effort to discredit her husband, prominent war critic and former Ambassador Joseph Wilson.

During opening statements, defense attorney Theodore Wells described a different White House effort: one in which Rove, Bush's top political strategist, was protected for leaking information while Libby took the fall.

"Libby was an important staffer," Wells said. "But Karl Rove was the lifeblood of the Republican Party."

As evidence, Wells described how White House spokesman Scott McClellan publicly declared Rove's innocence in the leak case but failed to do so for Libby. Angered, Libby appealed to Cheney, who intervened and had McClellan exonerate Libby, too.

"Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Cheney wrote in a note.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says Libby felt guilty about discussing Plame with reporters and was trying to cover his tracks by lying to the FBI and to a grand jury investigating the leak. The Rove theory allows defense attorneys to say Libby felt wronged by the White House and was acting as an innocent man trying to clear his name.

But Libby's attorneys never dug deeper than that during the trial. While cross-examining government witnesses, they took every opportunity to mention Rove but never elicited details about how the president's top political operative was being protected or why.

Libby lawyers also opted not to call Cheney, McClellan or White House Communications Director Dan Bartlett to testify about whether Libby was being made a scapegoat.

The most explicit testimony on Rove came from columnist Robert Novak, who outed Plame in a July 2003 column. He testified that Rove, a frequent source, was one of two officials who told him about Plame. Libby, with whom he seldom spoke, was not a source.

The jury did not hear testimony that Rove was not indicted after testifying five times before Fitzgerald's grand jury, occasionally correcting misstatements he made in his earlier testimony.

Nor did the jury hear testimony about how Rove is credited as an architect of Republican political victories and has been accused by opponents of playing dirty tricks.

All that jurors heard is that Rove leaked Plame's identity and, from the outset, got political cover from the White House. He was never charged with a crime.

His name came up sporadically in handwritten memos and testimony. He was clearly cast as an important White House aide but his job was never fully explained. His influence was never clearly defined, only hinted at.

Bribery Charges Could Indicate Trouble For Unindicted Members (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 16, 2007

Indictments handed down to two major allies of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) earlier this week provide clues about other evidence and material federal prosecutors are seeking from Congress and which members could face more legal trouble in the wide-ranging bribery investigation.

In between the more lurid details about prostitutes, hundreds of thousands in cash payments and luxurious trips to Hawaii and Coeur d'Alene, Idaho included in the indictments of defense contractors Brent Wilkes and his longtime friend, former top-ranking CIA official Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, are eight references to letters Cunningham sent members of the Appropriations, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and Armed Services committees requesting tens of millions of dollars in contracts for Wilkes' companies. Cunningham served on each of the panels.

The indictments do not include the panels' responses to these requests; and that is, in all likelihood, because prosecutors were having a difficult time convincing Congress to hand over the relevant records – until recently. In December, the U.S. Attorneys office in San Diego issued a series of subpoenas for records to the three committees. Also late in the year, prosecutors served subpoenas for testimony to two key staffers: one who worked as Cunningham's executive assistant and another who worked for the Appropriations Defense subcommittee, which was chaired by Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) during many of the time periods in question.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has been in discussions with the House General Counsel's office and the bipartisan legal advisory group about whether to work with prosecutors and provide access to the hundreds of pages of material requested or decide to protect the documents by invoking the Constitution's Speech or Debate clause, a separation-of-powers protection that has been used in the past to protect congressional information from judicial inquiry.

Earlier this week, a Democratic aide said discussions are "still ongoing" and the two sides hope to resolve the matter as soon as possible. Of the eight letters of request, four were sent to the House Appropriations panel and the indictment specifically mentions one sent to the chairman of the Appropriations Defense subcommittee.

"On or about July 31, 2001, in support of defendant Wilkes's request for Congressional Appropriations, coconspirator Cunningham wrote the chair of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee seeking to maintain the level of funding for his 'earmarks,'" the indictment states.

In another instance, the indictments mentions that "on or about May 1, 2000" Cunningham's legislative director sent a memo to a House Appropriations Committee staffer indicating that two programs that funded Wilkes's contracts, were among the congressman's "highest priorities."

The indictment also references a letter Cunningham sent in late May 1998 to the chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on national security, requesting a total of $64 million for Wilkes's Document Conversion Programs for fiscal year 1999.

Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.) chaired that subcommittee until late November 1998 when Lewis moved into that post. The name of the panel was then changed from national security to defense subcommittee, although the indictment does not reflect that the name was changed in 1999.

On or about May 21, 1999, co-conspirator Cunningham wrote the chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on national Security, requesting a total of $94 million for the Document Conversion Program for fiscal year 2000, specifying that the funding was to be used for a Panama-based document scanning project, which had been using Wilkes's company, ADCS, as the prime contractor.

According to the indictments, Cunningham sent the House Armed Services Committee a series of letters.

For instance, in mid-April 2000, Cunningham wrote the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, on another Wilkes's project related to the Global Infrastructure Data Capture program, for which he requested a total of $16 million. At the time, Rep. Floyd Spence (R-S.C.) was chairman of the Armed Service Committee. Spence died in 2001.

But the indictment includes multiple letters sent to the House Armed Services Committee chairman when Cunningham's close friend, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), was the panel's chief.

On or about Sept.15, 2004, coconspirator Cunningham sent a letter to the Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee on behalf of Wilkes's alleged coconspirator Mitchell Wade seeking the "Chairman's support in obtaining $16 million in funding for the Counterintelligence Deception Program during the 2005 conference negotiations."

In 2005, Cunningham wrote two letters: one to Hunter seeking $25 million in funding for what is referred to in the indictment as the MRG program during the 2006 budget cycle, and another to the chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence urging his support for the same program. Former Rep. Porter Goss (R-Fla.), who went on to become CIA director before resigning last May, was chairman of the Intelligence panel at the time.

F.B.I. Raids On The Mayor Make Him Topic A In A Small Town (NYT)

By Jonathan Miller

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

GUTTENBERG, N.J., Feb. 12 — The whispers were everywhere in this sliver of a town on the Hudson: Federal investigators were here looking for something.

DOJ_NMG_0132837

Then on Jan. 26, the F.B.I. agents seized several computers, rifles and files from the home of Mayor David Delle Donna, as well as records from Town Hall.

Mr. Delle Donna has not been charged with a crime and insists that he has done nothing wrong, though a person close to the investigation said the January raids were connected to a former bar owner and eight others charged in 2005 with running a human trafficking ring.

In that case, the defendants are accused of conspiring to recruit young women in Honduras and smuggle them into the United States, then forcing them — some are as young as 14 — to dance and entertain at three bars in Guttenberg and nearby Union City.

So far, four people have pleaded guilty, including Luisa Medrano, 51, of Cliffside Park, whom investigators had accused of being the leader of the trafficking operation. But in September she pleaded guilty to the relatively minor charges of illegally harboring aliens and tax evasion.

According to state election records, Ms. Medrano contributed $3,000 to Mr. Delle Donna's election campaigns. Mr. Delle Donna, 48, who has been mayor since 2002, told The Hudson Reporter last week: "I don't believe I've done anything illegal. I feel I'll be exonerated."

Then he went on to say: "We live our lives based on the premise that we're supposed to always try to help people when you're a public servant. I have always had a very open-door policy here. I welcome people into my home, sometimes people I barely know, because they've come to me for help. And in the past, I've gone out of my way to help. I'm just disappointed that some of that help can be misconstrued as being illegal."

When contacted for this article, the mayor declined to comment further.

The January raids have left many in this town of 10,800 scratching their heads. "I thought it was crazy," said Leon June, 51, who was waiting for a bus recently on Bergenline Avenue. "It's a small town; how much damage can you do?"

And although no one is suggesting any connection to the trafficking, chatter in this town that measures all of 4 blocks wide and 11 blocks long reached new heights in recent weeks after two fires broke out at the only high-rise apartment building in town, killing one person, and another fire erupted at an abandoned building.

But Guttenberg — a name that even New Jerseyans are not sure how to pronounce (the first syllable sounds like gut, not toot) — is in Hudson County, where skullduggery is a spectator sport, and attention soon snapped back from the fires to Town Hall.

In addition to being mayor, a part-time job that pays $6,700 a year, Mr. Delle Donna is the coordinator for maintenance at the Hudson County Schools of Technology in North Bergen.

The day after the raid on the Delle Donna home, a modest two-story house wrapped in green aluminum siding, the mayor's wife, Anna, said in a telephone interview: "We don't know anything. We are very good people."

She added that the weapons the F.B.I. took were hunting rifles, though her husband has not hunted in 15 years.

The mayor's political adversaries say he is "a nice guy." "David Delle Donna doesn't come across as a bad person," an opponent said.

The United States attorney's office, which is handling the trafficking case, declined to comment.

This isn't the first time that tiny Guttenberg, wedged in next to West New York, has been on the wrong side of the headlines.

In 2003, the former mayor, Peter LaVilla, pleaded guilty to misappropriating campaign funds and using the money for a private brokerage account after an investigation by the United States attorney's office. In 2002, a councilman accused of receiving illegal advances on his salary resigned, although he was never formally charged. The same year, the town's chief financial officer pleaded guilty to misappropriation of funds.

Despite the latest goings-on, the mayor is keeping up with his normal responsibilities at the school and at Town Hall. At a council meeting on Monday, he could be found poring over the minutiae of local government: youth softball and baseball signups, problems with the prescription drug program, a shortage of computers in the planning office.

Though it was the first meeting since the January raids, no one spoke of the recent investigations and prosecutions, except the town's attorney, Charles Daglian, who said outside the meeting in a second-floor conference room at Town Hall: "I've been a lawyer 27 years. I've seen it all."

New York Boy Band Architect's Florida Office Searched By FBI (NSDY/AP)

By Travis Reed, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 16, 2007

ORLANDO, Fla. -- Federal agents executed search warrants on Thursday at New York native Lou Pearlman's Florida office and home, the latest in a string of legal problems facing the man who built the Backstreet Boys and 'NSYNC.

The search came less than two weeks after a state court-appointed receiver took control of three Pearlman companies. A judge issued that order after Florida's Office of Financial Regulation alleged that for 15 years Pearlman has sold unregistered securities through a bogus savings program. Also on Thursday, Pearlman's attorneys in that case filed a court motion to withdraw from representing him.

Pearlman, who moved to Orlando in 1990, conjured multi-platinum success by piecing together boy bands in the 1990s. He claims to have done nearly $2 billion in retail music sales and owns a restaurant franchise, a new steakhouse and a dining and entertainment complex in downtown Orlando. He has been sued over the years by several of the young stars he managed, who accused him of locking them into predatory deals. Pearlman has said the now-resolved lawsuits were just overblown contract negotiations.

FBI agents and other law enforcement investigators spent hours on Thursday carrying boxes away from Pearlman's offices.

The FBI referred comment to the U.S. attorney's office, which issued a statement saying: "Other than confirming the existence of an investigation, we are not in a position to comment further at this time. Today's searches are part of this investigation."

A former Pearlman spokeswoman reached for comment Thursday said she has not worked for him since last month. Pearlman did not immediately return a message from The Associated Press left on one of his voice mail accounts. He could not be reached by e-mail because the inbox was over capacity.

Stephen LaFreniere, the head of an Orlando real estate brokerage who said he was hired to manage Pearlman's complex, said he's been unable to pay its electric and garbage bills for three or four months because Pearlman's employees have been collecting the rent before he could get it. LaFreniere said he doesn't know where the combined $100,000 from Church Street Station's 15 or 16 tenants has been going. He also had no idea where Pearlman was.

"I've only met the man twice," he said.

Besides the state's allegations and possible federal charges from the Thursday search, Pearlman faces four lawsuits from banks alleging past-due loans of $14 million and overdue loan guarantees of $49 million, according to the Office of Financial Regulation complaint.

The state accuses Pearlman of collecting more than $95 million from more than 1,000 investors "by making a variety of misrepresentations." He's accused of promising to put people's money in insured bank accounts earning better-than-average dividends but instead transferring those funds to himself and his companies.

The state found less than $15,000 in four bank accounts used over the past four years for Pearlman's savings program, according to the complaint.

Ranbaxy Says U.S. Officials Searched Two N.J. Offices (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Catherine Larkin

Bloomberg, February 16, 2007

Feb. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd., India's biggest drugmaker, said U.S. officials conducted a surprise search of two of its New Jersey offices yesterday, seeking documents on a variety of topics.

Federal agents spent all day at Ranbaxy's administrative office in Princeton and manufacturing facility in New Brunswick, said Chuck Caprariello, a spokesman for the company. He declined to specify which documents were taken and said business operations have continued as usual.

``The only thing we know right now is that it was an information request and they needed information on a variety of topics," Caprariello said today in a telephone interview. ``We're trying to open up dialogue now as to why, and what information they wanted."

The Trentonian, a New Jersey newspaper, reported today that criminal investigators from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration searched the Princeton facility, saying they were serving a warrant.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Maryland, part of the Justice Department, is working on the Ranbaxy case and won't comment because there is a pending investigation, spokeswoman Vickie LeDuc said today in a telephone interview from her Baltimore office. Doug Arbesfeld, a spokesman for the FDA, said the Justice Department was handling all media inquiries.

Ranbaxy, a maker of generic drugs based in Gurgaon, near New Delhi, issued a statement after the close of trading in Mumbai saying it wasn't aware of any wrongdoing. Earlier in the day, the company's shares had their biggest one-day percentage drop in more than seven months. The shares fell 21.1 rupees, or 5.1 percent, to 393.5 rupees on the Bombay Stock Exchange.

6 Years In Prison For Strip Club Bribes (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-A former Clark County commissioner was sentenced to six years in prison Wednesday for delivering bribes to politicians on behalf of a strip club owner.

U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks branded Lance Malone the "organizer, manager and leader" of "probably as gross a case of political corruption in the state of Nevada, certainly, that has ever occurred and been successfully prosecuted."

Hicks blamed Malone for distributing up to $550,000 in bribes to three former commission colleagues from 2000 to 2003, and said he was imposing three years more than Malone received in a related case in San Diego. Malone will serve the sentences at the same time; he also was fined $100,000.

Malone pleaded guilty in September to one count of conspiracy under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations, or RICO Act, for the Nevada case.

In the San Diego case, Malone was convicted on similar charges that he delivered bribes to politicians there on behalf of strip club owner Michael Galardi.

On Wednesday, Malone, 45, told the judge that he had been greedy, and he pleaded for leniency.

"I did start with good intentions, and those intentions went horribly, horribly wrong," Malone told the judge.

"I did things that I regret and I wish I could take back, but I cannot," he said.

Malone becomes the third person sentenced in a case that grew from years of FBI wiretaps and led to indictments against Galardi, Malone, and former Clark County commissioners Dario Herrera, Erin Kenny and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. The commission wields control over a wide area of southern Nevada, including the Las Vegas Strip.

Herrera, 33, is serving four years and two months in prison. Kincaid-Chauncey, 68, is serving 30 months. They were convicted last year.

Kenny and Galardi, who said he sought votes from the commission that would benefit his strip clubs, pleaded guilty and awaits sentencing.

West Mifflin Policeman Held For Trial (PTR)

By Karen Zapf, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 16, 2007

In a hearing that lasted almost four hours, seven witnesses testified Thursday about alleged wrongdoing by suspended West Mifflin police Officer Noel Missig.

Brookline District Judge Charles McLaughlin held Missig, 39, of West Mifflin, for trial on charges of perjury, simple assault, obstructing the administration of law or government function, tampering with public records or information, two counts of unsworn falsification to authorities and official oppression.

The charges stem from a joint FBI and state police investigation that spanned four years and led to accusations that Missig planted cocaine in a suspect's clothing, assaulted a handcuffed boy and lied about the seizure of video poker machines from a borough business.

Mark Kocak, of West Mifflin, testified that on March 31, 2004, Missig and other officers came to his Maryland Avenue home looking for Richard Jasek, who was wanted by police for a probation violation.

DOJ_NMG_0132840

Kocak testified that he saw an officer hand Missig a package that was on a table, and Missig placed the package, which contained cocaine, into the pocket of a sweatshirt belonging to Jasek.

Kocak said Missig told him: "This is going to help you out."

Kocak and Jasek were charged with drug violations.

Another witness, Andrew Palmer, 23, testified that during his arrest by West Mifflin police in 2001, Missig kicked him in the ribs and later choked him and slammed his head against a wall at the police station.

Mark Rider, former borough field inspector, testified that he did not give Missig information in 2000 that there were video poker machines in a Pennsylvania Avenue business.

When obtaining a search warrant for the business, Missig claimed the information about the gambling machines came from Rider.

"I never saw the poker machines until the morning they were taken out of the building," Rider said.

Stephen Greenberg, Missig's lawyer, said the alleged misconduct did not take place.

Missig, a borough officer for 12 years, remains free on his own recognizance. His formal arraignment is scheduled for May 8.

Missig's suspension without pay remains in effect until Tuesday's borough council meeting.

Legal Team Honored For Winning Gang Conviction (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

The Anti-Defamation League on Thursday honored the federal agents and prosecutors involved in convicting four members of a Latino street gang in Highland Park last year for violating the civil rights of African Americans with a campaign of threats and violence, including murder.

The group noted that the case against the Avenues gang "broke new ground as the first time a street gang was convicted of violating federal hate crime laws."

Honored at a luncheon at the Skirball Cultural Center were federal prosecutors Bobby Bernstein, Alexander Bustamante and Thomas O'Brien; FBI agents Jerry Fradella and Christian M. Haugen; and federal paralegal Martha Lovejoy.

Two sheriff's deputies, an LAPD lieutenant and a Pasadena police corporal were also honored for working to stop hate crimes and ease race relations.

Prison For Collector In Protection Scam (CHIT)

Extortionist preyed on Russian businesses

A Russian native, who prosecutors say preyed on Russian businesses in Chicago for "protection" money, was sentenced Thursday to more than 7 years in prison for extortion.

"I would like to die at home," Israil Vengerin, 69, of Chicago, said through a Russian interpreter from the U.S. Bureau of Prisons' medical facility in Rochester, Minn., where he took part in the sentencing by videoconference.

Vengerin's lawyer, Ronald J. Clark, sought leniency, saying his client is dying in prison from heart problems while he awaits a transplant.

U.S. District Judge John Darrah imposed an 87-month prison term, saying Vengerin "terrorized" some in the Russian community.

Darrah said he took into consideration Vengerin's health but felt he needed to "send a message that this kind of conduct will not be tolerated."

If Vengerin's condition becomes terminal, the judge said he would consider reducing his sentence.

Last October, a jury convicted Vengerin on seven counts of extortion and mail fraud for threatening violence to obtain money from victims in four separate schemes.

Prosecutors said Vengerin held himself out in Chicago's Russian community as "a strong-arm collector" who preyed on businesses for protection money in return for guarantees that the owners wouldn't be harmed and their businesses wouldn't be vandalized.

Much of the testimony came from secretly recorded tapes of Vengerin made by an associate who helped collect the protection money while working undercover for the FBI. At least two victims also recorded Vengerin with the FBI's cooperation.

In one incident, a Russian businessman agreed with Vengerin to stage a burglary in 1999 at his painting-supply store in Skokie, but the insurance company refused to pay his $273,000 claim for losses.

Thinking he had been double-crossed, Vengerin extorted the businessman for his promised share of the money from the staged burglary, prosecutors said.

By 2004, the businessman, Vladimir Meltser, agreed to cooperate with the FBI and recorded a conversation in which Vengerin threatened to beat Meltser "to within an inch of his life" if he didn't pay up, according to court records.

After Vengerin demanded $1,000, Meltser paid him in two $500 installments with money supplied by the FBI, the records showed.

In another instance, Vengerin struck a businessman in the stomach when he balked at his demand for money in 1999. The victim then handed over a check for $1,500, authorities said.

Another victim contacted the FBI in 2000 after three Vengerin associates demanded he produce $20,000 the next day or they would harm him and his girlfriend. The victim paid $15,000 supplied by the FBI, authorities said.

Assistant U.S. Atty. T. Marcus Funk called Vengerin a bully who took advantage of an insular ethnic community often unwilling to go to law enforcement.

Vengerin's wife, Alina, wept in the courtroom as she pleaded for mercy, saying of her husband, "He is a very peaceful person and will not harm a fly."

Russian Court Delays Forbes Murder Trial (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW - A court postponed jury selection Thursday in the retrial of three men linked to the 2004 murder of the American-born editor of Forbes magazine's Russian edition after two of the defendants failed to show up, a court spokeswoman said.

Prosecutors had accused two Chechen men of killing Paul Klebnikov, but a jury trial acquitted them last year. The Supreme Court later overturned the acquittal and ordered a new trial.

Moscow City Court spokeswoman Anna Usacheva said Thursday's session to choose jurors for the retrial was postponed until March 14 because defendants Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev failed to show up. The two have been free since their acquittal.

A third man whom prosecutors linked to the Klebnikov case, Moscow notary Fail Sadretdinov, was convicted last month on an unrelated crime and sentenced to nine years in prison. Sadretdinov was brought to the courtroom Thursday, but his lawyer, Ruslan Koblev, argued that his poor health made it impossible to attend the retrial.

"Sadretdinov needs medical treatment," Koblev told The Associated Press, saying that his client was suffering from epilepsy and suffered seizures during his trial last year. "It's absurd to have him face trial."

Prosecutors accused Sadretdinov of involvement in the alleged attempted murder of a businessman, and claimed he was linked with the other two defendants who were accused of killing Klebnikov. Sadretdinov denies the charges.

Koblev criticized the retrial as politically driven, saying that authorities were pressuring the court to convict the defendants. President Vladimir Putin last year praised the Supreme Court's decision to launch a retrial.

Prosecutors have claimed that Dukuzov and Vakhayev killed Klebnikov on behalf of Khozh-Akhmed Nukhayev, who was the subject of Klebnikov's book "Conversations With a Barbarian." Nukhayev remains at large.

Critics of Russia's justice system, which is widely seen as lacking independence from the Kremlin, have said prosecutors failed to properly pursue other lines of investigation.

Klebnikov, 41, an American of Russian origin who was editor of Forbes magazine's Russian edition, was gunned down outside its Moscow offices in July 2004. Many believed the killing was connected to Klebnikov's work investigating corruption and Russia's shadowy business world, but the case remains unsolved.

The U.S.-based media watchdog group, the Committee to Protect Journalists, called on court officials to make the proceedings open to the public, to ensure the suspects are present for the trial and to make sure the jury is sequestered - something that rarely happens in Russian judicial proceedings.

"The first trial was riddled with procedural violations that were hidden from the public with closed-door proceedings and a gag order on all participants," Executive Director Joel Simon said.

Russian Trial On Journalist's Slaying Opens (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 — The retrial of three men charged with murdering Paul Klebnikov, the American editor of the Russian-language edition of Forbes magazine here, opened in confusion today as the two suspects failed to appear in court and the judge postponed the beginning of jury selection for a month.

A jury acquitted the two suspects — Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev, both Chechens — after a closed trial last year that raised questions about the Russian government's handling of the case, which gained prominence because of Mr. Klebnikov's renown as an aggressive investigative journalist.

The Russian Supreme Court overturned that acquittal last fall and ordered a new trial, but the men have since remained free. Their whereabouts remains unclear, although a lawyer who represented Mr. Dukuzov in the case until last month, Ruslan A. Khasanov, said he believed his client had returned to his home in Urus Martin, a small city in Chechnya.

The prosecutor general's office declined to discuss today's events, which like the previous trial occurred behind closed doors. A spokeswoman for the Moscow City Court, where the trial is taking place, also declined to elaborate beyond saying that the proceedings would resume on March 14. It was not clear whether arrest warrants had been issued to bring the men to the court.

Mr. Klebnikov, an American citizen of Russian ancestry, was shot to death outside his office in July 2004. He was one in a series of journalists before and since who have died in unsolved circumstances in Russia.

With international attention focused on the killing, including personal appeals by President Bush to President Vladimir V. Putin for a thorough investigation, prosecutors accused Mr. Dukuzov and Mr. Vakhayev of carrying out the killing on behalf of a Chechen separatist commander, Khozh-Akhmed Nukhayev. Mr. Nukhayev was the subject of one of Mr. Klebnikov's books, "A Conversation with a Barbarian."

A third defendant, Fail Sadretdinov, was charged with related crimes and also acquitted last year. He was later convicted of other crimes and sentenced to nine years in prison. As a prisoner, he appeared in court today.

Mr. Sadretdinov's lawyer, Ruslan P. Koblev, said the opening session was largely a formality given the absence of the other suspects, as well as representatives of Mr. Klebnikov's family. He described the failure of the suspects to appear as unusual.

Mr. Klebnikov's brother, Michael, expressed concern about the latest development. "We continue to think that the best way for this to be done — for it to be just and fair — is to do it openly," he said in a telephone interview from New York, where he lives. "Secondly, we have a question of why they were not in custody in the first place. They are murder suspects."

Mr. Koblev said that the conviction of his client on unrelated charges made it clear that the prosecution was biased against the three men, regardless of the evidence. "If they are in a normal state of mind, and they see what happened to Sadretdinov, I am sure they understand that they cannot pin hopes on justice in this trial," he said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Khasanov said he had not reached an agreement to represent Mr. Dukuzov in the new trial, adding that he had told this to the court. He said the normal procedure for notifying a suspect of a trial would be to send a written summons by mail — a dubious prospect in a region battered by two wars since 1994.

Retrial In Klebnikov Case Delayed (MOSCOWT)

By Carl Schreck

Moscow Times, February 16, 2007

Two Chechens accused of murdering U.S. journalist Paul Klebnikov failed to appear in Moscow City Court on Thursday, delaying jury selection in the high-profile case.

Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev are being tried for a second time for the July 2004 shooting of Klebnikov, 41, the former editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine.

They were acquitted in May, but the Supreme Court reversed that ruling in November, sending both men back to court.

But they were nowhere to be found Thursday. "We have no written explanation of why they did not show up," court spokeswoman Tatyana Zubaryova said.

The proceeding was closed to the public.

Vakhayev's lawyer, Vladimir Gorulkov, said in court that his client had "valid reasons" for his absence, Zubaryova said. No one showed up to represent Dukuzov, Zubaryova said. Ruslan Koblev, the lawyer for Moscow notary Fail Sadretdinov, said Dukuzov had received his court summons but was in Chechnya; he said he did not know whether Dukuzov would return to Moscow for the trial.

Koblev said Vakhayev was in Moscow but stayed home Thursday because he was ill.

Sadretdinov is suspected of ordering Vakhayev and Dukuzov to kill a Moscow businessman in an unrelated killing.

Authorities were unable to convict Sadretdinov, but they did manage to get him for illegally registering an apartment. Last month, he was sentenced by the Preobrazhensky District Court to nine years in prison. Authorities are now retrying Sadretdinov for ordering the murder of the Moscow businessman.

The same jury that is being selected to hear the retrial in the Klebnikov killing is also slated to hear Sadretdinov's case.

The Klebnikov retrial has been postponed until March 14, Zubaryova said.

Ruslan Khazanov, who served as Dukuzov's attorney in the first trial, said he was no longer representing Dukuzov. He added that did not know why the suspects did not show up to court. "But clearly they know they won't get a fair trial," Khazanov said.

Koblev, Sadretdinov's lawyer, said the harsh sentence handed down to his client for the illegal registration might prompt Dukuzov and Vakhayev to flee the country to avoid the retrial in the Klebnikov case.

Alexander Vasilyev, a spokesman for the Prosecutor General's Office, said Thursday that he could not comment on Vakhayev's and Dukuzov's wherabouts, but he did indicate that the trial was unlikely to be open to the public.

The Klebnikov family and media watchdog groups have criticized the decision to close the first trial and have called for opening the second trial.

"You and I both know that the case is full of secret documents," Vasilyev said.

But Koblev said only four pages -- out of 38 volumes of case materials -- contained classified information.

That classified information was said to detail secret methods used by the Federal Security Service to collect evidence against the defendants.

"The first trial was riddled with procedural violations that were hidden from the public with closed-door proceedings and a gag order on all participants," Joel Simon, executive director of the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, said in a statement Wednesday.

"We call on Russian court officials to open the hearing to the public to ensure a fair trial."

Prosecutors contend Vakhayev and Dukuzov had been ordered to kill Klebnikov by Khozh-Akhmed Nukhayev, a Chechen separatist who appeared in Klebnikov's 2003 book "Conversation With a Barbarian."

The Klebnikov family communicated through a spokesman Thursday that it had nothing to say. In a statement released in November, after the Supreme Court ordered a retrial, the family said it would "suspend for the time being our own direct participation in the case due to the enormous emotional toll on us."

But family members said they "reserve the right to become involved again at any time, as the trial unfolds."

Larisa Maslennikova, the lawyer representing the Klebnikov family, said on Ekho Moskvy radio Thursday that it was "above all" the government's job to bring the slain journalist's killers to justice.

Recent history suggests that may be asking a lot.

While the killings of Russian journalists Dmitry Kholodov, Vladislav Listyev and Larisa Yudina in the 1990s all captured headlines, none of these cases has actually seen a single conviction.

Nor has anyone been convicted in the October 2006 killing of Anna Politkovskaya.

Inglewood Police Chief Confirms Misconduct Investigation (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

Inglewood interim Police Chief J.I. Davis today confirmed that some members of his department were being investigated for misconduct, but he refused to give specifics.

At an afternoon news conference at Inglewood police headquarters, Davis insisted that his department began its probe after developing its own information of possible police corruption.

"The investigation was initiated in January 2006, after hearing rumors and developing information about possible misconduct," he told reporters.

Davis refused to give specifics, but The Times has reported that at least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that had been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown.

Davis denied reports that the department's investigation was a result of information gathered by federal officials.

"That the information was the result of a federal investigation" is incorrect, he said. "The department did not receive information from any federal agency."

But sources familiar with the misconduct allegations said that federal authorities, including the U.S. attorney's office and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, began hearing about the alleged involvement of police officers last year.

Davis said he called the news conference to stress his department's role in attempting to deal seriously and aggressively with the allegations.
